In the Air Force, a major increase, perhaps a tripling, in the number of active-duty, dedicated close air support units, with each unit semipermanently assigned in peacetime to an Army maneuver unit for training. In concert with this, an A-10 replacement aircraft program at one-half the unit cost, incorporating better survivability and better cannon accuracy.

In the Navy, a major increase, say a doubling, of the submarine force structure, by augmenting our nuclear subs with modern diesel-electric subs. Also, initiation of a single-purpose, carrier-based air-to-air fighter and a close support aircraft—the two intended to double the naval air force structure.

In the Marine Corps, a major shift from World War II-type daytime frontal assault of defended beaches to nighttime infiltration accompanied by a mobility-increasing trimming of unit size/weight as in the Army, together with a major increase in infantry antitank capability.

Note that these four points are litmus tests of whether service doctrine changes (in each case away from attrition warfare and toward maneuver/blitzkreig-type concepts) are serious enough to impact force structure and budget.

And finally, on the hardware and acquisition front, a short list of indicators is quite adequate for determining whether our current procurement mess is really being reformed:

In procurement, when more than 50 percent of major weapon systems are bought from two or more competing contractors throughout the production period.

In R&D, when more than 50 percent of major weapons developments result in a competitive prototype flyoff or shootoff.

In testing, when operational tests always test the new system side-by-side with its predecessor in a realistically stressful combat setting.

Overall, when at least 50 percent of new major weapons programs come in at lower unit program costs and larger total production runs than the weapons they are replacing—something that technology is achieving every day in the civilian marketplace but which has been almost totally denied to us in the defense business.

Are we likely to see most of these indicators flash green in the next year or the year after? Not likely. But the military reform approach symbolized by this short list of litmus tests is a good deal more serious, more practical, and more likely to win wars than the let's-throw-money-at-the-problem approach that we have been practicing for far too long.—Washington, D.C. (Description of a "true type of natural soldier": Sane, cool, and monosyllabic, he would when the occasion demanded take enormous risks and, with an uncanny sensibility, carry them off. RETIREMENT OF FORREST KILMER, EDITOR OF QUAD-CITY TIMES

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I would like to take this opportunity on behalf of Senator SIMON and myself, to call the Senate's attention to an individual who, after 46 years of reporting and journalistic leadership, is retiring.

I refer, Mr. President, to Mr. Forrest Kilmer, editor of the Quad-City Times, who is highly respected in our State for his commitment to excellence in journalism.

Forrest Kilmer's dedication to his profession and to his community have extended over his entire adult lifetime. He began as a cub reporter at the age of 18 on the staff of the Morning Democrat in Davenport, IA. In 1955 he became managing editor of the Morning Democrat. In 1964, he was named executive editor of the Times-Democrat, which resulted from a merger of the Morning Democrat and the Daily Times. In 1970, he became editor of the Times-Democrat, which later changed its name to the Quad-City Times.

For nearly half a century Forrest Kilmer has striven to improve the quality of journalism in Illinois. In his last assignment, as editor of the Quad-City Times, he established a bureau in the State capital to report on State government in a probing and insightful manner. His redesign of story layout led to numerous national awards and his courage and encouragement have resulted in several awards for investigative articles.

His dedication to his profession has also been matched by his dedication to his country and community. As a veteran of World War II he received the Bronze Star and is an active member of his Lutheran congregation.

Forrest Kilmer is a man of both personal and professional integrity. We will, indeed, miss his journalistic leadership, but his contributions to the profession will always serve as an example for all reporters and editors.

Mr. President, the Governor of Illinois has proclaimed January 31, 1986, as Forrest Kilmer Day in Illinois and Senator SIMON and I would like to join all Illinoisans in wishing him and his wife, Jeannette, all of the best in the future.

ANNUAL CONGRESSIONAL CONSULTATIONS ON REFUGEE ADMISSIONS: 1986

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I ask that the following materials be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as the substance of the annual consultations between the representatives of the President and members of the Judiciary Committee on refugee admissions for fiscal year 1986, as mandated by section 207(d) of the Refugee Act of 1980.

Mr. President, in order to conserve the printing costs of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I am submitting only relevant correspondence and selected excerpts from the much more detailed and lengthy hearing record compiled by the Senate Judiciary Committee's Subcommittee on Immigration and Refugee Policy entitled "Annual Refugee Consultation," September 17, 1985 (Senate Hearing 99-320). That record should be considered to be incorporated by reference in full in these remarks. Should any of my colleagues wish to read this, or should they have any questions about it, I would refer them either to the staff of the Subcommittee on Immigration and Refugee Policy, which I chair, or the Office of the U.S. Coordinator for Refugee Affairs, Department of State, Washington, DC.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REFUGEE ADMISSIONS FOR FISCAL YEAR 1986

Mr. Chairman and distinguished members of the Committee, it is a pleasure to consult with you on the U.S. refugee admissions ceiling for fiscal year 1986. This annual consultation affords the Administration and the Congress an opportunity to discuss the refugee situation in the world and the humanitarian response to this situation by the United States.

Since the end of the Second World War, the United States has provided haven to literally millions of refugees. They have arrived in waves: first from Eastern Europe, then from Cuba, then in the 1970's, from the Soviet Union, and most recently, from the countries of Indochina. All of these countries and regions continue to produce refugees, and the United States accepts more of them than any other resettlement country. We are a nation founded by refugees, and our national life has been reinvigorated throughout our history by recurring waves of refugees. I think it is well that we remember this as we consider the question of how many refugees we should admit to the United States in the coming fiscal year.

This is the second consecutive year in which I have been privileged to present the President's refugee admissions proposal to the Congress. In doing so, I would again like to thank the members of this Committee for their continuing support for the U.S. refugee program—which includes both the admission of refugees to the United States, and the important overseas assistance efforts to which the United States contributes.

PROPOSED REFUGEE ADMISSIONS IN FISCAL YEAR 1986

Mr. Chairman, I turn now to the President's proposal for refugee admissions in fiscal year 1986. The President proposes to establish a ceiling of 70,000 for refugee admissions to the United States in the coming fiscal year. This total will be broken down into 3,000 for refugees from Africa; 40,000 for East Asia first asylum; 8,500 for the Orderly Departure Program from Vietnam; 9,500 for refugees from Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union; 3,000 for refugees from Latin America and the Caribbean; and 6,000 for refugees from the Near East and South Asia.

The President is proposing a ceiling of 3,000 for Latin America and the Caribbean in the hope that Cuba will end its suspension of the U.S.-Cuban Migration Agreement of December 1984. If, however, Cuba does not terminate its suspension of the migration agreement, a portion of the numbers will be transferred on a quarterly basis to other regional ceilings to accommodate unforeseen increased admissions needs. If these numbers are not needed elsewhere, they will be allowed to lapse.

As was the case last year, the President wishes to maintain a separate ceiling for admissions under the UNHCR's Orderly Departure Program (ODP) from Vietnam. This separate ceiling serves two purposes. It reassures the ASEAN countries that an expanding ODP will not mean a decrease in resettlement from the first asylum camps; and it sends a clear signal to Hanoi that the United States is prepared to make good on its offer to accept a large number of Amerasians and "re-education camp" prisoners.

Aside from the uncertainties connected with the Cuban and Vietnamese programs, the proposed regional admissions ceilings should be adequate to provide for refugee resettlement needs during the coming fiscal year.

THE UNITED STATES AND THE WORLD REFUGEE SITUATION

Once again in 1985, the United States has played a major role in responding to urgent refugee needs—both through life-saving assistance overseas and through resettlement in the United States where necessary. Although this consultation is primarily concerned wtih refugee admissions, I would like to mention briefly the U.S. role in assisting refugees abroad.

The United States continues to provide the largest share of financial support for the office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR)—some 30 per cent of its budget, or $107,000,000 in fiscal year 1985—as well as for other international relief organizations, such as the International Committtee of the Red Cross—over $26,000,000 in this fiscal year. The United States maintains its leading role in support of the U.N. Relief and Works Agency in the Near East (UNRWA)—initially providing $67 million in contributions for this fiscal year, and then an additional $8 million from the President's Emergency Fund to help UNRWA avoid a curtailment of services due to extraordinary budget problems. It is our hope that these international organizations will take an even more active role in providing assistance to refugees in the coming year.

The United States has been deeply involved during the past year in providing emergency assistance to refugees and others suffering from the effects of drought and civil conflict in Africa. The U.S. Government will have contributed almost $200 million for all aspects of refugee assistance in Africa this fiscal year alone. I would note, in particular, our rapid intervention in Sudan in response to requests for assistance from the UNHCR and the Government of Sudan which contributed to the saving of thousands of refugees' lives.

Other notable developments in the U.S. refugee program during the past year have been:

The continued expansion of the UNHCR's Orderly Departure Program from Vietnam. Some 12,000 refugees and immigrants will leave Vietnam under this program in fiscal year 1985 for new lives in the United States. Continued expansion of the ODP is essential to our goal of ending—or at least diminishing—the dangerous phenomenon of clandestine flight by sea from Vietnam.

Through our contributions to the U.N. Border Relief Operation (UNBRO) and other interatonal relief organizations, we have played a principal role in ensuring that Cambodians forced to flee to Thailand in order to escape Vietnamese armed attacks have been able to maintain some semblance of a normal life.

Elsewhere in Asia, U.S. contributions to refugee assistance in Pakistan have helped sustain the 2.5. million Afghan refugees there, and allowed them to pursue their lives while awaiting the day when they can finally return to their embattled homeland.

In Central America, the growing vitality of the Duarte government is attested to by the continuing return of Salvadoran refugees to their country from Honduras. The United States applauds this development and will continue to provide assistance, both through international organizations and bilaterally, to help those who return.

A major achievement of the past year was aborted when Fidel Castro announced the suspension of the U.S.-Cuban Migration Agreement just after the first Cuban ex-political prisoners had arrived in the United States on May 20. The United States is prepared to resume processing of refugees in Havana as soon as Cuba decides to reactivate the migration agreement.

THE INDOCHINESE REFUGEE SITUATION TODAY

Mr. Chairman, our large Indochinese resettlement program is at a transition point. The root cause of the refugee problem in Southeast Asia is clear. The outflow of refugees from Vietnam, Cambodia and Laos is a direct result of the imposition of Soviet-style oppression on the people of these countries. The United States has responded to this great human tragedy by offering new homes and the chance to live in freedom to hundreds of thousands of Indochinese refugees. The goal of the U.S. refugee program has been to treat these refugees from persecution in as humane a fashion as possible. I believe that history will pass a favorable judgment on our efforts.

Over the last ten years some 755,000 refugees have arrived in the United States from Indochina. About 52,000 of the 71,000 total refugee admissions in fiscal year 1984 came from Indochina. The same proportion is expected in fiscal year 1985. Even though current resettlement programs have declined dramatically from high levels of 1980–82, we believe they have been responsive to the true humanitarian needs for the region.

As with any program, however, we must continue to be sensitive to the need to balance refugee resettlement from Southeast Asia with other U.S. interests and concerns. Indochinese refugee resettlement must be balanced against other, regional solutions; balanced as a fair share of an international resettlement effort; balanced in terms of its budgetary implications; balanced in terms of other immigration and domestic policy considerations; and balanced against the need to provide resettlement to deserving refugees from other parts of the world.

To achieve this balance, the United States—working with the UNHCR and other nations— is pursuing measures to address the remaining refugee problems in Southeast Asia. There are two general categories of measures that either have been implemented or are being considered.

First, increasing emphasis is being placed on international and bilateral measures to reduce the number of persons arriving in first asylum countries who do not meet refugee criteria.

An example of this type of measure is the Lao screening program initiated on July 1, 1985, by the Thai government. This program, which is being monitored closely by the UNHRC, is designed to identify the true refugees as defined in international law. Essential to the successful operation of this program is agreement by Laos to allow the safe return of those found ineligible for refugee status. We are following the results of this program with great interest.

The second category of measures is aimed specifically at assuring that the U.S. refugee program fits the current situation in the region. Available evidence suggests that people leave the Indochinese countries today for a variety of reasons: to escape persecution, to seek a better standard of living, or to join family members who have previously fled. Our objective is to ensure that the U.S. refugee resettlement program is available exclusively to those who have been persecuted or have a well-founded fear of persecution if returned to their homelands, and who cannot reasonably expect to voluntarily repatriate or resettle in another country, returned to their homelands, and who cannot reasonably except to voluntarily repatriate or resettle in another country. Those who have left their homes primarily for reasons of family reunification should, to the degree possible, use normal immigration programs which have been established for that purpose. In this connection, we will continue to work on improving the availability and use of safe and orderly migration programs from the countries of origin.

In furtherance of this second approach, the relevant agencies have been studying the proper use of departure mechanisms for the future, including the increased use of normal immigration channels for the family reunification segment of the Indochinese resettlement program. Our intention is to take a regional approach to the use of immigration, as opposed to refugee admissions, and to include all ethnic groups within this approach.

I want to emphasize that, as we review the refugee situation as it exists in Southeast Asia today, we will continue to be guided by our bedrock concern for humanitarian principles. Furthermore, our national refugee policy will continue to be based on thorough consultations with the Congress, with the first asylum countries in the region, other primary resettlement countries and the UNHCR.

Nonresettlement solutions in Southeast Asia

While resettlement remains a necessary means for dealing with the refugee situation in Southeast Asia, solutions within the region must be pursued more vigorously. Such measures, in particular, the alternative of voluntary repatriation with appropriate safeguards and international monitoring—may require negotiation of agreements by the UNHCR with the states concerned.

The U.N. High Commissioner's Orderly Departure Program from Vietnam

In our consultations with the Congress last September, I announced, on behalf of President Reagan, two special initiatives for expanding the High Commissioner's Orderly Departure Program from Vietnam.

One of these initiatives called for the admission to the United States of all Amerasian children and close family members from Vietnam over the three fiscal years 1985 through 1987.

The second initiative called for the resettlement in the United States of political prisoners currently and previously confined in Vietnam's "re-education camp" prisons and their qualifying family members, totaling 10,000 persons over the two year period, 1984–86.

The United States presented these two Presidential initiatives to the Vietnamese in Geneva last October.

We have had success in nearly doubling the number of Amerasians released by the Vietnamese—almost 4,000 children and family members this year compared to 2,200 in fiscal year 1984—however, the Vietnamese failed to reach our goal of 5,000 for the first year.

We are, however, greatly disappointed that the Vietnamese have not as yet responded positively to our proposal for the "re-education camp" prisoners. After the initial presentation, the United States has twice proposed to Vietnam that we meet to continue discussions on this proposal, but so far the Vietnamese have not agreed. In unofficial conversations, Hanoi has indicated that it is backing off from its earlier announced willingness and commitment to allow these people to be resettled in the United States.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to reaffirm again today that the United States is profoundly concerned about the continued imprisonment of these people and that we remain ready and willing to accept them—both former and present prisoners—and their families for resettlement in the United States as soon as the Vietnamese authorities will allow them to leave. This is a purely humanitarian matter and should not be made dependent on the settlement of the political differences that separate our two countries.

Next month, we will be meeting with Vietnamese representatives in Geneva, under UNHCR aegis, to discuss the operation of the Orderly Departure Program. Our goal remains the expansion of this vital international program. We will be seeking agreement by Vietnam to improvements in the operation of the ODP which will enable more American children and other persons of special humanitarian concern to the United States to leave Vietnam via this safe and humane route. We are prepared—as we were last year—to hold bilateral talks with the Vietmanese on our humanitarian initiative to resettle the former and present "re-education camp" prisoners.

It is our intention to continue to maximize the use of immigrant visas for family reunification within the ODP, thereby reserving refugee numbers for those who have no alternative but to leave as refugees.

Assistance to Cambodian border population in Thailand

Mr. Chairman, the large population of displaced Cambodians living in evacuation camps in Thailand is of intense concern to the United States. I had an opportunity during my visit to Thailand in July to meet and talk with some of these heroic people of Cambodia who have been driven from their homeland by Vietnamese armed attacks on their border encampments. The violence of the latest attacks—occurring over the period from November 1984 through April 1985—was such that the entire border population of over 225,000 people—men, women and children—was driven into Thailand. The government and people of Thailand and the U.N. Border Relief Operation (UNBRO) have responded magnificently to the plight of these victims of Vietnamese aggression. The United States will continue to provide support to this population and to the people of Thailand whose lives have been disrupted by the impact of Vietnam's attacks.

Mr. Chairman, we and the other resettlement countries support the policy of the Royal Thai Government that the evacuees from the border area should be provided all necessary assistance, but that resettlement abroad should not be viewed as the primary solution to their plight. However, we have decided, subject to Thai government approval, to initiate a limited program to unite close family members with relatives already in this country primarily through immigration-type channels. This program will include those eligible for immigrant visas, "Visas 93" for spouses and unmarried minor children, and selected use of humanitarian parole for close dependents in the two preceding categories.

Also of special concern to the United States are a group of Vietnamese who have fled overland to the Thai-Cambodian border and were evacuated into Thailand along with the Cambodian border population. Although the United States has previously accepted some of them for resettlement, approximately 4,500 remain under Red Cross protection at one of the evacuation sites, which also houses much larger numbers of Khmer border evacuees. Because of our concerns about the unique security problem of this small but especially vulnerable population, we are supporting a Red Cross initiative to obtain agreement to relocate the land Vietnamese to a separate and more secure location. Assuming that necessary security provisions and international cooperation can be obtained, the United States is prepared to initiate a limited program to resettle those with close family ties to the U.S. and those of particular humanitarian concern, such as former "re-education camp" inmates.

The United States is greatly concerned about the quality of life in the evacuation camps. We will be working with UNBRO and the Royal Thai Government to upgrade camp conditions and to ensure security for camp inhabitants. In addition, the Administration—and the Congress—is looking at ways that this large Cambodian community can be provided an opportunity for educating its young people so that they can be better prepared for the day when they can return to their homes on the other side of the border. The Royal Thai Government has also expressed an interest in the education of these Cambodian children. In consultation with the Congress, we will be working with the Thai and with various international organizations, and with the Cambodians themselves, to devise a program to repsond to this important need.

Completing resettlement processing for Cambodian refugees

The United States has been in the forefront of the effort to resettle qualified refugees from the population of Cambodians in UNHCR camps in Thailand. The approval rate for Cambodian refugees seeking resettlement in the United States has been over 90 per cent, one of the highest for any group of refugees. Since the beginning of Cambodian resettlement processing in 1975 the United States has taken 125,000 and other countries have resettled about 65,000. This is a record of which we can all be proud.

Recently, public and Congressional interest has been focused on the processing of remaining Cambodian refugees in Thailand for resettlement in the United States. The Subcommittee on Asian and Pacific Affairs of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs held a hearing on July 31 at which this subject received a thorough review. It should be clear to all concerned that the objective of the U.S. refugee program remains the fairest possible consideration of all applicants for refugee admission. However, where there are indications that a refugee applicant has participated in the persecution of others, he cannot — under U.S. law — be granted refugee status, unless he can prove that he has not participated in such activities. Determining whether or not someone engaged in the persecution of others during the period of Khmer Rouge atrocities in Cambodia is a difficult and time-consuming task. I believe that the U.S. Immigration Service, working closely with the Department of State and the concerned voluntary agency representatives, has reviewed the denied cases in a just and reasonable manner. The established review mechanism, which was formalized last February, remains in place to reconsider denied cases.

Refugee admissions from other regions

Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee, although we extend a strong and helping hand toward the refugees of Southeast Asia, we must not forget the needs of the millions of refugees in other regions of the world. In most cases these refugees do not require third country resettlement. They are being given long-term asylum in Pakistan, throughout Africa and in Central America. Our goal and the goal of the High Commissioner for Refugees is to assist these people to maintain themselves until they can return safely to their home countries. A certain number of them will continue to require resettlement in the United States, and we have made provision for their admission to this country in our proposed admissions ceilings for fiscal year 1986.

I would like to note in particular the need to address refugee admissions backlogs of Eastern Europeans, Iranians and Afghans. Our goal in the Near East is to continue to provide resettlement opportunities in the U.S. for those refugees with close ties to this country and for those of special concern, such as members of the persecuted Iranian religious minorities. We plan to continue to provide resettlement for a fair share of Eastern European refugees, who flee to Western Europe. Hopefully, the proposed ceilings will reduce the waiting time for these applicants.

Despite recent fluctuations in departure rates in recent months, there does not appear to have been any basic change in the Soviet policy of restricting emigration. As in past years, I will reiterate to the Soviet Foreign Minister when I meet with him later this month that the Soviet Union has an obligation, undertaken when it signed the Helsinki Accords, to permit those who wish to join their families abroad to do so.

As already mentioned in the discussion of our contingency plan to transfer unused numbers from the Latin American admissions ceiling to other regions in Fiscal Year 1986, the United States remains ready to reactivate the U.S.-Cuban Migration Agreement on short notice. When Fidel Castro suspended the agreement in May, some 1,800 ex-political prisoners and accompanying family members had been tentatively approved for refugee status. Our goal is to bring these and other former prisoners to the United States, along with their families. We hope that Castro will soon decide to drop his unilateral suspension of the migration agreement, making possible a continuation of our program for ex-political prisoners in Cuba.

Providing adequate funding for the refugee program

Refugees are an international responsibility, but traditionally the United States has been the leader in rallying support for assistance to the burgeoning world refugee population. Working through the UNHCR, the International Committee of the Red Cross and other organizations, the United States has made protection of those fleeing oppression a key component of its foreign policy. By assisting the persecuted we demonstrate our own attachment to the values of freedom and human dignity. It would be a severe blow to these values if, due to well-meant but misguided attempts to save money, the Congress sustained the large cuts in refugee program funding proposed by the House Appropriations Committee in July. These cuts—amounting to $45 million from an Administrative request of $338 million—when combined with $9 million in earmarks added by the Congress, would leave insufficient funds to operate a viable, worldwide refugee program.

At the funding level currently being proposed by the House Appropriations Committee, we would have to drastically reduce refugee admissions in fiscal year 1986. A sudden drop, from the fiscal year 1985 level of 70,000 admissions, would seriously threaten the preservation of first asylum for refugees in Southeast Asia and elsewhere in the world.

Similarly, the funds available for relief and assistance would be inadequate to maintain subsistence and survival for thousands of refugees in Southeast Asia, the Middle East, Pakistan and Latin America. Our African relief efforts would also be affected adversely.

All of us recognize the need to restrain expenditures in the coming years, but our foreign policy interests and humanitarian concern for refugees at home and abroad cannot be carried out if these budget cuts are sustained. The President's FY 1986 request for refugee programs already reflected the need for budget restraint.

CONCLUSION

In the twelve months since I last appeared before this Committee we have accomplished much on behalf of refugees. The President's initiatives in favor of Amerasian children and political prisoners in Vietnam remain at the top of our agenda of unfinished business. We will continue to pursue a solution to the other persistent and difficult refugee problems in Southeast Asia. In close consultation with Congress and our allies, we will examine new approaches to dealing with these problems. With the cooperation of the Congress, we will maintain our commitment to those refugees in need of life-sustaining assistance in Africa, Asia and Latin America. We must not forget that the great majority of refugees today are found in the poorest countries of the world and can only be helped through international efforts. With the support of Congress and the American people, we will keep our doors open to refugees of special concern who suffer persecution at the hands of tyrannical governments and for whom there are not effective and humane alternatives.

The cost of our refugee programs is small compared to the vast needs that they must address. To those of you on this Committee and to your colleagues elsewhere in the Congress who have given your active support to the President's refugee assistance budget request, I express my appreciation. This is a truly a non-partisan program and one that deserves your strong support.

Thank you.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, DC, September 23, 1985.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House,
Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: We have completed the consultative process mandated by P.L. 96-212, the Refugee Act of 1980, with regard to refugee admissions and allocations for FY 1986 as recommended by you in your memorandum dated September 10, 1985 to Ambassador H. Eugene Douglas, U.S. Coordinator for Refugee Affairs.

The proposal, as transmitted to us on the same date, provides for a ceiling of 70,000 refugees allocated as follows: 48,500 for East Asia; 9,500 for the Soviet Union/Eastern Europe; 6,000 for the Near East/South Asia; 3,000 for Africa and 3,000 for Latin America/Caribbean; and an additional 5,000 refugee admission numbers which shall be made available for the adjustment to permanent residence of certain qualified aliens.

We are pleased to advise you that we interpose no objections to the number and allocations as recommended.

We believe, however, that no reallocation of refugee numbers between regions should take place during the fiscal year without notifying the Committee on the Judiciary sufficiently in advance to permit an expression of an opinion should it be deemed advisable.

We are concerned about two financial aspects of the FY 1986 refugee admissions program: one, the proposed action to be taken (contrary to the position of the House of Representatives) regarding the Matching Grant Program administered by the Office of Refugee Resettlement of the Department of Health and Human Services; and two, the effect of the Appropriations Committee's action in cutting $45 million from the refugee resettlement program.

We urge that the reductions (per capita and total funding) in the Matching Grant Program as proposed by the Administration be suspended until completion of Congressional consideration of the refugee reauthorization legislation. The Judiciary Committee and the full House of Representatives have recognized the importance of this program and, as a result, recently recommended against any funding reduction (Sec. 7 of H.R. 1452, as passed by the House of Representatives on June 13, 1985).

With regard to the overall budget, we believe it is incumbent upon the Administration to take all necessary action to provide adequate funds to finance the refugee admissions program ultimately decided upon by you in consultation with the Congress. If adequate funding is not available through the regular appropriations process and if the reprogramming of funds is not a viable alternative, we would expect the Administration to submit to the Congress a supplemental budget request for any additional appropriations which may be necessary to fund the refugee admissions program which you determine for FY 1986.

As in the past, the Committee would appreciate being kept informed on a monthly basis with regard to the progress of the FY 1986 refugee admissions program.

We wish to convey our thanks to Secretary of State Shultz, the U.S. Coordinator for Refugees and the representatives of the Departments of State, Justice and Health and Human Services for their cooperation and assistance in this consultative process.

Sincerely,

HAMILTON FISH, Jr.,
Ranking Minority Member, Committee on the Judiciary.

PETER W. RODINO, Jr.,
Chairman, Committee on the Judiciary.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, DC, September 27, 1985.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House,
Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: This is to advise you of several of my deep concerns relating to the Administration's refugee admissions' proposal which was presented to the consultative members of the Committee on the Judiciary by the Secretary of State on September 19, 1985.

First of all, I do not believe the proposed 70,000 refugee numbers is consistent with the Administration's previously stated objective of "managing down" the Indochinese refugee program. Since the refugee situation in Indochina has not worsened over the past year and in view of the fact that the countries in the region are following a humane first asylum policy, I see no valid reason why admissions cannot be reduced for Fiscal Year 1986.

Second, there is a likelihood that the House will follow the lead of its Appropriations Committee and reduce the funding level for the refugee program. We were told that such an action could have the effect of reducing the refugee admissions' level to 53,000. I am not wedded to an admissions number, but 53,000 may be an appropriate admissions level in light of possible funding cuts and in light of the fact that many domestic programs for poor and underprivileged Americans have recently suffered drastic budget cuts.

As you know, I fought hard to maintain the Judiciary Committee's recommended funding for the domestic resettlement program during House floor consideration of the Refugee Reauthorization legislation. My efforts were unsuccessful. The recommendations of my Subcommittee which had been accepted by the full Judiciary Committee were flatly rejected by our colleagues. This underscores the need to deal realistically in setting admissions levels with likely funding reductions.

The United States should not admit any more refugees for resettlement than it is willing to properly finance. Accordingly, and in further light of the Administration's decision to terminate targeted assistance to communities heavily impacted by refugee admissions, I think the admissions numbers should be reduced.

Third, Mr. President, the State Department has failed to commit the necessary personnel and resources to monitoring the use of the millions of dollars it grants to the voluntary agencies to resettle refugees. I have brought this often to the attention of the Secretary of State, but I do not sense he shares my concerns in this regard. I continue to believe strongly that a greater commitment must be made to ensuring that the taxpayer is getting the most "bounce for the buck" in the cooperative agreements.

Fourth, the Departments of State and Health and Human Services should make every effort to expand the role of Mutual Assistance Associations (MAA's) in the resettlement process. A refugee's own countrymen and women, who have made the tough journey from refugee to productive U.S. citizen are often in the very best position to help that individual enter the mainstream promptly and with as little trauma as possible.

The House Refugee Reauthorization bill recognizes that MAA's are underutilized, and I would urge the Administration to take concrete steps to achieve a greater use of this resource administratively without awaiting Congressional passage of the Refugee bill.

Fifth, I am concerned that the State Department has not sufficiently pursued in Southeast Asia the preferred response to refugee problems, that is, voluntary repatriation. I do not feel the U.S. has actively pressed the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) to intensify its efforts to voluntarily repatriate refugees back to Vietnam, particularly unaccompanied minors in closed camps in Hong Kong. Nor, have we adequately pressed the Thai Government, the Laotian Government, and the UNHCR on the question of returning Laotians to Laos who are determined not to be refugees after requisite screening. Unless these matters are addressed in an urgent fashion, I am convinced that a broad use of voluntary repatriation in suitable cases will never get off the ground.

Sixth, the second preferred approach to refugee problems—local settlement, i.e. allowing refugees to remain permanently in the country in which they sought asylum—has not been vigorously pursued by the State Department in Thailand. For many years the Committee has been told that "now is not the time to raise the issue" of local settlement of Laotian highlanders in Thailand. I think, instead, Mr. President, that the time has come to raise the issue with the Thai Government contemporaneously with announcing the refugee admission numbers for 1986. In addition to local settlement, U.S. officials should continue to press with Thai officials the sea piracy issue prior to committing our Government to resettling a specific number of refugees from Thailand.

Seventh, the fact that some 23,000 persons are already in the refugee pipeline makes the Executive-Legislative consultation process less a consultation than a cut-and-dried notice. To the extent that the U.S. has placed refugees in a Refugee Processing Center (like Bataan) the U.S. has agreed to admit the refugees. So in future years, I hope the Administration could note clearly and in a separate category the refugees in the "pipeline". Presented this way in the Administration's consultation documents, the Committee will be able to more accurately reach its decisions on refugee admission recommendations.

Finally, but certainly not the least important, is my serious concern that our admissions program is tilted too heavily toward Indochinese refugees. I believe we must have a better regional and nationality balance in our program. The Refugee Act of 1980 was intended to eliminate ideology and geography as the controlling factors in our refugee admissions program. We seem not to have accomplished this most important objective and a more balanced program would certainly be a step in the right direction.

I appreciate this opportunity to share with you my views and concerns on your admissions proposal and on the refugee program in general. I believe we have made great strides since the enactment of the Refugee Act and I look forward to discussing these matters further with your representatives in the Department of State, Justice and Health and Human Services.

Sincerely,

ROMANO L. MAZZOLI,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Immigration, Refugees and International Law.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, DC, September 30, 1985.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House,
Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I am pleased to have been able to participate in the consultative process mandated by P.L. 96-212, the Refugee Act of 1980, with respect to refugee admissions and allocations for fiscal year 1986. While I am in general agreement with the Chairman of the Committee, Mr. Rodino, and the Ranking Minority Member, Mr. Fish, I do wish to make a couple of personal observations, some of which I brought up during the course of our meeting with Secretary of State George Shultz on September 19.

As the Ranking Republican on the Subcommittee on Immigration, Refugees, and International Law, I am sensitive to the need for the United States to assume a leadership role in the resettlement of refugees. But, as the consultative report correctly noted, we already carry the bulk of the responsibility for the support and resettlement of refugees worldwide. In recent years, we have been particularly generous.

Funds, though, are finite, and while I support and endorse the Administration's recommended ceiling of 70,000, I would hope that the necessary funding level could be achieved in ways other than enhanced Federal expenditures. For example, I mentioned to Secretary Shultz the possibility of reprogramming funds in such a way as to make up the difference between the Administration's request and the amount likely to be appropriated by the Congress. I think, too, that we should consider approaching allies, such as Japan, who, for internal political reasons, decline to resettle significant numbers of refugees. If such nations prefer not to accept their fair share of refugees, they should be willing to contribute to the expenses of those who do.

Lastly, I also want to emphasize, as I have in the past, the urgent need for effective and accelerated English training. Perhaps if there were more of an emphasis on such training in camps outside the United States, time there could be reduced and funds could be saved. If we are to reduce refugee welfare dependency, which is unacceptably high in our home State of California, then we must stress English training.

I join with my colleagues in expressing the hope that the Committee will be kept informed with regard to the process of the FY 1986 refugee admissions program, and I wish to express my appreciation to you and to your Administration for your help and cooperation throughout the consultative process.

Sincerely,

DANIEL E. LUNGREN,
Ranking Minority Member, Subcommittee on Immigration, Refugees and International Law.

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, DC, September 30, 1985.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House,
Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: The Committee on the Judiciary has now concluded its consultations with your representatives on the proposed refugee admissions for fiscal year 1985. We submit to you our response as the chairmen of the full Committee and of the Subcommittee on Immigration and Refugee Policy, respectively, on the proposed numbers of refugee admissions, together with our recommendations regarding the U.S. refugee program.

First, we do share your deep concern about the plight of refugees around the world, particularly those who are of "special humanitarian concern" to the United States. We also share your commitment to support the humanitarian traditions and programs of our nation to assist refugees and to provide resettlement opportunities to those in particular need.

However, we note that, for the first time since the Refugee Act of 1980 became law, the proposed admissions level has not been reduced. It would appear that the sustained high flow of refugees from Southeast Asia is becoming "institutionalized."

Since 1981 the State Department has assured the Congress, during the annual consultations, that the Southeast Asian refugee "emergency" was nearly over and with but another year or two of high admissions numbers, the problem could be described as "managed." Nonetheless, refugee admissions from Southeast Asia have continued at a high rate, and the proposed levels for fiscal year 1985 now continue that trend. Because the "emergency" is over, we believe it is important to continue a steady and meaningful reduction in Southeast Asian admissions. We do not consider a three percent reduction as being "meaningful."

Personal field investigations of refugee processing areas in Southeast Asia by the Subcommittee chairman, as well as other information available to the Committee, including evidence presented to the Committee by both refugee officials and members of the private sector involved in our refugee program, lead us to believe that the numbers proposed by the Administration can, and should be, appropriately reduced. Accordingly, we recommend that the refugee admissions' ceiling for 1986 be set at 60,000, a reduction of 10,000 from that proposed by the Administration.

We believe this reduction should be made in the proposed admissions from East Asia for the following reasons:

(1) There are few people remaining in Thailand who qualify as refugees of "special interest" to the United States. While there are several thousand Lao in Thailand, both Highlanders and Lowlanders, who do have a claim to refugee status in the United States as a result of their previous association with us, this group probably does not exceed 5,000 persons. We have nearly completed the processing of Khmer refugees and few, if any, numbers are required to conclude that large resettlement program. We must now resist the clear temptation to continue to consider third country resettlement as being the "only alternative" available for persons leaving their homelands in Southeast Asia. Refugees in the United States with family members in Southeast Asia must now begin to use our regular immigration laws in order to achieve family reunification.

(2) The Vietnamese Orderly Departure Program (ODP) does not warrant the admission levels proposed by the Administration. We recommend a most careful review and restructure of that program and a redefining of its purpose, and its accomplishments. In 1984, the Committee responded to the Administration's ODP proposals with the caveat: "We assume that these new Orderly Departure initiatives will contain controls sufficient to insure that the program will meet our American objectives rather than primarily those of the sending state." We believe the present program does not contain such controls.

Further, when Congress passed legislation—which we both worked hard to achieve—in 1982 providing special immigration procedures for Amerasian children, it did in no way contemplate that this legislation would result in admission of two family members—each taking a refugee number—for each Amerasian child. We do have a very "special interest" in certain Amerasians who need the care, support and new life they can receive only in America—but it is surely not at all as clear that we have a special interest in bringing all Amerasians and their families to the United States as refugees under ODP. They were given a different status under the legislation.

Until procedures can be negotiated with the Vietnamese authorities assuring that a majority of the people coming to the United States under the ODP are of special interest to us, such as prisoners in the "re-education camps," as opposed to those who the Vietnamese Government has only a "special interest" in expelling from their country, then our participation in the program should be reduced.

While recommending a level of refugee admissions which we believe more accurately reflects the existing international refugee situation, particularly that in East Asia, we state clearly that we stand ready to alertly respond—speedily, fully and effectively—in providing additional resettlement opportunities under the emergency provisions of the Refugee Act in the event of any unforeseen needs or developments. Without a very reasonable level of refugee admissions in times of no emergency, the American public may well be unwilling to respond generously when a time of emergency arises. We certainly wish to avoid this possibility.

Finally, we recommend a reduction in the admissions ceiling of only 10,000 acknowledging that there are a significant number of refugees in the East Asian "pipeline" at the end of the fiscal year, some 17,000 persons; however, we fully expect that a more significant reduction may be achieved in the next fiscal year when the "pipeline" numbers should be much reduced. The expressed intent of the Refugee Act is that overall refugee admissions will be maintained as closely as possible to the "normal flow" figure of 50,000. That is the number set by P.L. 96-212. We must also be certain to take into account the number of persons now being granted asylum in the United States—more than 10,000 in the last fiscal year. These, too, are refugees, and must be fully considered as we consult on refugee admissions.

Mr. President, we express our continued support of your efforts to join with others in the international community in response to the humanitarian needs of refugees—both political and those resulting from natural disasters.

With best personal regards,

Most sincerely,

STROM THURMOND,
Chairman, Committee on the Judiciary.
ALAN K. SIMPSON,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Immigration and Refugee Policy.

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, DC, September 30, 1985.

THE PRESIDENT,
The White House,
Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: The Committee on the Judiciary has concluded its hearings and consultations with your representatives on the admission of refugees to the United States for fiscal year 1986. As the ranking minority members of the full Committee and the Subcommittee on Immigration and Refugee Policy, respectively, we want to indicate strong support for your proposal to continue the refugee ceiling at 70,000 for another year.

We share your view that conditions in the field, particularly in Southeast Asia, justify maintaining a generous refugee admissions policy. Although we clearly support new initiatives to deal with the continuing flow of Southeast Asians—including voluntary repatriation and local settlement—we recognize that third country resettlement remains the only alternative for many refugees, particularly those with strong family or other ties to the United States. We also support the ear-marking of numbers for the Orderly Departure Program, and for the new efforts that have been announced to deal with Khmer refugees along the Thai border.

Although we agree that the regional allocation of refugee admission numbers proposed by the Department of State generally reflects the needs in the field, we wish to express concern, however, over the reduced numbers for Central and Latin America. Given the continuing conflict and persecution in many countries in the region, including Guatemala, El Salvador and Nicaragua, it seems to us that more than only a handful of refugees from these areas would be deemed of special humanitarian concern to the United States. Yet, despite a ceiling last year of 1,000 for Central and Latin America (down from 3,000 the year before), only 57 refugees have been admitted as of last month—and all of these were from Cuba. This is in sharp contrast to Canada and Australia who, together, admitted over 3,000 refugees from this region last year. We hope that during the coming year the Department of State will be far more vigilant and flexible in reviewing refugee cases in Central America.

Again, Mr. President, we wish to commend you for again proposing a generous refugee admissions program—a program which continues one of our Nation's proudest traditions of welcoming the homeless to our shores, even as we assist millions more overseas. If during the course of the coming year conditions in the field change and additional resettlement numbers are needed—as many in America's voluntary and church agencies believe will be the case—we hope you will utilize the emergency provisions of The Refugee Act of 1980 to respond to those needs.

With best wishes,

Sincerely,

EDWARD M. KENNEDY,
Ranking Minority Member, Subcommittee on Immigration and Refugee Policy.
JOSEPH R. BIDEN, Jr.,
Ranking Minority Member.

U.S. COORDINATOR FOR REFUGEE AFFAIRS,
Washington, DC, October 18, 1985.

Hon. ALAN K. SIMPSON,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Immigration Refugee Policy, U.S. Senate.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: In accordance with the provisions of the Refugee Act of 1980 and after consulting with the Congress, the President has established the refugee ceiling for Fiscal Year 1986.

I have the honor of transmitting a copy of the Presidential Determination dated October 16, 1985.

Sincerely,

H. EUGENE DOUGLAS,
Ambassador at Large.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, October 16, 1985.

Presidential Determination No. 85-21.

Memorandum for Hon. H. Eugene Douglas, U.S. Coordinator for Refugee Affairs.

Subject: Fiscal year 1986 refugee ceilings.

In accordance with the relevant statutes and after appropriate consultations with the Congress, I have determined that:

The admission of up to 67,000 refugees to the United States during fiscal year 1986 is justified by humanitarian concerns or is otherwise in the national interest;

The 67,000 worldwide refugee admission ceiling shall be allocated among the regions of the world as follows: 37,000 for first asylum from East Asia and 8,500 for the East Asian Orderly Departure Program; 9,500 for Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union; 6,000 for the Near East and South Asia; 3,000 for Africa; and 3,000 for Latin America and the Caribbean.

An additional 5,000 refugee admissions numbers shall be made available for the adjustment to permanent resident status of aliens who have been granted asylum in the United States, as this is justified by humanitarian concerns or is otherwise in the national interest.

In accordance with provisions of the Immigration and Nationality Act and after appropriate consultations with the Congress, I specify that special circumstances exist such that, for the purposes of admission under the limits established above, the following persons, if they otherwise qualify for admission, may be considered refugees of special humanitarian concern to the United States even though they are still within their countries of nationality or habitual residence:

Persons in Vietnam with past or present ties to the United States, including Amerasian children; and Present and former political prisoners, and persons in imminent danger of loss of life, and their family members, in countries of Latin America and the Caribbean.

This determination shall be transmitted to Congress immediately and shall be published in the Federal Register.

RONALD REAGAN.

RICH MAN'S TAX

Mr. MATTINGLY. Mr. President, as the liberal cry for revenue enhancement, fees, or some other newly coined word for a tax increase is discussed, I recommend for my colleagues the following article from the Wall Street Journal of January 28, 1986, which I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RICH MAN'S TAX

We are beginning to lose track of the number of commentators and editorialists calling for a big tax on gasoline. The last fellow we heard on the subject was demanding the immediate imposition of a 50-cents-a-gallon tax. Nothing would serve this country's interests more, the argument goes, than that we should all start paying $1.80 for a gallon of gas.

Many claims are made for the gas tax. Among the pains its prescribers promise to relieve are the deficit, the Arabs, commuters who clog the bridges across the Potomac, and congestion at 42nd and Broadway. Two questions:

First, can anyone find 10 people outside Washington, Manhattan or Chrysler's headquarters who actually want to start paying another 50 cents for their gas? More important, can anyone find a single politician south of the Hudson River who would propose such a thing to his or her constituents?

Let's look at the numbers on how America drives. According to Hertz, the average passenger vehicle used 549 gallons in 1984. The American Automobile Association's latest survey puts the cost of regular unleaded gas at full-service pumps at $1.37 a gallon. Combining those figures produces an annual gasoline bill of about $752. Now add a new 50-cent tax and your bill rises to about $1,027, a one-year increase of about $275.

With that $275 figure in hand, it is possible to divide up the political world. In one group are people who say, "$275 won't hurt anyone." In the other group are people who say, "What!" Only people who live in the first group could propose such a tax.

The people in the first group are the kind of folks who have no clear idea from one week to the next whether gas costs $1.15 a gallon or $1.65 a gallon. Their idea of a small, fuel-efficient car is either a Subaru or a Mercedes 190. Buying gas is pulling up to the pump and handing something out the window that pays for it.

The people in the second group have two family cars that are in constant use. One is usually a station wagon full of small people. They know that the cost of filling a 15-gallon tank with $1.37 gas is about $20. And when the kid pumps the same amount of $1.87 gas into the tank and says that'll be $28, their eyes are going to pop out of their heads. They know that the tax's $550 hit on two cars will come out of the family budget. The last person who made people feel this bad at the gas pump was Jimmy Carter.

Many current advocates of jacking up gas taxes, however, make Jimmy Carter look like the angel of mercy. First, they'll say that with oil prices falling, the impact of higher gasoline taxes will be "lessened." And that means "we" can absorb other new taxes, too. They want: a $12-per-gallon fee on imported oil, or a tax increase included in the current income tax reform bill, or a national 5 percent value-added tax.

The advocates of these taxes believe that Congress just can't realistically be expected to make further significant cuts in its $950 billion budget. And so they think that their call for high, indirect taxes on people who already pay taxes is pragmatic and moderate. But there is no avoiding the fact that the gasoline tax, like these other extraordinarily regressive levies, is a rich man's tax. Only he won't much care when it's passed into law or when he pays it. For everyone else, each trip to the gas station will be a reminder that Washington has irresponsibly dumped its problems on them. Again.

CONTINUING TRADE CRISIS WITH JAPAN

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, earlier this month this Senator commented on the continuing trade crisis with Japan, noting the extraordinary escalation in our trade imbalance and the failure of the Japanese to seriously address the issue.

The fact is, the trade deficit has continued to widen and most of the unfair barriers to fair trade with Japan remain in place. Today we have learned that in December we set a new record for a single month trade deficit with Japan of $5.5 billion. In fact, in the trade report issued today, Japan accounted for roughly one-third of the overall trade deficit. Imports from Japan exceeded exports by $49.7 billion in 1985, up from $37 billion the year before.

In December we experienced the single largest monthly trade deficit in our history—$17.4 billion—a whopping 27-percent increase over September, which had held the dubious distinction of being the highest in history.

Our total trade deficit for 1985 is now estimated at $148.5 billion, a substantial increase over the 1984 trade deficit of $123 billion.

Mr. President, although no one trading partner is to blame for this enormous increase in the trade deficit, once again, Japan accounts for a significant part of the problem. In 1985, the United States trade deficit with Japan will total $49.7 billion. It is a figure, I believe, cannot be sustained.

Before we adjourned in December, I addressed the Senate with my concerns about the continuing trade crisis with Japan. Today's dismal numbers only serve to buttress my disappointment with the timid progress that is being made toward closing the trade gap between our two countries.

Last summer, after I visited Japan with several of my colleagues, and after the Japanese had announced its so-called "action program," I had a sense of optimism. I thought that perhaps we were beginning, albeit slowly, to turn the corner—that the Japanese finally understood the severity of the situation and were willing to move forcefully to rectify it.

But the fact is, despite some recent indications from Prime Minister Nakasone that he and his Government recognize the problem has not eased, and despite actions to lower the value of the dollar in terms of the yen, the trade deficit continues to worsen.

Japan, however, is not the only country where we have increasing trade difficulties. The trade deficit with Western Europe was $27.4 billion in 1985; $22.2 billion with Canada, $13.1 billion with Taiwan, and $11.6 billion with the members of OPEC. In each case, those levels are much too high.

These horrendous figures, which threaten our economic well-being and cause individual hardship to the men and women who have lost and continue to lose their jobs, are further motivation for action in Congress.

In November, a bipartisan group of Senators introduced legislation that addressed a broad range of trade issues and attempted to beef up the means to strike down barriers to U.S. exports by enhancing retaliatory authority and establishing time limits for action by the Federal Government.

I intend to ask Senate Finance Committee Chairman PACKWOOD, and Senator DANFORTH, chairman of the Trade Subcommittee, to schedule hearings on S. 1860 at the earliest possible time.

Already on the Senate's calendar, however, are two bills dealing with Japan and trade. The Japanese unfair trade practice bill, would require the President to take all action necessary to eliminate Japanese trade barriers to United States goods or to offset the effects of trade barriers between the United States and Japan.

Another bill, S. 942, the "telecommunications bill," would require negotiating agreements to gain opportunities in foreign markets that are almost equivalent to opportunities available in U.S. markets for telecommunications products and services.

Mr. President, the trade deficit crisis has reached proportions that compel us to act. We can no longer ignore the damage that the burgeoning disparity between what we import and what we export has on our country and the lives of our people. I am prepared to call up these bills as soon as the calendar allows.

Approval of these bills is no cure-all. Our ultimate goal is free trade and legislation alone can not create that. But we can take steps to create more open, and accessible markets, through legislative means and continuing dialog with the Japanese and our other trading partners.

THE HARD ROAD TO PROGRESS IN NORTHERN IRELAND

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, 10 weeks ago the Governments of Ireland and the United Kingdom entered into a remarkable agreement pertaining to the future of Northern Ireland. In essence, the Anglo-Irish pact granted Dublin a consultative role in decisions affecting the North in exchange for a joint affirmation of the principle that no change will occur in the North's status without consent from a majority of its people. In so addressing the aspirations of the North's Catholic minority while reassuring Ulster's Prostestant majority, the accord embodied the essence of wisdom and statesmanship.

Regrettably, such qualities have not been apparent in the response of Ulster's Unionist leaders. Last week, the two Unionist parties, having denounced the agreement, contested the issue in a by-election they had precipitated by a mass resignation from the British Parliament. Fortunately, the election results demonstrated only limited public support for such obstructionism, as the Unionists actually lost 1 of their 15 seats. But while Irish, British, and Ulster moderates can take some encouragement from this outcome, the task of shaping a peaceful and just future for Northern Ireland clearly remains an enormous challenge.

Yesterday, two thoughtful contributions to public discussion of this contentious issue appeared in editorials in the Wall Street Journal and the New York Times, which I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Wall Street Journal, Jan. 29, 1986]

WILL ULSTER BE RIGHT?

Northern Ireland's two Unionist parties took their combined campaign against the Nov. 15 Anglo-Irish pact to the polls last week, running on a single platform: "Ulster Says No." These by-elections were sparked by the mass resignation of Ulster's 15 Unionist members of the British Parliament. They aimed for a de facto Northern Irish referendum on the accord. In the process, however, they lost one seat and exceeded their tally in the 1983 general elections by a scant 2,264 votes.

That Ulster's Unionists would say "no" to the accord came as no surprise. They have historically said no to every agreement that would give the Nationalist minority any say in running the province. The encouraging surprise was that a significant number of the Nationalist community said "yes" to the accord and a resounding "no" to the pro-violence political wing of the Irish Republican Army, Sinn Fein. The big gainer was John Hume, leader of the moderate Social and Democratic Labor Party, who had rejected a Sinn Fein offer of a political pact against the Unionists. His party's Seamus Mallon took away the one Unionist seat and some 12,000 votes from Sinn Fein. The final percentage breakdowns tell this story: combined Unionist, up 0.5%; SDLP,up 19%; Sinn Fein, down 24%.

What the next step is for the Unionists is hard to say. One of the victorious Protestant candidates. Harold McCusker, certainly did not soothe fears of a general strike or a refusal to pay taxes. "We have a mandate to withdraw the consent of our people to be governed, and that is what we shall be doing in the province," he was quoted as saying after the results were in. One possibility is a withdrawal from Westminister Parliament. This, ironically, would put the Unionist on the same level as Sinn Fein, which also refuses to be seated at Westminister.

Certainly the hostility with which the Anglo-Irish pact is held by the Unionist majority means that Unionist fears must be dealt with. At the same time, Unionists ought to take a closer look at the deal they are so busy denouncing as betrayal. In addition to promising stronger steps against the IRA, this deal also elicits Dublin's formal recognition that Northern Ireland will remain British so long as that is the preference of the majority there. This is hardly evidence of "betrayal."

Indeed, Unionist demonstrations against the Thatcher government are curious coming from a part of the United Kingdom that has always described itself as "loyalist." As the Unionists' threats to make their province ungovernable demonstrate, this loyalty is one-sided. Northern Ireland today is heavily subsidized by the British taxpayers, who fork over millions in defense and welfare payments and are growing weary of Unionist intransigence. Any true referendum on the Thatcher-FitzGerald accord would have to solicit their opinion as well.

The framers of the Anglo-Irish accord had two main aims: to siphon off Nationalist support for the IRA and to get Unionist politicians to share power in return for guarantees of their security. Clearly Thursday's by-elections show success for the former. It is now the Unionists' turn. Those who think they can make Margaret Thatcher crack with threats of civil disobedience and paramilitary activity ought to take a look at what happened when mainland miners went that route.

[From the New York Times, Jan. 29, 1986]

THE IRISH ACCORD HOLDS

Last week's election in Northern Ireland failed to scuttle the new British-Irish accord to seek a progressive resolution of the province's communal strife. It gave diehard Protestants the photo opportunity they craved—a chance to wave placards insisting that "Ulster Says No!" That was the intent of the 15 Unionist members of Britain's Parliament whose resignations forced the vote. The re-election of all but one only confirmed the reflexive parochialism of a community still trapped in the religious wars of the Reformation.

The Unionists' main grievance is that they were not a party to the agreement between Prime Minister Thatcher and Prime Minister Garret FitzGerald of Ireland. That is half true. The province's one million Protestants are British subjects who tirelessly defend majority rights—but only in Northern Ireland. The Parliament in which they sit gives overwhelming approval to the pact but they verge close to rebellion and compete in reviling their Government.

What they really oppose is the limited role the accord gives Ireland in addressing the grievances of Ulster's 600,000 Catholics. What they overlook is the provision that binds the Irish Republic to respect the North's right to remain British, so long as its majority desires.

There has been a surge of support for the agreement in Ireland and Britain. It has been endorsed unanimously by the U.S. Senate, with but a single dissent by the House, and by a 150-28 vote in the European Parliament.

The agreement has been a boon for Catholics who oppose violence and a setback for their rivals in the Irish Republican Army. The Social Democratic and Labor Party, which supports the agreement, increased its share of the Ulster vote by 20 percent and won one of the four seats it contested. That gain came at the expense of Sinn Fein, the I.R.A.'s political front, whose share fell by a fourth.

The Unionists predicted they would win 500,000 votes but could muster only 418,000. A consensus for sanity is beginning to develop in the troubled North. It deserves a chance to grow.

TRIBUTE TO A GREAT MAYOR

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. President, one of the uniquely great mayors in America, Chet Reitan, has announced his retirement. He has been a good friend of mine, as he has of so many people across our State, but particularly of the citizens of the "Magic City" he has served so well. Fortunately, even though he is retiring as mayor, Chet will continue to serve them in our State senate.

His hometown paper, the Minot Daily News, carried an editorial today that is one of the most uniquely deserved tributes I have ever seen given to a public official.

I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TRIBUTE TO A GREAT MAYOR

The 14-year performance of Chester Reiten as mayor of Minot will be a very hard act to follow. Well, "act" isn't quite the right word. It hardly covers 14 years of leading, inspiring, pushing, working, planning, pleading, inventing, expanding, lobbying and personally investing in the city he loves so dearly and has tried so hard to make flourish.

He has had an almost unbelievable talent for putting the finger on the right person to do the job that needed to be done and a gift for making the one selected feel honored at working days, weeks, and even months without pay for the good of the cause.

All with the help of his co-workers, of course, he seems to have succeeded in resolving the city's biggest problem, flood control; in bringing many new businesses into the city; in expanding facilities for handling tournaments, conventions fair visitors, and his own creation, the Hostfest, bringing throngs from a number of states and even abroad; in successfully coping with federal policy changes that would have been cirpping, if not fatal, to Minot's two hospitals; in keeping city government responsive to growth, service and in solid financial standing.

Few events of any consequence escaped the arrival of our omnipresent mayor, coming with an extended hand of friendship, a speech in his pocket or a ribbon-cutting pair of shears.

He answered his phone calls and his letters, never stayed out of touch to any who sought his attention to cope with city problems or worthy causes. He worried with answer-seeking committees, pacing the floor while listening to the reasoning. He sparred for answers. His face was a barometer of the way things were going.

While all this was occupying his time he managed to expand his own enterprise from part ownership of one television station and an AM radio station to network of TV stations at Minot, Bismarck, Williston and Dickinson as well as adding an FM radio station at Minot.

Now that he's leaving the job most of his constituents are agreed he has been the finest mayor Minot has had. Those who don't agree he was the finest, admit he was the hardest working.

He plans to continue serving his city and state as a state senator. That's a good deal easier than being mayor, Reiten points out. It certainly is if you go by the job description he outlined for himself as Minot's No. 1 citizen. Mange takk, Chet.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DANFORTH). Without objection, it is so ordered.

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GORTON). Morning business is closed.

CONRAIL SALE AMENDMENTS ACT OF 1985

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the pending business.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 638) to amend the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 to provide for the transfer of ownership of the Consolidated Rail Corporation to the private sector, and for other purposes.

The Senate resumed consideration of the bill.

AMENDMENT NO. 1567 TO AMENDMENT NO. 1437

(Purpose: To provide for judicial antitrust review and to remove antitrust factions from the exclusive jurisdiction of the Special Court)

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois is recognized.

SALE OF CONRAIL TO NORFOLK SOUTHERN SHOULD BE SUBJECT TO THE ANTITRUST LAWS

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, this amendment, which I am offering together with my distinguished colleagues, Senators PRESSLER, ANDREWS, EXON, HEINZ, ROCKEFELLER, SIMON, SPECTER, and ZORINSKY, is simple and straightforward. It makes the proposed sale of Conrail to the Norfolk Southern Railroad, as recommended by the Secretary of Transportation and contained in S. 638, subject to the antitrust laws, including the Clayton Act. The amendment would not delay consummation of the sale.

I want to stress for those who may be listening in their office. It would continue the current exemption in the Northeast Rail Service Act barring the Interstate Commerce Commission from reviewing the sale. The result of enactment of this amendment would be to allow shippers, railroads, ports, and other interested parties that are adversely affected by the creation of a Norfolk Southern-Conrail monopoly to file suit in Federal court—not the special court created to handle the valuation of the bankrupt railroads that were Conrail's predecessors—on antitrust grounds. The courts, if they found that the merger violated the antitrust laws, could then impose appropriate remedies.

This amendment is necessary because S. 638 does not provide any form of due process for those adversely affected by the anticompetitive aspects of the proposed sale.

Again, for those who may be listening, I want to stress that S. 638, the pending legislation, does not provide any form of due process for those adversely affected by the anticompetitive aspects of the proposed sale. Instead, the bill "deems" the sale approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and effectively ensures no impartial review of antitrust issues either administratively or in the courts.

S. 638's failure to provide an opportunity for independent review of antitrust issues is especially significant because of the inadequate consideration given those issues by the Department of Transportation and the Department of Justice. Their review produced almost none of the information commonly available in this kind of case. Further, the review process they did conduct was mostly in secret. Those who would be hurt the most had no way to review materials submitted to the Departments and no effective way to challenge assertions made by the Norfolk Southern.

I am deeply disappointed by the kind of review the Justice Department provided, Mr. President, because even the Justice Department admitted that the proposed Conrail-Norfolk Southern merger was anticompetitive.

For those listening in their offices, again let me stress. The Justice Department admitted that the proposed Conrail-Norfolk Southern merger was anticompetitive.

The Assistant Attorney General for Antitrust stated that the competitive problems were significant, so significant that "the Department of Justice would therefore oppose the proposed merger unless its competitive problems are remedied."

That is a direct quotation from the Department of Justice attorneys involved in the case.

Of course, Justice was not the only party that found competitive problems with a Norfolk Southern-Conrail merger. The staff of the Interstate Commerce Commission, the U.S. Railway Association, 25 State attorneys general, State departments of transportation, cities and other local governments, railroad labor, literally hundreds of shippers, ports, and railroads that connect and compete with Conrail and Norfolk Southern also found extremely serious antitrust problems.

Justice also reached this conclusion even though its analysis substantially underestimated the scope and extent of the competitive problems. The screening process the Department used eliminated over $500 million in revenues and corresponding tonnage that would be adversely affected by the proposed merger. Further, the Department virtually ignored the substantial diversions that would be suffered by railroads that connect and compete with Conrail and Norfolk Southern due to the monopoly power of the combined system. But even with these and numerous other deficiencies in its analysis, Justice concluded that the transaction would adversely affect about 19 million tons of freight and $527 million in revenues.

These figures demonstrate that a Norfolk Southern-Conrail merger is extremely uncompetitive. In fact, they justify total opposition to the Department of Transportation's recommended solution on antitrust grounds alone. Now some of my colleagues might argue that such a conclusion is unwarranted. In response to that argument, I can only point out that the Justice Department itself is now opposing a merger similar in size to the one now before the Senate—that is, the proposed Santa Fe-Southern Pacific merger—even though the Department's estimates of anticompetitive effects in that case are less than half as large as in this one. In fact, in the Santa Fe case, Justice is arguing that there is no package of remedies, including divestitures, that will remedy the competitive problems presented by that Merger.

So may I say again to my friends who may be listening in their office, think of it. On the only other pending proposition, the proposed merger of the Santa Fe-Southern Pacific, Justice is opposing the merger when the contemplated impact is less than half of what will be involved in the Conrail-Norfolk Southern situation.

The extent of the antitrust problems became apparent, Mr. President, despite the fact that this proposal is being handled differently than any previous merger between profitable railroads in modern times. Ordinarily, mergers are submitted to the Interstate Commerce Commission for review. The Commission now has up to 31 months to decide rail merger cases, including their antitrust aspects. The ICC process provides all interested parties with very complete information on the merger proposal and the operating and financial projections of the merging partners. It also provides a forum where this information can be challenged through cross-examination, and other information presented. In short, the ICC process provides full procedural safeguards for all parties. Further, any decision of the Commission is reviewable in Federal court, providing additional protection for those adversely affected by a merger proposal.

None of this protection has been provided in this case, however. Virtually none of the information normally available has been provided, and there has been no independent forum available for consideration of antitrust issues.

Now it may be said that conrail is a unique case—it is, after all, Government-owned—and that it should not be handled like other mergers. The fact of Government ownership, however, means that the Government faces a real conflict of interest. Special care needs to be taken to ensure that Government's role as seller does not overshadow its responsibility to handle antitrust considerations fairly and objectively.

The process and protections provided by S. 638 and the Justice Department fall far short of that standard, Mr. President. They provide no assurance that the conflicting roles of the Federal Government have been properly handled. Justice, for example, has not played the kind of independent role in this case that it is playing in the Santa Fe case. Justice, instead of functioning as an independent antitrust advisor, has instead acted to do everything possible to help expedite the sale proposal of the Department of Transportation, and it is perhaps unreasonable to expect it to do anything else. It is, after all, part and parcel of the administration. What it is not is independent, which is why there needs to be independent judicial review as called for in my amendment.

There have been attempts to at least partially resolve the competitive problems this merger presents, Mr. President. Norfolk Southern has made three different divestiture proposals, each designed to meet the Justice Department's criteria.

The fact that Norfolk Southern has made three proposals is itself eloquent testimony to the inadequacy of the first two. In fact, the first proposal, which was the only one to receive any kind of independent analysis, was universally regarded as without merit. Norfolk Southern learned its lesson and provided substantially less opportunity for review of its second proposal, but the result was the same. Even the Department of Justice found it inadequate.

Justice found that the third proposal "appears on its face to address the competitive concerns that must be addressed before the Department can approve Norfolk Southern's acquisition." However, given the fact that the third proposal shares many of the major flaws of the first two, it is hard to understand Justice's change of position. Justice itself seems to understand its stand is indefensible. Although Justice has stated that it does not have sufficient in-house expertise to fully analyze the operational aspects of divestiture plans, and that it intended to quickly hire a consultant to review the third plan, it has not done so.

This is despite the fact that Justice had a consultant analyze the first plan, and that that consultant was prepared to analyze the third plan. One can only conclude Justice was afraid to hear the consultant's report. The consultant found the first plan inadequate; Justice evidently was in no mood to risk having the third plan also found wanting.

All three divestiture plans have a variety of flaws. They do nothing about many of the anticompetitive problems Justice identified. They do not address the diversion question at all. Most importantly, they depend on two railroads—Guilford and the Pittsburgh and Lake Erie—that can only be classified as extremely marginal, and which would likely continue to exist only at the sufferance of a combined Conrail-Norfolk Southern System.

I will not take the Senate's time, Mr. President, to analyze their financial condition in detail. I do believe, however, that if this were 1976 instead of 1986, we would not be discussing their ability to acquire trackage rights and lines from Conrail. Instead, we would be including them with the other bankrupt railroads that were merged into Conrail. The Department of Transportation argues that Conrail, with its slimmed-down, well-maintained route structure and its record of five straight years of increasing earnings and positive cash flow, cannot succeed on its own. I do not understand how the Department can take that position and simultaneously argue that Guilford and the P&LE, a fraction of Conrail's size, in great need of major rehabilitation, and with a history of losses, can provide effective, long-term competition with the even larger and more powerful combined Conrail-Norfolk Southern System. The White Queen in "Through the Looking Glass" pronounced herself able to believe six impossible things before breakfast. If the Senate accepts the view that Guilford and the P&LE are viable while Conrail is not, we will have become what most of the country already believes we are—residents of Alice's "wonderland."

Let me conclude by summarizing what this amendment does and does not require and what it will and will not do. It does not require the Senate to determine absolutely that the antitrust problems presented by the proposed Conrail-Norfolk Southern merger have not been resolved by the third divestiture plan. Enactment of this amendment would simply indicate the Senate's desire to ensure fair and thorough analysis of outstanding antitrust issues, and the Senate's understanding of the need to provide an independent forum where those most adversely affected by the proposed merger can present their case.

Mr. President, this amendment will not prevent the sale. It will provide an opportunity for judicial review, not the administrative and judicial review available for all other mergers between profitable railroads. The Justice Department and Norfolk Southern say the antitrust problems have been resolved. If they are correct, they should have nothing to fear from a judicial review of the antitrust implications of the merger and the third divestiture plan.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to support this fair, straightforward, simple but essential amendment that will only give to the courts the right to review the question of whether we are creating a monopoly, an anticompetitive railroad system in the bill now before us in the Senate.

Mr. President, I yield the remainder of my time.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator from Illinois, I do not think he meant to say he yielded the remainder of his time.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I apologize to the distinguished manager of the bill. I meant to say I yield the floor. There is some time left for other proponents of the amendment and I thank the Senator for correcting my mistake.

Mr. SPECTER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, may I ask, on whose time is the Senator from Pennsylvania speaking?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no control of time.

Mr. DANFORTH. There is no time agreement on the hour?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no time agreement on this amendment.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, may I say in clarification of that to the manager of the bill that it has been my understanding with him all through this that I would not consume the full half hour myself, which I have not done. I hope those who support my point of view will have in mind that we want to be as accommodating on the time as we can, because there are two other amendments we would like to give full opportunity to this morning. I think the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania is supportive of my amendment.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, the Chair has already announced there is no time agreement?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no time agreement.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, as I had started to say, the distinguished Senator from Illinois has eloquently articulated very strong reasons why any sale of Conrail to Norfolk Southern should not carry antitrust immunity and an antitrust exemption. These issues had been addressed by this Senator yesterday, and on January 21, in relation to earlier contentions that the proposed sale of Conrail to Norfolk Southern was not ripe for decision at this time.

I addressed that issue on the motion to proceed because of the outstanding antitrust questions and, as I addressed in some detail yesterday, on the issue of the preferability of Morgan Stanley over Norfolk Southern because of these underlying antitrust issues. In those two floor statements, this Senator has incorporated into the RECORD the underlying documents which show these very serious antitrust issues, so it will only be necessary to allude to them briefly today and to make this argument in summary form.

The parameters of the antitrust issues were stated by the Department of Justice in the letter from Assistant Attorney General McGrath to Secretary of Transportation Elizabeth Dole on January 29, 1985, a letter which is in the RECORD and which, simply stated, declares that a Conrail-Norfolk Southern joinder would violate the antitrust laws unless there were adequate divestiture.

A subsequent letter from Assistant Attorney General Ginsburg to Secretary of Transportation Dole on September 25, 1985, again already a part of the RECORD and commented upon extensively, enumerated very substantial reasons why the proposed divestiture plans to Guilford or Pittsburgh-Lake Erie were totally insufficient to solve the antitrust problems.

Then came Norfolk Southern's statement that unless some action were to be taken by the end of 1985 it would withdraw its offer. Suddenly the third divestiture proposal, which was less than bare bones, submitted by Norfolk Southern on November 11, received prompt "preliminary approval" by the Department of Justice on November 19. Then followed a scheduled hearing by the Judiciary Committee, which was not a valid hearing because of the absence of the requisite notice.

There was an informal proceeding attended by Senator THURMOND and this Senator where Secretary Dole testified and where Assistant Attorney General Ginsburg testified and gave what I think, fairly stated, was a totally insufficient explanation of the very serious antitrust questions involved in this matter.

Following that informal proceeding, this Senator wrote to Assistant Attorney General Ginsburg by letter dated December 19 and asked about the details of the proposal so that there could be some evaluation of the third divestiture proposal. Because of the importance of this letter and its brevity, I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
Washington, DC, December 19, 1985.

Hon. DOUGLAS H. GINSBURG,
Assistant Attorney General, U.S. Department of Justice, Washington, DC.

DEAR ASSISTANT ATTORNEY GENERAL GINSBURG: I remain extremely concerned about the unanswered questions surrounding the "preliminary approval" which the Department of Justice's Antitrust Division has given to the latest divestiture plan proposed by Norfolk Southern, Guilford Transportation Industries, and the Pittsburgh & Lake Erie Railroad.

I previously expressed this concern to you when you appeared before an "informal gathering" of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary regarding the sale of Conrail last month. At that time, you stated that the latest divestiture plan "appeared" to resolve Justice's concerns of anticompetitive effects resulting from the proposed merger of the Conrail and Norfolk Southern systems. You admitted during that meeting, however, that extensive documentation, including financial plans, revenue estimates, balance sheets, and operating schedules, would have to be submitted by the parties, and evaluated and verified by the Antitrust Division, as well as by an outside consultant, before any final approval could be given.

I would like to know whether the outside consultant has been chosen and whether any of the necessary documentation has been provided to you or your staff. Specifically what, if any, further action has been taken thus far by Justice with regard to analysis of this divestiture proposal? I would also appreciate it if you would provide me with a list of any remaining documents which must be supplied to you, when such documents are expected, and when you would reasonably expect review of the documents to be completed by both Justice and its outside consultant.

Thank you for your prompt attention to this very important matter.

Sincerely,

ARLEN SPECTER.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, when no reply was received and the majority leader [Mr. DOLE] had scheduled Conrail for the first order of business on the resumption of the Senate session on January 21, this Senator wrote Attorney General Meese on January 9 asking that a prompt reply be given to the letter of December 19. Finally, on January 21, after this body had started to undertake this consideration, a reply was received. In the reply from Assistant Attorney General Ginsburg on January 21, 1986, there were enclosures of letters to Guilford and Pittsburgh & Lake Erie dated January 8, 1986, concerning some of the underlying questions on the proposed divestiture. I think it is obvious that the Department of Justice has been dragging its feet so that the details of the divestiture program would not be before the U.S. Senate as we considered this issue.

In the letter from the Justice Department to Pittsburgh & Lake Erie on January 8 there is a reference to the importance of a "major interest to Congress" on the specifics, from Pittsburgh & Lake Erie and Guilford. Yet we are being asked to pass on this proposal with an antitrust exemption without those materials being of record and before this body. In an effort to obtain the details, this Senator wrote to Guilford and to Pittsburgh & Lake Erie by letter dated January 9, 1986, and as of this date, 21 days later, no reply has been received.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the letters from this Senator to the Attorney General dated January 9, 1986, the letters to Pittsburgh & Lake Erie and Guilford dated January 9, 1986, and the letter from Assistant Attorney General Ginsburg to this Senator dated January 21, 1986.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
Washington, DC, January 9, 1986.

Hon. EDWIN MEESE III,
Attorney General, Department of Justice, Washington, DC.

DEAR ED: By letter dated December 19, 1985, I wrote to Assistant Attorney General Ginsburg (copy enclosed) inquiring about the unanswered questions surrounding the "preliminary approval" which the Department of Justice's Antitrust Division has given to the latest divestiture plan proposed by Norfolk Southern, Guilford Transportation Industries, and the Pittsburgh & Lake Erie Railroad.

As of this date, I have received no reply. In order to be prepared on the subject when it comes before the Senate on January 21, 1986, our first day back, it is indispensible that we have a prompt response to the questions raised in the letter to Mr. Ginsburg.

I would appreciate your assistance in obtaining this information.

Sincerely,

ARLEN SPECTER.

U.S. SENATE,
Washington, DC, January 9, 1986.

Mr. GORDON NEUENSCHWANDER,
Executive Vice President, Pittsburgh & Lake Erie Railroad, Pittsburgh, PA.

DEAR MR. NEUENSCHWANDER: On November 11, 1985, the Pittsburgh & Lake Erie Railroad entered into an agreement with the Norfolk Southern Corporation and Guilford Transportation Industries regarding the divestiture of certain rail lines involved in the proposed merger of Conrail-Norfolk Southern.

The November 11 agreement is devoid of certain critical documents which are necessary for the evaluation of Pittsburgh & Lake Erie Railroad's role in this proposal. This extensive documentation includes financial plans, revenue estimates, balance sheets and operating schedules.

Assistant Attorney General Douglas H. Ginsburg, appearing before an "informal gathering" of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary last November, stated that these documents would be submitted to the Department of Justice, and evaluated and verified by the Antitrust Division, as well as by an outside consultant, before any final approval of the plan could be given.

I would like to know if the necessary documentation has been provided to Mr. Ginsburg's staff and, if so, I request that I be provided copies of these documents forthwith as the Senate is expected to consider the Conrail sale legislation when it reconvenes on January 21. If the materials have not yet been provided, I would like to know when they will be, and I would appreciate a list of the anticipated documents.

Thank you for our prompt attention to this extremely important matter.

Sincerely,

ARLEN SPECTER.

U.S. SENATE,
Washington, DC, January 9, 1986.

Mr. TIMOTHY MELLON,
Chairman and Chief Executive Officer, Guilford Transportation Industries, Inc., Boston, MA.

DEAR MR. MELLON: On November 11, 1985, Guilford Transportation Industries entered into an agreement with the Norfolk Southern Corporation and the Pittsburgh & Lake Erie Railroad regarding the divestiture of certain rail lines involved in the proposed merger of Conrail/Norfolk Southern.

The November 11 agreement is devoid of certain critical documents which are necessary for the evaluation of Guilford's role in this proposal. This extensive documentation includes financial plans, revenue estimates, balance sheets and operating schedules.

Assistant Attorney General Douglas H. Ginsburg, appearing before an "informal gathering" of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary last November, stated that these documents would be submitted to the Department of Justice, and evaluated and verified by the Antitrust Division, as well as by an outside consultant, before any final approval of the plan could be given.

I would like to know if the necessary documentation has been provided to Mr. Ginsburg's staff and, if so, I request that I be provided copies of these documents forthwith as the Senate is expected to consider the Conrail sale legislation when it reconvenes on January 21. If the materials have not yet been provided, I would like to know when they will be, and I would appreciate a list of the anticipated documents.

Thank you for your prompt attention to this extremely important matter.

Sincerely,

ARLEN SPECTER.

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
ANTITRUST DIVISION,
Washington, DC, January 21, 1986.

Hon. ARLEN SPECTER,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR SPECTER: This letter responds to your letters of December 19, 1985 and January 9, 1986, concerning the proposed sale of Consolidated Rail Corporation ("Conrail") to Norfolk Southern Corporation ("NS"). You have asked what further action the Department of Justice has taken, since the informal meeting that Secretary Dole and I had with you and several other Senators on November 21, 1985, to analyze the divestiture proposal made by NS, Guilford Transportation Industries, Inc. ("GTI"), and the Pittsburgh & Lake Erie Railroad ("P&LE") in mid-November 1985. In particular, you have requested information concerning both the outside consultant that we will retain to assist us in our analysis and the documentation that we will receive from the parties to the proposed divestiture.

The Department has made significant progress in our preparations to review the divestiture proposal. First, we have given copies of the new divestiture proposal to transportation officials from all the States in the divestiture corridor, including Pennsylvania, and to several railroads and other interested parties, in order that we might obtain their views on the proposal at an early date. Second, the Department has nearly completed the process of selecting an outside consultant; we expect that the consultant will be selected, retained, and ready to begin work by January 31.

Third, the Department recently sent detailed information requests to GTI and P&LE: copies of the requests are enclosed. Similar requests will be sent next week to NS and Conrail. As the GTI and P&LE information requests state, we may find it necessary to seek additional information at a later date, as our analysis of the divestiture proposal progresses. In order to facilitate meaningful public comment about the divestiture proposal, we have advised GTI and P&LE that they should "disclose publicly all information that you provide to us about your plans and ability to operate the divested rail properties, except when the information is particularly sensitive. . . ."

If the parties meet the various deadlines contained in our information request letters, we should begin to receive specific information concerning the proposed divestiture from GTI and P&LE within the next two weeks and from NS and Conrail soon thereafter. We and our consultant will review that information and conduct a field investigation as quickly as possible. We hope to complete the process and make a recommendation to the Attorney General by late March or early April about whether the new divestiture proposal will do in fact what it appears to do on its face—provide long-term, viable, and competitive rail service to the areas identified in our January 29 and March 26, 1985, letters to Secretary Dole.

I trust that this letter has been responsive to your concerns about our analysis of the new divestiture proposal. I would be happy to discuss this issue with you in person if you wish.

Sincerely,

DOUGLAS H. GINSBURG,
Assistant Attorney General.

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, DC, January 8, 1986.

Hon. JOE SIMMS, Esquire,
Jones, Day, Reavis & Pogue,
Metropolitan Square, Washington, DC.

DEAR JOE: As you know, the Department of Justice has announced that it will proceed with the second phase of its analysis of the divestitures proposed in connection with the planned sale of Conrail to the Norfolk Southern Corporation. In this regard, we have reviewed the November 11 and November 19, 1985 joint documents of Norfolk Southern Corporation, Guilford Transportation Industries, Inc. and the Pittsburgh and Lake Erie Railroad Company. Although those documents have provided some information to help us determine whether the new divestiture plan will achieve long-term, viable, competitive rail service that will resolve the competitive problems we have identified, a substantial amount of additional information will be needed before we can make a final determination about the divestiture. Accordingly, I am enclosing an initial list of the types of additional information that we will need to receive from GTI to complete our analysis.

I wish to emphasize strongly that time is of the essence in complying with these information requests. The consulting firm that the Department selects to assist in our analysis must have information on all of the basic details of GTI's proposed post-divestiture plans before it can begin conducting its analysis. If there are delays in receiving that information, there will be delays in completing the analysis and corresponding delays in the final decision of the Attorney General. Accordingly, I have marked with an asterisk those requests for which we need complete responses as soon as possible and no later than January 24, 1986. We ask that you supply us with complete responses to those requests not marked by February 10, 1986. In order to facilitate this process, I would like to meet with you or other GTI representatives as soon as possible in order to answer any questions you may have about the scope of the requests.

As you know, it is possible under the Freedom of Information Act for the Justice Department to refuse to disclose publicly confidential commercial or financial information. Much of the information we are requesting in this letter could therefore be held in confidence by the Department, if you were to request that it be treated confidentially. However, the nature and viability of the rail service your client intends to provide on the divested properties is of major interest to Congress and the public. We believe, therefore, that it is appropriate to disclose publicly all information that you provide to us about your plans and ability to operate the divested rail properties, except when the information is particularly sensitive. Accordingly, we are asking that you designate information as confidential only if its public disclosure would be clearly unwarranted. In particular, we believe that the details of both your final agreement with Norfolk Southern and your operating plan should be available for public analysis, and that at least a general description of your financial structure and market analysis should be disclosed. In addition, you should realize that it will be necessary for us to disclose some or all of the information that you designate as confidential to the outside consultant who will be retained by the Department to assist in our analysis of the divestiture. Please let us know if you would like to have the consultant enter into a confidentiality agreement with GTI. In addition, we plan to request that Donaldson, Lufkin and Jenrette furnish us their firm's internal documents concerning GTI's proposed acquisition of the divestiture properties, and we are asking that you waive any claim of confidentiality that GTI may have concerning such documents.

Finally, I note that the attached request is preliminary and that in the future it will be necessary for us or our consultant to request additional material about the proposed purchase. Please note that whenever the term "GTI" is used in the attached information requests, we intend that the term include GTI's Rail Division and its corporate parent and subsidiaries, unless otherwise specified.

If you have any questions about this matter, please call me at (202) 724-6478.

Sincerely,

PAUL A. MAPES, Attorney
Antitrust Division.

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, DC, January 8, 1986.

Mr. G.E. NEUENSCHWANDER,
Executive Vice President, Pittsburgh and Lake Erie Railroad Co., Commerce Court Building, Pittsburgh, PA.

DEAR GORDON: As you know, the Department of Justice has announced that it will proceed with the second phase of its analysis of the divestitures proposed in connection with the planned sale of Conrail to the Norfolk Southern Corporation. In this regard, we have reviewed the November 11 and November 19, 1985 joint documents of Norfolk Southern Corporation, Guilford Transportation Industries, Inc. and the Pittsburgh and Lake Erie Railroad Company. Although those documents and P&LE's preliminary business plan of November 13, have provided some information to help us determine whether the new divestitute plan will achieve a long-term, viable, competitive rail service that will resolve the competitive problems we have identified, a substantial amount of additional information will be needed before we can make a final determination about the divestiture. Accordingly, I am enclosing an initial list of the types of additional information that we will need to receive from P&LE to complete our analysis.

I wish to emphasize strongly that time is of the essence in complying with these information requests. The consulting firm that the Department selects to assist in our analysis must have information on all of the basic details of P&LE's proposed post-divestiture plans before it can begin conducting its analysis. If there are delays in receiving that information, there will be delays in completing the analysis and corresponding delays in the final decision of the Attorney General. Accordingly, I have marked with an asterik those requests for which we need complete responses as soon as possible and no later than January 24, 1986. We ask that you supply us with complete responses to those requests not marked by February 10, 1986. In order to facilitate this process, I would like to meet with you or any other GTI representative as soon as possible to answer any questions you may have about the scope of the requests.

As you may know, it is possible under the Freedom of Information Act for the Justice Department to refuse to disclose publicly confidential commercial or financial information. Much of the information we are requesting in this letter could therefore be held in confidence by the Department, if you were to request that it be treated confidentially. However, the nature and viability of the rail service P&LE intends to provide on the divested properties is of major interest to Congress and the public. We believe, therefore, that it is appropriate to disclose publicly all information that you provide to us about your plans and ability to operate the divested rail properties, except when the information is particularly sensitive. Accordingly, we are asking that you designate information as confidential only if its public disclosure would be clearly unwarranted. In particular, we believe that the details of both your final agreement with Norfolk Southern and your operating plan should be available for public analysis, and that at least a general description of your financial structure and market anlysis should be disclosed. In addition, you should realize that it will be necessary for us to disclose some or all of the information that you designate as confidential to the outside consultant who will be retained by the Department to assist in our analysis of the divestiture. Please let us know if you would like to have the consultant enter into a confidentiality agreement with P&LE. In addition, we plan to request that Dillion, Read & Co. Inc., furnish us that firm's internal documents concerning P&LE's financial condition and proposed acquisition of the divestiture properties and we are asking that you waive any claim of confidentiality that P&LE may have concerning such documents.

Finally, I note that the attached request is preliminary and that in the future it will be necessary for us or our consultant to request additional material about the proposed purchase.

If you have any questions about this matter, please call me at (202) 724-6478.

Sincerely,

PAUL A. MAPES,
Attorney,
Antitrust Division.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, the nub of the situation is that the Senate, absent the amendment by the distinguished Senator from Illinois, will be giving carte blanche approval to this giant merger without any judicial review or without any independent review. On the state of this record, I do not think it is inappropriate to say that such action would be unconscionable and irresponsible.

Here we have a merger of the 18,000-mile Norfolk Southern track and the 15,000-mile Conrail track, which creates a monopoly situation as illustrated on the major charts in the rear of the Chamber. This shows the destruction of competition on a wide swath of the United States, running from Kansas City and St. Louis through Detroit and Pittsburgh, and what is obviously an antitrust problem and, based on this Sentor's review of the underlying facts, an antitrust violation.

This Senator has had substantial experience in the private sector on the antitrust questions, and it is the judgment of this Senator that there is an antitrust violation. Whether this Senator is correct or the distinguished floor manager is correct in his assertion that there is no antitrust violation, at least there is a substantial controversy here, a controversy which should be left to the courts to decide.

Why should the American people be deprived of having an impartial arbiter decide this question? Can it be said, in any realistic or reasonable context, that the Department of Justice can provide an independent review?

Here we have a situation in which the Secretary of Transportation, on behalf of the administration, urges the sale of Conrail to Norfolk Southern. Here we have a situation in which the President urges the Senate to approve that sale. Here we have a situation in which the Attorney General of the United States, appointed by the President—essentially the President's lawyer—is being called upon to render an opinion in the face of vigorous advocacy by the Department of Transportation and vigorous advocacy by the President of the United States.

If this were in a criminal context, it would be a classic case for the appointment by the court of independent counsel to make the review. This is not a criminal matter, so the appointment of independent counsel or a special prosecutor would not be appropriate here, under provisions of law. But this certainly is the kind of case in which the regular processes of law should be followed. Mr. President, we are a society which prides itself on the rule of law, the impartiality of Federal courts, and the availability of Federal courts to pass judgment on such issues.

Here, as alluded to by the distinguished Senator from Illinois, we have a similar merger by Southern Pacific and Santa Fe, which is pending before the Interstate Commerce Commission, in which the Department of Justice has taken the position that the merger violates the antitrust laws. How can anyone, in good conscience, who says that the Santa Fe-Southern Pacific merger violates antitrust laws not say that the joinder of Conrail and Norfolk Southern would not violate the antitrust laws? Certainly, the conclusion by the Department of Justice that the Santa Fe-Southern Pacific merger violates the antitrust laws a fortiori follows on this instance. The regular procedures of the Interstate Commerce Commission would be inapplicable unless the pending amendment is adopted.

Mr. President, if we take a look at the other charts which compare the revenues of the combined Conrail-Norfolk Southern with Guilford and Pittsburgh & Lake Erie, it is obvious that Guilford and Pittsburgh & Lake Erie cannot provide the requisite competition on divestiture.

If we look at the 1984 net income, again comparing Conrail and Norfolk Southern on a joinder with Guilford and Pittsburgh & Lake Erie, it is obvious that the divestiture proposed to fit to Guilford and Pittsburgh & Lake Erie cannot provide the requisite competition.

If we observe in even a perfunctory manner the large chart we have at the rear of the Chamber, on the overlapping lines between Conrail and Norfolk Southern, now providing competition for thousands of shippers and millions of people, it is obvious that that competition would be lessened and that there really is a violation of the antitrust laws of the United States.

In this context, I think it is just a basic matter of fairness that the regular processes of law be available; that any shipper who feels that this joinder violates the antitrust laws should have the opportunity to go into court, just as any citizen can on any right-angle automobile collision in this country, and assert his rights and have a court pass on the assertions of those rights.

The point made by the distinguished Senator from Illinois is undeniable—that this amendment would not eliminate the sale; that the sale could go ahead if it ultimately received approval by the body and the House of Representatives; that if the manager of this bill and if Norfolk Southern are confident that they satisfy the antitrust laws, let them take their chances in the American courts. It is not asking too much for anyone who asserts this kind of joinder to take its/his/her chances in the American courts.

For those reasons, I ask my colleagues to vote in favor of this amendment advanced by the distinguished Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, let me say at the outset that this truly is a killer amendment.

Yesterday, we made two decisions. First, we made the decision to proceed with the sale of Conrail. That was the meaning of the vote on the motion to waive the Budget Act. Then we made a decision last night that we would reject the Morgan Stanley alternative. That brings us to the question of selling the railroad to Norfolk Southern.

This amendment is a killer amendment.

In the Journal of Commerce from January 29, 1986, there is an article entitled "Antitrust Amendment Could Make NS Walk." The article quotes the chief executive officer of Norfolk Southern, Mr. Robert Claytor, as referring to this as one of the killer amendments, and Mr. Claytor was reported to say:

> If we are to stay in the game, the amendments weakening the sale will have to be defeated.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. DANFORTH. I would be happy to. Because I know a lot of Senators are anxious to get on with votes and some have appointments, I wanted to get on with my remarks, and I know Senator THURMOND wanted to speak for about 10 minutes, and my hope was to get us to a vote by about 11 o'clock.

I am happy to yield for a question.

Mr. SPECTER. My question shall be brief. Why, if this is a killer amendment, should not the Norfolk transaction be killed? If there is really no antitrust violation, why should not the Norfolk Southern offer take its chances?

Mr. DANFORTH. I am delighted the Senator asked the question because it goes right to the heart of the remarks that I have planned.

Mr. President, I think the answer to the Senator's question is that Norfolk Southern believed that it was buying a railroad, not buying endless protracted litigation, and that is what this amendment would lead to.

It would lead to everyone who has a complaint—CSX, of course, being one of the complainers, railroads, any shipper who has a complaint—filing a lawsuit in any Federal court anywhere in the country. There could literally be hundreds of lawsuits filed. Maybe at some point they would be consolidated. I do not know. that would be up to the judge.

But I think everybody who has practiced law for any time knows that if you want to really get into the suit, get involved in antitrust litigation.

I am sure that there is antitrust litigation still going on in the State of Missouri that was going on when I was its attorney general 9 years ago. Antitrust litigation is the longest, most drawn out form of litigation there is. And that is what Norfolk Southern is concerned about.

It made an offer to buy a railroad in June of 1984 and nothing has come of it yet. And we are still debating it and now we say maybe sometime this year later on we will pass the legislation, but if this amendment is on it, that then triggers endless litigation.

Mr. President, it should be pointed out that the antitrust immunity that is provided in the bill only goes to the merger, only to the merger. No immunity is provided for any practices that occur subsequent to the merger.

That is, if Norfolk Southern or Conrail subsequent to the merger were to engage in predatory practices, price fixing, any other violations of the antitrust laws, cancellation of joint routes that may be in violation of the antitrust law, no such violations of the law would be protected by this immunity. The immunity that is provided in the bill goes only to the merger itself, not to anything after the merger.

Mr. President, if we remove that immunity from this merger, that will be a unique occurrence. It will be the only time in the history of railroad mergers that the antitrust laws of the United States have been applied to rail mergers, the only time, because rail mergers have been historically expressly exempted from the application of the antitrust laws.

The Interstate Commerce Act, the 3R Act which created Conrail in the first place, the Northeast Rail Services Act, which authorized the sale of Conrail, all of these provide for exemption from the antitrust laws.

Now, what NERSA did, Mr. President, is to say that the Department of Transportation in consultation with the Justice Department should put together the sale and then Congress should approve it. In other words, the Department of Transportation was to assume the role performed by the Interstate Commerce Commission in weighing the pros and cons of the sale.

In fact, the Justice Department turned out acting as much more than a consultant. The Justice Department conducted an exhaustive study of the competitive implications of the Norfolk Southern-Conrail transaction. Particular focus was given to the so-called problem area between Buffalo and Pittsburgh on the East and between Chicago and St. Louis on the West. In that area, the combined tonnage of Conrail and Norfolk Southern is 38 percent of rail tonnage matter. Some might say 38 percent is hardly monopolistic; even if they were combined, 38 percent is hardly monopolistic. Well, it was of concern to the Department of Justice.

So the Department of Justice said, "We cannot approve this unless there is divestiture," and then the Department of Transportation worked out the divestiture with the Norfolk Southern, and now the Department of Justice has said that its concerns, it believes, have been met.

Mr. President, here is what the Department of Justice did in 1984. In 1984 the Justice Department conducted a 5-month study that included contacts with 200 shippers, dozens of State and local officials, other railroads, and countless other interested parties, and then in 1985, the Department of Justice spent most of the year analyzing the original and modified versions of the divestiture plan.

Douglas Ginsburg, the Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Antitrust Division, testified that the Department of Justice has—and this is a quote—"spent more time analyzing the needs that an appropriate divestiture in this deal would have than any other transaction in its history."

The Department of Justice spent more time analyzing the competitive effects of this acquisition than it spent on any other transaction in history.

In a normal rail merger, the ICC examines competitive effects, and that is one of a number of considerations that it weighs in coming up with a balanced analysis of whether to approve the merger.

Here, Mr. President, we have given the Department of Justice an absolute veto power over the merger. A lot of people said, "Well, we don't have all the studies in." That is correct. The Department of Justice is going to retain a consultant and the consultant is going to do such things as literally walk the track. It is very much like a closing in a real estate deal. You have to make sure all the facts are true. To verify the factual basis upon which the Department of Justice's conclusion was reached, a consultant will go over the deal and, as Assistant Attorney General Ginsburg put it, dot all the i's and cross all the t's.

Let us suppose that something unforeseen occurs. Let us suppose that we pass the bill. It goes through conference, and the Justice Department then says, "We are sorry. We are not satisfied." Then what?

Under this bill and under the memorandum of intent, as well, the Justice Department has an absolute veto. It can veto the deal.

So, Mr. President, this particular transaction has received more attention than any other similar transaction, any other competitive problem in the history of the antitrust laws, in the history of the Justice Department.

Now, Mr. President, as I pointed out, the courts have never had jurisdiction over antitrust matters relating to rail mergers. This would be a first if the amendment of the Senators from Illinois were agreed to.

Some people, I suppose, think that the courts should be in everything. Some people believe that the courts, the Federal courts, should be put in every possible situation; that the court's jurisdiction should not be contracted, it should be expanded. But we decided otherwise in all the other railroad legislation to date. We certainly decided otherwise in NERSA. We decided that this was a decision that was going to be made by the executive branch and by Congress, not by the courts. And I do not think this is the time to get the courts into an act which they have never been in before.

Mr. President, the controversy on the sale of Conrail has been going on since 1981 when we passed the Northeast Rail Services Act. The controversy has been going on in Congress for a year. It has been just a year now since the Secretary of Transportation recommended the sale to Norfolk Southern. The controversy has been going on in the Commerce Committee, it has been going on in the Judiciary Committee, and it has been raging on the floor of the Senate for over a week now. It has not even hit the House.

At sometime, Mr. President, there has to be an end to controversy. The issue before the Senate in this amendment is whether there can be an end to controversy. If we adopted this amendment, there would be no end to it. It would go on and on and on for year after year after year. And Norfolk Southern, as any business would, would just not put up with it.

So, Mr. President, I strongly urge the defeat of this amendment.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, this amendment would make the acquisition of Conrail by Norfolk Southern subject to the antitrust laws. The amendment would remove the provision of the bill that extends the same antitrust protection to this merger as that given to railroad mergers approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission. This amendment would very likely cause Norfolk Southern to walk away from the acquisition, and that would be an unfortunate blow to transportation policy. Therefore, the amendment should be defeated.

This amendment would allow shippers and competitors to challenge this acquisition and tie it up in the courts for years. As I will explain, it is unnecessary and unwise to shackle this transaction in the proposed manner.

When the ICC approves rail mergers, the law confers limited antitrust immunity on the transaction. The purpose of that immunity is to avoid undermining a transaction that has been found to be beneficial to transportation policy and consistent with competition policy. Mergers approved by the ICC are consistent with competition policy because competition issues are taken into account in ICC analysis.

In the case of this merger, the Justice Department is reviewing the effects on competition and will require the merger to comply with antitrust law. There is no need for insurance that the Justice Department will fulfill its duty in this regard. Furthermore, the Justice Department's review of competition issues is more thorough than the ICC's review, which covers many different aspects of a rail merger.

The provision of S. 638 immunizing this merger from private antitrust challenge is not the grant of an extraordinary privilege. Remember that this merger cannot occur until the Justice Department says it complies with antitrust law. It is very rare for private parties to challenge—much less successfully challenge—a merger after it has been reviewed and brought into antitrust compliance by the Justice Department. If a merger has been modified and approved by the Justice Department, it almost certainly will be approved in court. But to permit private parties to tie this lawful merger up in court for years would certainly nullify all the hard work of the Secretary of Transportation to reach an agreement with Norfolk Southern.

Mr. President, let me now speak for a minute about the Justice Department's method of resolving those antitrust concerns. We have heard opponents of this proposal say, in our committee and elsewhere, that they are skeptical of both the process used by Justice to evaluate the merger and the ability of the divestiture plan to cure the anticompetitive effects. Comparisons have been made between the thoroughness of review of railroad mergers by the Interstate Commerce Commission and this review by the Justice Department. Information provided to the Judiciary Committee indicates that, contrary to the critics, the review of the competition features of this merger by the Justice Department has been much more thorough than that commonly done by the ICC in such cases. Furthermore, the quantity of information available to the Justice Department in the Conrail case has at least equaled, if not exceeded, that available to the ICC.

The Justice Department focused its analysis on markets in which competition from rail and other modes of transportation is insufficient to counterbalance any increase in Norfolk Southern's market power. The Justice Department's method for screening the areas affected by this merger has been consistent with the procedures followed in any merger investigation. The Justice Department has looked at a wide variety of factors in its analysis. The Department has developed detailed information on such factors as the history of the rail lines involved, the identity of shippers being served on the line, the nature and volume of shipments, the routes preferred by shippers, and the freight rates being paid by those shippers.

The Justice Department had negotiated a divestiture plan to remedy the anticompetitive effects of the merger, and has placed great importance on the quality of the lines to be divested. Justice has made it clear from the outset that it will not give its approval to the merger unless the divested assets are good enough to enable the purchasers to be viable competitors in the affected region. The rail lines to be divested have been chosen through demanding negotiations between the Justice Department and Norfolk Southern. In its divestiture negotiations, Justice has looked at the current and projected traffic on the lines, the price to be paid, and the equipment and managerial skills possessed by the purchasers. The current divestiture package contains significant improvements over earlier proposals that did not satisfy the Justice Department.

The purpose of divestiture is to restore competition eliminated by the merger and to insure that shippers who lose one option will gain a new transportation option. The details of the proposal are best described in letters and statements from the Antitrust Division, and I ask unanimous consent for them to appear at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. THURMOND. Finally, the antitrust protection given to this merger and to ICC-approved mergers is limited only to the merger itself. It does not extend to predatory practices or monopolization by the merged company after the transaction, as some have implied.

Mr. President, no one is hiding the antitrust problems here. They have been laid out and scrutinized, and the Justice Department will faithfully resolve them. This amendment is unnecessary and mischievous, and should be defeated.

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
ANTITRUST DIVISION,
Washington, DC, September 25, 1985.

Hon. ELIZABETH HANFORD DOLE,
Secretary of Transportation,
Nassif Building, Washington, DC.

DEAR SECRETARY DOLE: This letter is to inform you of the status of the Department of Justice's review of the proposed divestiture of rail assets to Guilford Transportation Industries ("GTI") and Pittsburgh and Lake Erie Railroad ("P&LE"), in connection with the proposed sale of Consolidated Rail Corporation ("Conrail") to Norfolk Southern Corporation ("NS"). As you know, the Department has been reviewing those proposed divestitures in order to determine whether they meet the conditions that are described in former Assistant Attorney General J. Paul McGrath's letter to you dated January 29, 1985. As that letter indicates, those conditions must be met before we can conclude that a proposed divestiture eliminates, the competitive problems that would otherwise be created by NS' acquisition of Conrail.

In his January 29 letter, Assistant Attorney General McGrath indicated that given the magnitude of the competitive problems created by the sale of Conrail to NS, the Department could not approve the sale unless "its competitive problems are remedied through a prior or concurrent divestiture of assets that is approved by the Attorney General. Appropriate divestiture must include divestiture of Conrail and/or Norfolk Southern rail assets along the designated corridor to one or more independent acquirers, other than CSX or any entity owned or controlled by CSX, that would provide long-term, viable, and competitive rail service to locations along the corridor."

Based on the information we have obtained to date, including but not limited to the recent Preliminary Report of the Department's independent consultant, R. L. Banks and Associates, it does not appear that the proposed divestiture will establish a rail carrier in the designated corridor capable of providing long-term, viable competitive service.[1] In many locations the facilities that GTI proposes to acquire seem to be inadequate to provide rail service that could effectively compete with that provided by NS/Conrail. For example, it appears that it will take longer to provide service over GTI's proposed routes than over the routes available to CSX and NS/Conrail, thus making it difficult for GTI to compete for much of the intra-corridor traffic. In addition, our review indicates that GTI has underestimated the amount of capital required to rehabilitate the lines it would acquire and that GTI has not yet obtained a firm commitment for the financing necessary in order to acquire and rehabilitate the divested lines.[2] This raises serious questions as to GTI's financial viability.[3]

Also of great concern is the fact that GTI's operating plan provides no assurance that GTI will provide the sort of competition with the merged NS/Conrail that would be necessary in order to eliminate the problems created by the sale of Conrail to NS. Indeed, no more than $31 million of the annual revenues that GTI forecasts it will generate from operating over the divested lines would be derived from markets identified as "problems" in our January 29 and March 26 letters to you. That is less than ten percent of the more than $370 million in "problem" revenues in which NS/Conrail participated in 1983 and that our earlier letter requires to be resolved. Instead, GTI apparently contemplates generating a great deal of its revenue in other markets, particularly TOFC (trailer on flat car) traffic and traffic that originates or terminates in New England. While GTI's participation in that traffic might allow GTI to remain financially viable and even to earn a profit, it would not address the competitive problems created by the sale of Conrail to NS. From our standpoint, we must be satisfied that divestiture will create not just a railroad that will be viable in the long term but one that will be an effective competitor in the problem markets.

Second, there is nothing to suggest that the proposed divestitures would provide adequate connections either within the corridor or to independent carriers at the gateways, as required by the January 29 letter. As to intra-corridor connections, for example, there appears to have been little provision made for a good connection between P&LE and GTI; without such a connection, P&LE will not be able to provide service that is competitive with that provided by NS/Conrail. Similarly, the proposed arrangements at Toledo are totally inadequate to allow GTI to connect with independent railroads there. Indeed, the connections are so poor that GTI's current operating plan shows that GTI has no intention of providing a competitive alternative to shippers in Wayne and Washtenaw Counties in Michigan. Yet those two counties were identified in the January 29 letter as counties (a) that must be served by an independent carrier and (b) that generate a very large portion of the problem revenues identified in that letter.

In addition, our earlier letters also require that if the Attorney General approves a divestiture and Conrail is sold to NS, NS/Conrail must perform switching services for the acquirer(s) of the divested assets and shippers under certain terms and conditions. As of this time, we are aware of only one instance in which the parties have come close to finalizing a switching arrangement. While our earlier letters do not require the parties to enter into comprehensive switching agreements in every location prior to divestiture, we are seriously concerned by the fact that such agreements have been negotiated in only one market.

In closing, let me assure you that the Department of Justice agrees wholeheartedly with your desire to place Conrail in the private sector. I am sharing this assessment with you at this time to enable the Department of Transportation (DOT) to address the serious reservations that this Department now has with the current divestiture proposal. If the parties are able, either through a restructuring of the current divestitures or the development of a new divestiture, to cure the defects of the present proposals, my staff and I stand ready to analyze fairly and thoroughly any and all new information we are furnished in order to determine whether they meet the requirements of our earlier letters.

Sincerely,

DOUGLAS H. GINSBURG,
Assistant Attorney General.

[1] Our analysis to date has identified a number of deficiencies in the proposed divestitures, some examples of which are discussed in this letter. The major problems that we have identified to date are listed in greater detail in Attachment A. Correction of these problems will be necessary for any divestiture proposal to meet the conditions set out in our letters of January 29 and March 26.

[2] Instead, GTI has obtained only a letter from an investment bank stating its opinion that GTI could obtain certain financing, conditioned upon unspecified covenants yet to be negotiated.

[3] It appears even less likely that P&LE could obtain the financing necessary to acquire and operate the assets necessary in order to provide truly competitive service.

LIST OF CURRENTLY IDENTIFIED MAJOR PROBLEMS WITH THE DIVESTITURE PROPOSAL

A. "[T]he acquirer or acquirers must demonstrate . . . that it possesses the managerial, operational, and financial capability necessary to compete effectively, and to remain a viable entity providing long-term rail service along the designated corridor."

(1) The GTI operating plan provides for little or no service to many of the "problem" markets (i.e., STCC/SPLC pairs) identified in the Department's January 29 and March 26, 1985 letters to Secretary Dole. For example:

(a) No significant service will be provided to Wayne or Washtenaw Counties, Michigan or to Blackford or Wabash Counties, Indiana.

(b) GTI's operating plan projects no more than $31 million in annual revenues for movements of all commodities in the "problem" markets; our letters identified over $370 million in problem revenues in which NS and Conrail participated in 1983 and that must be resolved by a divestiture or divestitures.

(2) In many locations, GTI will be acquiring facilities that are inferior to those retained by NS/Conrail, and GTI will have to rely on NS/Conrail for access to many potential customers. Accordingly, GTI will be at a substantial disadvantage in marketing its services, and its operating plan indicates that it does not expect to obtain a significant share of the identified problem markets. For example:

(a) GTI's proposed Delphos-St.Louis line is far inferior in quality to the two rival NS/Conrail lines to St. Louis, and incapable, in its current condition, of being used to provide service that is competitive with that provided by NS/Conrail.

(b) The Madison yard in East St. Louis, which GTI intends to acquire in order to serve St. Louis, is far inferior in quality to the NS/Conrail yards that serve St. Louis.

(3) Even assuming adequate rehabilitation of the tracks to be divested, GTI's operating plan proposes service that would be substantially slower and less frequent than that likely to be offered by NS/Conrail.

(4) While there are disputes concerning the amount of GTI's rehabilitation costs, our review indicates that GTI has underestimated those costs. Substantial questions also have been raised concerning the accuracy of GTI's estimates of its operating costs, as well as GTI's ability to obtain the revenues projected in its operating plan. To the extent that GTI does not realize its projections, there would be a serious adverse effect on GTI's ability to compete with NS/Conrail.

(5) While we need more information on this point, GTI appears to be so highly leveraged that it is questionable whether it can obtain the additional debt financing necessary to acquire, rehabilitate, and operate the divested assets in a competitive manner. In addition to being highly leveraged, GTI is unable to cover current debt with current assets. Although GTI did obtain an investment bank's opinion that financing for the purchase is obtainable, firm commitments and a number of other aspects of that financing (e.g., restrictive covenants) are yet to be negotiated.

(6) P&LE's financial situation seems to be extremely serious in every respect. P&LE appears even less likely than GTI to be able to obtain the financing necessary to acquire and operate the assets necessary in order to provide truly competitive service.

B. "[T]he divestiture should provide the acquirer direct connections in Buffalo, Chicago, Toledo, and East St. Louis to one or more railroads other than the merged carrier or CSX Corporation or any railroad controlled by either of them."

(1) GTI and P&LE's Toledo gateway, as currently proposed, cannot be used for the time-sensitive movements to or from Wayne and Washtenaw Counties, Michigan. For example:

(a) GTI's proposed line from Toledo to Chicago goes east from Toledo before going west to Chicago; the route appears to be too circuitous to provide competitive service for time-sensitive movements.

(b) We have been advised by P&LE that GTI cannot provide competitive service on auto-related movements from Wayne and Washtenaw Counties to Chicago because GTI's proposed Toledo-Chicago line passes under a Conrail bridge at Toledo that does not allow sufficient clearance for automobile-related traffic.

C. "[I]n each of the designated counties in the east-west corridor, the merged Norfolk Southern/Conrail entity must switch cars between its tracks and facilities and the tracks and facilities of any shipper served by Norfolk Southern, Conrail, or Norfolk Southern/Conrail on customary terms and conditions whenever switching is practicable and necessary in order to provide a shipper with effective competitive access to the track and facilities of the acquirer."

Because the divestiture proposal contemplates that NS/Conrail would in most major markets retain the tracks providing direct access to shippers, it appears that GTI and P&LE will have to rely on their competitors for switching in almost every location. As of this time, however, we are aware of only one instance in which the parties have come close to finalizing a switching arrangement for service to any of the "problem" markets identified in our January 29 and March 26 letters.

STATEMENT OF DOUGLAS H. GINSBURG, ASSISTANT ATTORNEY GENERAL, ANTITRUST DIVISION

Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee, It is a pleasure to be here today before this Committee to discuss the Department of Transportation's proposal to sell the federal government's 85 percent share of Consolidated Rail Corporation (Conrail) to Norfolk Southern Corporation (NS). The Justice Department's role in this proposed sale began fourteen months ago when Secretrary Dole requested that the Antitrust Division conduct an analysis of the sale's likely effects on competition. The Antitrust Division then conducted an intensive four-month study and advised Secretary Dole in January 1985, that NS' acquisition of Conrail would be anticompetitive unless there was a substantial divestiture of rail properties in a five-state area stretching from Illinois in the West to New York in the East.

The methodology that the Antitrust Division used in conducting this analysis is set forth in detail in a letter of January 29, 1985, sent to Secretary Dole by my predecessor as Assistant Attorney General for Antitrust, J. Paul McGrath. Although I was not with the Justice Department during the period when the Antitrust Division conducted that analysis, I am familiar with the approach that was taken and with the Division's employees who participated in the project. I am confident that the staff's analysis met the highest professional standards.

As you know, the Justice Department's role in the proposed sale of Conrail has involved more than the competitive analysis we submitted to Secretary Dole in January. At the Antitrust Division's request, the Department of Transportation made any transfer of stock to NS contingent upon a finding by the Attorney General that NS has entered into divestiture agreements with one or more entities, other than CSX or any company controlled by CSX, that will provide long-term, viable, and competitive rail service in those rail corridors where substantial competition between Conrail and NS would otherwise be eliminated. NS has proposed to satisfy the divestiture condition by selling various rail properties and trackage rights to Pittsburgh and Lake Erie Railroad (P&LE) and to Guilford Transportation Industries (GTI), the parent corporation of the Maine Central, Boston and Maine, and Delaware and Hudson railroads.

NS first divestiture proposal was presented to the Antitrust Division late this spring and details were provided to us throughout the summer. In order to help us evaluate the proposal, we obtained information on a variety of relevant issues from Conrail, NS, GTI, and P&LE; retained a well-respected transportation consultant, R. L. Banks and Associates, to prepare a preliminary report on the proposed divestiture; consulted with local and state government officials from the areas most directly affected by the proposal; and travelled to Buffalo, Toledo, Canton, and Indianapolis to discuss the proposal with shippers, state and local government officials, and other concerned private parties in those cities.

Our analysis focused on five major aspects of the divestiture proposal: (1) the physical condition of the properties to be divested; (2) the proposed operating plans of P&LE and GTI; (3) the marketing plans and projections of P&LE and GTI; (4) the financial ability of GTI and P&LE to continue their existing rail services, to acquire the divestiture properties, and to pay for the necessary upgrading of the tracks and yards to be acquired under the divestiture agreements; and (5) the ability of the proposed operations of P&LE and GTI to remedy the competitive problems that we identified in our initial study for the Department of Transportation.

We concluded that the proposal was unacceptable and explained why in Appendix A to my September 25 letter to Secretary Dole. At almost the same time, NS announced a substantially modified divestiture proposal that substituted overhead trackage rights on the Conrail main line for the so-called "Streak of Rust" between Toledo and St. Louis. On a continuous basis from late September until early this week, representatives from the Division met with representatives of NS, GTI, and P&LE to explain our concerns about the proposal (for example, the fact that under the original trackage rights arrangement. GTI would have been unable to serve most local shippers from Toledo to East St. Louis). With each new modification, we pointed out the problems that remained. In our view it as necessary for the proposal to address all of our competitive concerns. As a result, the proposal that was finally put foward by NS is quite different and vastly superior to that originally put forward.

The new divestiture proposal appears to correct the defects of the earlier proposals. For example, in my September 25 letter I stated that under the initial divestiture proposal no significant service would be provided to Wayne or Washtenaw Counties, Michigan or to Blackford and Wabash Counties, Indiana. In contrast, the new proposal provides that GTI will have overhead trackage rights over the NS line from Detroit to Fort Wayne, Indiana with an interchange with the Ann Arbor at Milan, Michigan (to serve Washtenaw County) and local service trackage rights from Detroit to Toledo over the Conrail line. Both lines will give GTI direct access to Detroit's substantial traffic and the former will enable GTI to provide service between Detroit and Chicago over essentially the same route that NS uses today. The latter line will allow GTI to serve many major shippers on a competitive basis with NS/Conrail, and will enable GTI to provide direct service between Detroit and St. Louis. Other features of the new proposal provide the acquirers with lines of significantly higher quality than the earlier proposals. Moreover, all the problem counties designated in our January 29 and March 26 letters to Secretary Dole will be served by either (and in some cases both) GTI and P&LE. Thus, it appears that GTI and P&LE will have direct access to the vast majority of shippers whose problem revenues are reflected in the January 29 and March 26 letters.

In addition, while the September 25 divestiture plan provided for a maximum switching charge of $250 per car to be paid by GTI and P&LE to NS, a rate lower than that which NS and Conrail often charge each other, we were concerned that NS still proposed to be responsible for all of the switching along the divested lines, leaving GTI and P&LE dependent on the good faith of their major competitor to provide non-discriminatory treatment. We told NS that it would have to provide both behavioral and structural solutions for this potential problem. As a result, it modified its proposal in two significant ways.

First, the divestiture agreements will include an automatic penalty clause providing for liquidated damages if cars switched for GTI and P&LE are handled less favorably than cars that NS/Conrail switches for itself. Second, the agreement will guarantee switching parity between NS/Conrail and GTI on the trackage rights lines. Under the terms of the agreement, GTI has the option of providing the switching now provided by the Indianapolis Union Belt Railroad and by Conrail in two other areas. This means that if GTI so chooses—in its complete, unilateral discretion—GTI could switch approximately as many cars for NS/Conrail as NS/Conrail would switch for it. This would ensure parity between the railroads in the affected areas and thus the trackage rights arrangement would have the unprecedented value of creating, for the first time to my knowledge, truly contestable markets in the railroad industry.

Another area of concern to us was the possibility that Conrail or NS may have entered into long-term contracts with shippers that would foreclose GTI and P&LE competing for the business of important shippers along the lines covered by the divestiture. NS responded to this concern as well, agreeing to allow all coal contracts with more than two years and all other contracts with more than one year to run from the date of the divestiture to be open for solicitation by GTI and P&LE, provided that the contracts involve service over the divested lines. These modifications significantly enhance GTI's and P&LE's ability to provide the long-term, viable competition that the Division has required since its January 29 letter.

In short, the present proposal is a substantial improvement over the earlier plans, and it appears to resolve our concerns. GTI and P&LE have indicated they intend to provide significant service to the shippers that otherwise would be adversely affected by the merger of Conrail and NS. What is even more significant than their intentions or their revenue projections, however, is the economic incentive and ability to provide competitive service to shippers throughout the corridor that the divestiture proposal provides GTI and P&LE. Regardless of whether they are carrying a particular shipper's goods immediately after the divestiture, the terms of the divestiture ensure that if NS/Conrail and/or CSX try to raise rates to anticompetitive levels, GTI and/or P&LE will be able to, and have an incentive to, provide alternative service at competitive rates. In other words, it appears to create long-term, viable and competitive service for affected shippers.

While it appears that the plan addressed our stated concerns, we intend to consult outside experts to help us to confirm that this proposal will create long-term, viable and competitive rail service. The expert who is hired will be asked to look at all aspects of the plan, both operational and financial, in detail in order to confirm the accuracy of the representations upon which we have based our conclusion.

We are currently working with the Department of Transportation to finalize the funding and timing of that study. While the outside consultant is analyzing the divestiture, our staff will discuss the competitive effects of the proposed divestiture with additional shippers, local governments, and other interested parties. Upon receipt and consideration of the report, the Department of Justice will be able to make a final determination as to whether it will approve the proposal.

Mr. Chairman, that concludes my prepared testimony. I will be happy to answer any questions from you or members of the Committee.

Mr. HOLLINGS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MATTINGLY). The Senator from South Carolina is recognized.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, I will be very brief.

I just want to make some remarks about the comments that have been made. The particular amendment at hand is nothing less than a killer amendment in the light, Mr. President, of the tremendous work that has been done on this particular score.

Secretary Dole of Transportation has worked on all the particular offers for years. I will never forget her appearance before the Commerce Committee, and the presentation she made. We were all eager to find fault. There were different interests around. Necessarily for an unusual privatization of a public entity, that sort of goes against Congress' approach to anything. We had tried the privatization. That is what caused Conrail—some bankruptcies up there in the Northeast before we could work it out in the early 1970's. We really tried to save the service—let me emphasize just exactly that expression: "to save the service"—for the traveling and shipping public. We had to put in an antitrust provision. No one questioned it at that time.

We had a big legal mess on our hands with these bankruptcies. The idea was not to try to produce more legal confusion with respect to antitrust charges, countercharges, and everything else of that kind. So working at that particular time we gave it the antitrust immunity so we could work it out for the best interests of the people of the United States. And we did.

Conrail has operated. We have watched the operation. On that particular point, Mr. Crane has done a credible job in the operation of Conrail. But everyone who has testified with any expertise with respect to railroads knows that Conrail cannot sustain itself. That is the bottom line. An individually operated entity of this kind cannot. It was supposed to bring in money. We sold it to the National Congress at that time so we could all make money after we had given it the antitrust immunity, had done all of these things, and had put some moneys into it.

Now having put all the moneys and everything else like that into it, there has been zero dollars to the taxpayers, and millions and millions paid out.

We see an operation diminishing, and the outlook is not bright. We lost some 59,000 employees, and 5,000 or so miles of trackage. The game plan now is to lose an additional 4,500 employees, and 4,000 more miles.

So seeing that, some 5 years ago we said let us dispose of it in the best interests of the people of this country. The Government is not necessarily in the money-making business. But it is not in the money-losing business either. On that particular score, I have never seen it in one sheet in the RECORD.

I will ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the entire cost of the offer to Norfolk Southern.

It comes up to much more than $1.2 billion. But we are not talking costs here this morning. We are talking antitrust. And I have tried to cooperate and be generally quiet in this particular debate so others could get on who have had no chance at all to be heard.

But you can see in a flash that in addition to the $1.2 billion, the divestiture costs are some $200 million. The State improvement agreements, some $200 million. The repayment for labor is $400 million. The New York dock labor protection is $250 million. And $150 million for employee profit participation. State tax exemption is another $250 million. So the minimum total value of Norfolk Southern's offer is $3.65 billion.

I hate to hear these expressions about giveaway and everything else of that kind. Secretary Dole in addition to looking out for the public interest is making absolutely sure as to the bottom line.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this particular point the document giving the overall cost of the Norfolk Southern offer.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Conrail Sale to Norfolk Southern: Value

Direct benefits to Federal Government:
$1.2 billion cash	$1.2
.2 billion cash from Conrail	.2
.8 billion saving for "give up of tax benefits" ($1.8 operating loss carryforwards; $.3 ITC's)	[1] .8
Subtotal	2.2
Indirect benefits to the Federal Government:
Assurance Conrail will not "come back"
Preservation of a larger rail workforce paying more taxes
Creation of new competition which makes two smaller railroads stronger saving jobs and Federal subsidy
Divestiture Cost to Norfolk Southern:
NS receives about $60 million for divested property—Buffalo, Detroit, Chicago, St. Louis—but losses over $200 million a year business to new carriers. Over 5 years that is $1 billion gross; $200 to $250 million profit.	.2
State improvement agreements (varies by State, include Harlem River Terminal in New York; Orphan Bridge in New Jersey; port access in Massachusetts, etc.)	.2
Repayment of Conrail labor (ESOP and back pay)	.4
New York dock labor protection	.25
Employee profit participation	.15
State tax resumption	.25
Minimum total value of NS offer	3.65

[1] Since NS is the largest taxpayer in the rail industry (1984: $154 million Federal income tax alone), ordinarily it could make full use of tax benefits from an acquired company. Morgan Stanley could only make use of such benefits after they bought some other company in order to generate taxable income. Stand alone Conrail is not projected to become a taxpayer in the future ever. Projection on 5 year basis except where cash outlay is one time payments.

Mr. HOLLINGS. In addition to that, of course, Secretary Dole knew that in facing the Congress she would be facing all of these so-called antitrust charges. She started in that back 2 years ago. Douglas Ginsburg is a professional. He taught this particular subject at Harvard. He has been working. No one questioned his integrity. I happen to know the general reputation of his administration with respect to antitrust. I see what others see with Chevron and Gulf. I see what is going on with RCA and GE.

As the former chairman of the Subcommittee on Appropriations for State-Justice-Commerce, we have the antitrust appropriations. We are making sure that they keep it beefed up, and that the antitrust effort and alertness of this particular Government is kept current. There may be some misgivings by some, but there are no misgivings about Donald Ginsburg and the particular things he has done here with the Conrail sale.

As a professional, this was turned over to him. I am going to put in a couple of these pages so you begin to get the feel, because we say we have thoroughly studied it.

Mr. Ginsburg, in testifying before the Judiciary Committee on Norfolk Southern and responding to the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania's questions, said:

Senator, it is very important to me as a personal matter that you understand the full answer to the question. The Department of Justice has probably spent more time analyzing the needs of an appropriate divestiture in this deal would have than any other transaction in its history. The analysis was done first in late 1984—

We have been on this quite some time. This is not just a little letter from the Justice Department because the Congressmen and Senators are extremely busy. They have now turned their minds to it. Nobody wanted to do it before Christmas. Now all of a sudden we come back in the midst of all these concerns. We have this. It is not just a letter. It is an analysis. An analysis was done first in late 1984.

—and an extensive list of requirements was developed and sent to the Department of Transportation, outlining the absolute requirements that would have to be met before a divestiture could be approved. The list was supplemented with further additional requirements in March. At that time in March—this is still Ginsburg testifying now.

the Department had become really quite intimate, I think, with the markets involved, with the facts surrounding them, with the shape or at least characteristics of an acceptable divestiture. A divestiture proposal was submitted in the spring, and the Department—

This is all a year ago.

—set about analyzing that and, as you know, engaged an outside consultant.

So we had an outside consultant come in and do its own analysis on the basis of the paper record.

The outside analysis tended to confirm our own doubts about that transaction, as well as to supply some specific data, needs for data that we agreed with, and on that basis we rejected the proposed divestiture.

So after analyzing some 15 participating bids, different proposals and everything else, we had a Norfolk Southern bid rejected on the basis of antitrust about a year ago by the Department of Justice.

Again reading from the testimony of Mr. Ginsburg:

About the same time, NS sweetened the deal. This was late September, about the 26th of September, with a modified divestiture plan. Now the task facing us in that circumstance was to analyze the modification, not the entire transaction. We had been spending—we had spent a year doing that, sir. It was to ask: Do the modifications meet the objections? We sent Secretary Dole a laundry list—

Listen to that.

We sent Secretary Dole a laundry list appended to the September 25 letter to her that sets up very specifically our concerns and the inadequacies and faults that we found with the then-proposed divestiture. So our task was to look at the revisions in the divestiture, the changes in it, which were now being proposed or were then being proposed, and compare them with our concerns and ask whether they meet those concerns, and the answer was they did not and we rejected that.

So you have on two occasions on an antitrust test by the Department of Justice—after even a year's study and outside private consultants—two rejections. This is a close bid. This is close competition.

If I were the lawyer for any entity trying to take over, I would want to take over the best deal I could get. If I could create, contrive, such as that one we had yesterday afternoon, the "take-your-money-and-run amendment," Morgan Stanley, I would be delighted to take a bunch of money on the outside and take it and run. Now I am sure that Norfolk Southern wanted to make sure thay could get every advantage they possibly could. There is no question about that. They made a bid that initially was not successful from an antitrust perspective.

Norfolk Southern had known all during 1985 that they were being perused, studied, and admonished by antitrust requirements of the Department of Justice. Listen, again, to Mr. Ginsburg:

On November 11 the carrier, Norfolk Southern, came back. We engaged in virtually continuous discussion at the staff level over the period from September 25 to November 11. On November 11, Norfolk Southern came back with another proposal, a proposal which, in basic outline, is a proposal that we have now accepted. But when we looked at that proposal and held it up against our concerns, we rejected that. We said, "No, we don't negotiate. All of these items have to be met, each and every one. This is not a horse trading kind of situation." And they came back with further responses and further responses on a virtually daily basis.

Senator SPECTER. You say you rejected the November 11 offer?

Mr. GINSBURG. The November 11th offer did not meet all of our concerns, and we said no, and we said we would not approve it, unless it was further modified to meet these concerns. These modifications were forthcoming in dribs and drabs, and on Tuesday morning of this week, the last of them was met and we accepted the proposal. Now the proposal we have accepted is, in basic outline, the November 11th proposal, but there were conditions that had to be added in order to make it acceptable. So I think—I think it's terribly important to bear in mind that we are working on a knowledge basis that has been developed over a year that has enabled us to evaluate proposals and modifications against the requirements that we laid out a year ago or in January.

Of course, we would be delighted to include the rest of the transcript here if necessary. We are trying to give Senators a feel for the deliberateness, the comprehensiveness, and the thoroughness with which Justice has operated. The Department of Justice has really already had an antitrust hearing that you would get before the courts, one better than you would get before the ICC.

I do not know where they are getting all of this. Well, of course, I do, if they want to get a delay and kill this. I do not care what the offer is—they just have at least the immunity they have right now. Norfolk Southern wants to get a railroad. They are interested in the railroad business. They are successful in operating one. They do make a profit, and they do not make it with lawyers. They do not want to buy a bunch of legal headaches. They want to get on with regular competition and the regular course of doing business and make money and not have to buy a bunch of legal headaches. Whoever we sent it to would have to have that particular provision in it, and everyone here, mature men and women of judgment, would understand that.

The antitrust immunity is limited to the merger itself. It would not extend to subsequent conduct that might be anticompetitive.

This is no "Good Government Award" and you can do as you please or do as you choose. Anything after which appears to be anticompetitive by CSX or any of the other railroads, rack them up, whatever it is. We are just trying to clear the decks to make an orderly purchase and not buy a bunch of legal headaches but get a railroad the best we can to continue that railroad service for the people of the United States.

That is what we boil down to. It has not been a hit-and-miss, ad-hoc kind of situation. This thing has been going on and on and has been looked at. By the way, we have had the hearings, and their lawyers have looked at it.

We have heard all the witnesses who opposed the sale to Norfolk Southern and who worry about this and worry about that. They had big worries, not antitrust. Conrail had that antitrust immunity.

No one is bringing a suit against Conrail because they could not under the law. But no one is claiming that of Conrail.

All of those opponents before the U.S. Senate are trying to depict Conrail as a big moneymaker and the great railroad success of all time. That is false, it is inaccurate. But they are not attacking anticompetitive practices by Conrail as of this moment. That is all we are saying. When we, the Government, sell Conrail to Norfolk Southern or anybody else, that is what they are buying, exactly what they have right now. And no one is complaining about anticompetitive practices by Conrail.

Once this sale is completed, there is no immunity. If they do engage in anticompetitive practices, then they have the recourse of the antitrust laws of the United States.

I have tried to bring it into focus because I have been listening to the debate for the last several days. This is a very important amendment and, in my opinion, it has gotten out of kilter with some idea that we really have not gotten the clearance.

You have the clearance better than the ICC. You have it from the Commerce Committee members who judiciously looked at this thing. We have had many hearings. We have cross-examined witnesses. Our staffs have looked at this. We have finally arrived at the same conclusion that Secretary Dole came to. She did a most thorough job.

Our next priority in trying to continue northeast rail service was the so-called antitrust immunity. There is no use in solving one problem of the Government and buying an antitrust problem in the next breath. We did not want to create problems, but to solve them. After that was solved, we looked at the remuneration for all the employees. We could go down the list, starting with the commencement of tax payments and all the other things, which amounts to $3.65 billion.

It is a good price. It is a good deal for the Government. It is a good deal for Norfolk Southern. There is really no antitrust problem here at this particular time.

We have Conrail at the moment operating without an antitrust charge. That is what we are trying to sell.

After that is disposed of, since it has been cleared now by the Justice Department, the only thing left to do is to walk those divestitures and tracks and everything else. There are more months on end to go through that. Everyone knows that.

In order to end that particular argument, we thought it wise that if the measure itself say without any appeals, without any judicial review, did not go through with those particular requirements made by the Department of Justice, that, in and of itself, would end the sale.

I do not know what other precaution we can take at this particular time, what else to include for further protection for the taxpayers of America.

Mr. President, I yield to the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIXON].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I shall be very brief in closing. In doing so, I express my appreciation to those on the other side. The distinguished manager has, in particular, been so accommodating. I want to repeat my high regard for him and my feeling that he has presented his case in a very fine and eloquent manner, as have his colleagues, including my warm friend, the distinguished Senator from South Carolina who has just concluded.

I want to make these three points in conclusion and say to those in their offices that very shortly, we shall be voting on this issue. There have been three points made in opposition that I think require response. I wish to answer each of the three.

The first is that my distinguished friend, the manager of the bill, and others say this is a killer amendment; a killer amendment. As an old trial lawyer, I would like every one of my colleagues to understand the corruption of reasoning in that argument. They are saying that to make them refute the argument that this has an antitrust characteristic would not be reasonable. They are saying they are not creating a monopoly here. They have said that many hundreds of times in this dispute. But they are saying, "Oh, my goodness, do not make us submit to the test of whether we are creating a monopoly." How can one reasonably argue that?

Both of my distinguished friends have said, "Oh, you are going to make us buy a lawsuit. Oh, we would not do that. Oh, Norfolk Southern would not buy this if they have to prove that it is not a monopoly."

Mr. President, let me tell you something: Just yesterday by a vote of 53 to 39, the Senate voted to let them get this railroad $600 million cheaper—$600 million cheaper—than the other offer. I am going to say in every public place in my State that any business I ever knew that could get a $600 million bargain ought to spend a couple of bucks on lawyers for a couple of days in court to establish that they have not created a monopoly that is going to crush business in the country.

Point 2. They say time—"Oh, this has taken such a terribly long time."

I say to my dear friends, it is less than a year, less than 1 year since Norfolk Southern was selected and under existing law, if you go before the Interstate Commerce Commission, it takes up to 31 months. They have used less than one-third of the time any other railroad would be subjected to under the existing law. The only other comparable situation with less than one-half of the impact, the Santa Fe case, is still pending. And they weep to us about time.

Last, my warm friend from South Carolina, for whom I have the deepest personal affection, argues, "Why, all you are doing here is giving to this merger the same immunity that Con-rail had." I agree with the basic premise, but let us examine the facts.

Conrail was the creation of six bankrupt railroads. All were going broke. And the Senate, before I was here, gave immunity to six bankrupt railroads to make one railroad. That is one thing. I can see honorable men and women voting for that. But what we are doing here is taking two great big, powerful, profitable railroads—Conrail and Norfolk Southern—both of them pumping money, and putting them together and making one railroad that creates a monopoly in the whole Eastern quadrant of this country. There is a difference.

I say in conclusion the test of this amendment is that the people who say that this is a monopoly—which it is—could go into court, file an injunction suit in 1 day. An injunction might or might not issue. The court system, which is good enough for every one of us in America, would work in the fair, dispassionate, unprejudiced, reasonable way that the American court system has always worked, and I shall state that every case I ever saw in the history of American jurisprudence that was properly tested from the trial court to the U.S. Supreme Court, in my judgment, has been fairly and decently treated. This case would be, too, and that is all that Norfolk Southern is entitled to.

I urge my colleagues to support the amendment.

Mr. PRESSLER and Mr. DANFORTH addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri is recognized.

Mr. DANFORTH. Let me say, Mr. President, before Senator PRESSLER makes his remarks, I know Senator PRESSLER has an amendment he wants to offer; Senator LAUTENBERG has an amendment he wants to offer; I believe Senator HEINZ has an amendment. I am not sure who else has an amendment.

The cloture vote is at 3 o'clock. I want to give everyone who has an amendment to offer an opportunity to do so if that is at all possible. It will be my intention to move to table this particular amendment in the near future, if possible.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, if the Senator from South Dakota will withhold, I would like to make just one statement to my colleague from Illinois. The impression could be with some that the Senators from our particular area—namely, let us say, from the South—necessarily approve and want Norfolk Southern to succeed on this particular bid. That is true to some extent, but it is not just a clear, uncompetitive kind of antitrust decision that I make politically here. Actually, what we had was the merger of Atlantic Coastline and the Seaboard Railroad with Chesapeake and Ohio. CSX—which is not only bigger than Norfolk Southern but more influential in my back yard. So in studying this thing over the last 2 years in the Commerce Committee, I have listened most carefully to my friend, Hays Watkins, and the others who are in competition there, to come down with a decision that I can live with, because this is not just a popular thing about the size and being anticompetitive.

Right now, the big one in the Northeast that you are talking about is CSX. When Conrail and Norfolk Southern merge, they will have practically equal tonnage. You will have an equal competitor.

In my judgment, with this particular approval recommended by the Department of Transportation and our distinguished colleague from Missouri, the Chairman of our committee, you will really be promoting—and I say that categorically—a competitor to CSX because of size and influence.

What I am doing here, rather than stifling competition, is improving it because of the revenue ton miles.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this particular point, a chart showing the change in revenue ton miles before and after the Norfolk Southern/Conrail combination.

There being no objection, the chart was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NORFOLK SOUTHERN CORPORATION

TABLE 1.—REVENUE TON-MILES FOR MAJOR RAILROADS—1984

DIXON-PRESSLER ANTITRUST AMENDMENT

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, as an original cosponsor of this amendment, I should like to add a few comments. First I commend my distinguished colleague on his excellent work in this area.

I am sorry to report to the Senate that the very serious anticompetitive consequences of this transaction simply have not been addressed by the Department of Justice. This is particularly troublesome because of the regulatory and antitrust immunity that would be conferred on the transaction by S. 638. Under the provisions of this bill as it currently stands, Norfolk Southern could take numerous steps to coordinate the operations of the two railroads in ways that would diminish or even ultimately close gateways with their smaller regional connectors who are also competitors. Incredibly, the Norfolk Southern has not even set out the transactions that it contemplates to coordinate their operations with Conrail. Yet, the regional carriers would be foreclosed from any antitrust review by the courts or by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

In the sober light of day, I find it difficult to believe that the U.S. Senate is willing to establish the Nation's largest rail monopoly and, in the same breath, confer upon it incredibly broad antitrust immunity. I commend my colleague, Senator DIXON, for his attempt to bring a measure of fairness to the process by creating an opportunity for some authority to review what the impact will be after the plans are actually made public. We are being asked to take a big gamble here without any protection whatsoever for competing railroads. We should have full information before us before we vote, but at the very least we should provide for some competent authority to review those plans rather than leaving it to the self-interested officials of the Norfolk Southern, without any opportunity for normal review by disinterested experts.

Mr. President, I conclude by saying that I think we are on the verge of creating a huge monopoly without a sufficient antitrust review, which will have an enormously bad effect on transportation and railroads but also will cause products to become more costly to consumers throughout the Nation.

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I rise as a cosponsor of the amendment offered by my distinguished colleague from Illinois, Senator DIXON, that would subject the sale of Conrail to Norfolk-Southern to the antitrust laws. This sale would clearly have significant antitrust implications, specifically with regard to competition for freight rail service in the Northeast and Midwest.

A sale of Conrail to Norfolk-Southern would reduce the number of major rail systems in the Northeast from three to two. It would likely cause higher rates and reduced service for many shippers currently served by either railroad.

Mr. President, among the most serious competitive problems posed by a sale of Conrail to Norfolk-Southern is the impact that the sale would have on shippers and receivers of bulk commodities such as coal. Coal, which accounts for 54 percent of our Nation's electricity, is largely dependent on railroads for overland transportation.

Norfolk-Southern and Conrail are both among the top five coal shippers in the Nation. Together they account for over one-quarter of the Nation's coal traffic.

A merged Norfolk-Southern/Conrail system would cause numerous and diverse competitive problems for coal producers and users. Consider the following facts. For overland movements, coal is captive to rail carriage; it cannot be moved competitively over long distances by truck. Electric utility consumers pay approximately two-thirds of the coal freight rail costs. As such, utility rates vary directly with coal transportation costs. According to a study by the Consumer Federation of America, 35 of the 144—25 percent—coal-burning utility powerplants currently served by Conrail or Norfolk Southern would lose a competitive rail transportation alternative if the railroads were merged.

The merger would thus increase electric rates for millions of industrial and residential consumers, discouraging industries and people from remaining or locating in the Northeast. The merger would also imperil coal exports from the east coast, which are a major source of economic activity for the coal regions in my State of Pennsylvania and its neighboring States. Forty-five million tons of coal, accounting for more than $2.3 billion, moved through east coast ports for export in 1984. I am particularly concerned about coal exports because of the tremendous performance of Conrail's Pier 124 at the Port of Philadelphia. During the first 9 months of 1984, Pier 124 shipped nearly 2.2 million tons of coal, more than four times the number of tons shipped during the same period of 1984. Given the numbers regarding our trade deficit, which become available today, I suggest that we should seriously question any proposal which threatens to reduce U.S. exports.

It is antitrust concerns that led the Justice Department to require Norfolk Southern to divest a portion of the combined system's rail assets in order for the Department to approve the sale. On two occasions, the Department has rejected Norfolk Southern's divestiture proposals; it has not yet ruled on the third such plan. This latest plan, it should be noted, does not even resolve competitive concerns in 15 of the 30 counties that the Justice Department deemed most serious in its studies of earlier plans. The Interstate Commerce Commission has likewise expressed skepticism with regard to the competition that would result from a sale to Norfolk Southern. In a report issued last July, the ICC stated that the two acquiring railroads under the divestiture plan, Guilford and the Pittsburgh and Lake Erie, did not have the financial resources or the traffic base to compete effectively with a merged Norfolk Southern/Conrail system.

Mr. President, if we are to approve the sale of Conrail to Norfolk Southern, the very least we should do is to provide for antitrust review of the sale. We must give shippers, railroads, and ports the opportunity to appeal to the courts or to the ICC if the merger does in fact prove the be anticompetitive.

I urge my colleagues to support this amendment.

Mr. DANFORTH addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri is recognized.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DANFORTH. I will be delighted to yield. For about how many minutes?

Mr. SPECTER. Not more than 5.

Mr. DANFORTH. All right.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, by way of very brief reply on an issue that I consider to be of enormous importance—and I think I have spoken extensively in the past, so I need not be long—I thank the distinguished Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HOLLINGS] for reminding us of the misgivings, as he puts it, by many with what the Department of Justice has done in the antitrust field.

The distinguished Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HOLLINGS] reminds us of the RCA and the Gulf-Chevron transactions; and were we to take the time this morning, there could be a litany of cases where the Department of Justice has been less than vigorous in its pursuit of antitrust issues.

Private treble damage actions have been formulated under our laws to give damaged citizens an opportunity to enforce the antitrust laws. As the distinguished Senator from South Carolina has reminded us, it is precisely those misgivings which ought not lead the U.S. Senate, the U.S. Congress, to delegate to the Department of Justice what is essentially our responsibility.

When the Senator from South Carolina talks about thoroughness and comprehensiveness, as he read from the transcript of the proceeding before the Judiciary Committee of November 21, 1985, I can personally attest to the fact that that informal hearing, which was not a Judiciary Committee hearing, left many more questions unanswered than were questions answered. Assistant Attorney General Ginsburg simply did not have the answers, nor did Secretary of Transportation Elizabeth Dole.

When the distinguished Senator from South Carolina enumerates the consideration by the Department of Justice, he should bear in mind—for he has had an opportunity to review the Department of Justice letters of January 8, 1986, to Guilford and Pittsburgh and Lake Erie—but all the questions are unanswered; and with respect to the conclusion in the January 29, 1985 letter from the Department of Justice that there is a violation of the antitrust laws without divestiture and the enumeration of factors in their letter of September 25, 1985, those questions, simply stated, have not been answered.

When the distinguished floor manager says there should be an end to controversy, I agree. But how in the world can you have an end to controversy when you do not know the facts? How can this body put its stamp of approval on this merger and say there should not be controversy when we do not know the operating plans of Pittsburgh and Lake Erie, and we do not know the divestiture details?

All we know is that what they have proposed in the past shows conclusively that you cannot stick the elephant through the eye of the needle. The facts are not in, and all the facts we know show an antitrust violation. So how can we have an end to controversy in this context?

When the distinguished Senator from Missouri says that the Department of Justice has the veto power, this Senator does not want to give the Department of Justice the veto power over what the U.S. Senate or the U.S. Congress does. This Senator does not want to delegate to the Department of Justice this critical question, in light of the conclusive conflict of interest which the Department of Justice has and because of its established lack of a track record in the antitrust field.

When we talk about this matter being a killer amendment, if it is a killer amendment, let the Norfolk Southern be killed, because that is what it deserves.

When the distinguished floor manager says that this amendment could make Norfolk Southern walk—pardon my rhetoric—that is fine with this Senator, as it does not allow Norfolk to roll.

On all the arguments and all the facts, I urge my colleagues to adopt the pending amendment.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, I move to table the amendment, and I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion to table the amendment. On this question, the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

AMENDMENT NO. 1438

(Purpose: To add provisions regarding the commencement of a proceeding by the Interstate Commerce Commission upon the request of a railroad alleging injury as a result of diversion of traffic from its lines.)

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, I call up my amendment No. 1438, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from South Dakota (Mr. PRESSLER), (for himself, Mr. DIXON, Mr. LONG, Mr. EXON, Mr. ABDNOR, Mr. ZORINSKY, Mr. SIMON, and Mr. HEINZ), proposes an amendment numbered 1438.

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 30, insert the following immediately after line 10:

PROCEEDING BY THE INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION

SEC. 303. (a) Within ten years after the date of consummation of the sale of the interest of the United States in the common stock of Conrail to Norfolk Southern Corporation, any railroad which—

(1) had rail operating revenues of less than $1 billion in calendar year 1985; and

(2) alleges that it has been injured by diversion of traffic from its lines as a result of the acquisition of Conrail by Norfolk Southern Corporation and the exercise of market power by the consolidated Norfolk Southern Corporation and Conrail system (hereinafter in this section referred to as the "consolidated system"), may petition the Interstate Commerce Commission to institute a proceeding under this section.

(b)(1) The Commission shall commence a proceeding under this section, if the Commission finds that such railroad, as a result of the exercise of market power by the consolidated system, has experienced—

(A) a diversion of traffic from its lines equal to or greater than three and one-half percent of the number of carloads handled by such railroad during calendar year 1985; or

(B) a rerouting of traffic that has resulted in a loss of revenues from such traffic that is equal to or greater than three and one-half percent of the total railway operating revenues of such railroad in calendar year 1985.

(2) For purposes of this subsection, Norfolk Southern Corporation shall be required to establish by clear and convincing evidence that such diversions have occurred because of superior service and efficiency on the route to which the traffic is diverted. In the absence of such evidence, the Commission shall presume that the diversions occurred as a result of the exercise of market power by the consolidated system.

(c) In any such proceeding, the Commission shall determine what additional divestitures or conditions are necessary to eliminate the market power of the consolidated system in each major rail market served by the consolidated system, and to provide to such railroad fully competitive alternative connecting service to each such major rail market. The Commission shall issue an order directing that such divestitures be completed and that such conditions be imposed. In determining whether the consolidated system has market power in any major rail market, the Commission shall accord substantial weight to merger guidelines issued by the Department of Justice.

(d) Divestitures ordered to be completed under this section shall be made at a price agreed upon by Norfolk Southern Corporation and the purchaser. If Norfolk Southern Corporation and the purchaser are unable to agree on such a price, the Commission shall fix a price for the divestiture which shall not reflect any value of the line to be divested that is attributable to the market power of the consolidated system in any rail market.

(e) The Commission shall issue a final order in any such proceeding within one year after the date of filing of a petition under subsection (a) of this section.

(f) Any order issued under this section shall be subject to judicial review in the same manner and to the same extent as orders issued by the Commission under chapter 113 of title 49, United States Code. Any divestiture ordered to be completed, or condition imposed, by the Commission under this section shall be deemed to be approved by the Commission under such chapter 113.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota is recognized.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield without losing his right to the floor?

Mr. PRESSLER. I yield to the distinguished minority leader. I do not yield the floor.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, it may be a little early for the distinguished majority leader to make a prognostication with respect to tomorrow. But is there anything at this point that he can tell us as to whether or not there is definitely going to be a session tomorrow with rollcall votes so that Senators who may be planning to go to the memorial service will know whether or not they will miss a vote?

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I have discussed the schedule with one of the managers of the bill. I have not discussed it with the other. It would be my hope we could finish action on this bill today. If that would occur, then we could be assured we would not be in session tomorrow.

The problem is if we are not in session tomorrow, we are on this bill all of next week. It is my hope we could take up TV in the Senate next week, and the Genocide Convention the following week.

But if we are going to spend another week on this, I see one or both of those probably falling by the wayside. But I think we will be in late this evening.

I have been advised by the distinguished Senator from Ohio that he intends to offer amendments if cloture should be invoked. I do not know how long that will take. Whether or not we will have Friday session depends on what happens I guess on the cloture vote, and what announcement he may have to make at that time.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished majority leader. Following the cloture vote with regard to this matter, will the distinguished majority leader be in a better position at that time?

Mr. DOLE. I certainly want to accommodate the Senators tomorrow, if we can.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Dakota yield?

Mr. PRESSLER. I yield.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I ask the majority leader. I am not sure I understand. If we do finish tonight, there will be votes tomorrow in spite of the fact that we are going to Houston. Is that correct?

Mr. DOLE. I do not want to be put in that position right at this moment. Let us wait and see what happens on the cloture vote. We want to accommodate Senators going to Houston obviously, though we also want to accommodate the managers of the bill, plus the legislative schedule that we are going to have in the next 30 days.

I hope we can reach some agreement later this afternoon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, I am offering this amendment to ensure competition between the proposed Norfolk Southern/Conrail Railroad and the many smaller railroads which could be jeopardized by such a merger. I will explain why this amendment is needed, its purpose, how it will work, and the rationale behind each of its specific substantive provisions.

I might just say that an explanation and a section-by-section analysis of the amendment, as well as the text of the amendment itself, can be found in the January 27 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on page 552 for those who would like to review it in more detail.

WHY THE AMENDMENT IS NEEDED

To state it very simply, this amendment is needed to protect small and regional railroads from being driven out of business as a result of Norfolk Southern's monopoly-like market position. Norfolk Southern would have the ability to devastate smaller railroads through traffic diversions. Let me explain:

Norfolk Southern and the Department of Transportation have argued before our Commerce Committee that (a) any diversion of traffic from small regional carriers as a result of this merger would be slight; and (b) the traffic that is diverted would be diverted as a result of increased efficiencies realized by the merger rather than because of the exercise of market power. They maintain that there will still be strong, effective competition for transcontinental traffic. But it is my fear that the essential element of effective competition will be absent in S. 638. This is so because Norfolk Southern will have a monopoly in the Eastern part of the United States. Because of its monopoly position in the East, Norfolk Southern will be able to divert transcontinental traffic from its present route to one which goes through a greater percentage of Norfolk Southern track, thereby assuring it a bigger percentage of the joint rate. This could be done even though a more direct and efficient route is available because Norfolk Southern will be able to dictate the route through which this transcontinental traffic will enter into its territory. It cannot do that today because it competes with Conrail for the traffic within its territory. After the merger it will control all effective access to the eastern markets. There is no evidence that Guilford or anyone else will be able to provide the kind of competition to prevent this from happening.

If the essential element of effective competition is absent in S. 638, the amendment I am intoducing today will be critical to the very existence of many smaller railroads within and outside the Norfolk Southern-Conrail region. If I am wrong and the competitive element is there, this amendment can never go into effect. The amendment specifically provides that the diversions must result from the exercise of market power by Norfolk Southern before it can be utilized.

Indeed, if the Department of Transportation is correct in its estimates, the amendment can never be used outside the NS/CR region. So I sincerely hope that the Department will support its passage. Last Friday I sent a letter to the Secretary of Transportation asking for the Department's support. I would like to quote from relevant parts of it here:

> Enclosed for your consideration is a copy of an amendment I will be offering to S. 638, the Conrail Sale Amendments Act. The purpose of this letter is to seek your support for its succesful passage in the Senate.
> As you know, my major concern with S. 638 is the potential adverse impact that a merged Norfolk Southern/Conrail Railroad system would have on the railroads in the Midwest and other parts of the country outside the immediate Norfolk Southern/Conrail region. Since the Department of Transportation has estimated that no railroad outside this area will suffer traffic diversions in exces of 2 percent of present traffic, it is my hope that you will be able to support the amendment.

Mr. President, I should say that the Department of Transportation has estimated that no more than 2 percent of traffic will be diverted. My amendment would not kick in unless there is a 3½-percent diversion. Then there would be a proceeding before the ICC. But if the Department of Transportation's own numbers that they have supplied the Commerce Committee and Congress are correct, they should be supporting this amendment. In a letter to the Department of Transportation I wrote:

> We have chosen the 3½ percent diversion figure because it represents the point at which the actual existence of some of these smaller railroads is threatened. I trust you will find this percentage figure to be extremely conservative as it would require diversions in excess of 200 percent of the Department's "most liberal case" estimates before it could be used by railroads outside the NS/CR region.
> If for any reason you find the 3½ percent figure to be out of line with the Department's estimate, I would be happy to substitute it with the actual percentage figures contained in the Department's June 28, 1985, letter to Chairman Danforth of the Senate Commerce, Science, and Transportation Committee.

So that offer was made to the Department Transportation with their own numbers on diversion of traffic. We have gone above that in this amendment with my eight cosponsors.

Let me say that this is of particular interest to railroads in the South, the Midwest, the West, and throughout the country because it would give them some protection during the 10-year period the amendment will be in effect. It will give them some protection from the monopoly. It does not reinstitute the Staggers Act. It does not reinstitute elaborate proceedings. I will explain what it does.

THE AMENDMENT'S PURPOSE

The purpose of the amendment is quite simple. It is to protect small and regional railroads from unfair market power and other anticompetitive pressures which could be exerted by a combined NS/CR Railroad. The rail system of the West and the Midwest, as well as the smaller Northeastern carriers, should not be sacrificed for the sole benefit of a single railroad.

The return of Conrail to the private sector represents the last chapter in the Federal Government's rescue of the Northeast rail system after the Penn Central and six other railroads collapsed in 1970. This amendment is designed to ensure that it is not the first chapter in the collapse of the rail system in the Midwest or other parts of the country. It would be ironic indeed if, by finally turning this system over to the private sector and getting the Federal Government out of the railroad business, we set the wheels in motion for larger railroad failures in other parts of the country, thereby starting the process all over again.

This amendment is the result of a sincere desire to avoid a potentially catastrophic situation with railroads in other parts of the country. It is not intended to be, and certainly should not be, a "killer amendment" of any kind. Indeed, I believe it will strengthen this legislation if adopted.

HOW THE AMENDMENT WILL WORK

Mr. President, this is a relatively brief, straightforward, and simple amendment. It is approximately three pages in length and the substantive provisions are as follows:

First, the amendment permits smaller railroads to petition the ICC to seek relief from diversions of traffic from their lines that are attributable to the acquisition of Conrail by Norfolk

Southern. The conditions precedent to seeking relief are first, that the petition be filed within 10 years of the consummation of the sale of the interest of the United States in the stock of Conrail to Norfolk Southern; second, that in calendar 1985 the petitioning railroad have had rail operating revenues less than $1 billion; and third, that the petitioning railroad allege the diversions result from the acquisition of Conrail by Norfolk Southern and the exercise of market power by the consolidated Norfolk Southern and Conrail System—the Consolidated System.

Second, the ICC will not be required to proceed with the petitioning railroad's claim unless it finds that the petitioning railroad, as a result of the exercise of market power by the Consolidated System, has suffered either: First, a diversion of traffic equal to or greater than 3½ percent of the number of carloads handled by the railroad in calendar 1985, or second, a rerouting of traffic that has resulted in a loss of revenues from such traffic equal to or greater than 3½ percent of the rail operating revenues of the petitioning railroad in calendar 1985.

Let me emphasize that we chose this number because it is much higher than the Department of Transportation's own estimate. They have not responded as to why they cannot support this amendment if they believe in the numbers they have put forward.

Third, if the ICC finds that the traffic diversions have occurred as a result of the exercise of market power, and only as an exercise of market power—as opposed to increased efficiency, and so forth—only if it occurs as a result of the exercise of market power and that is a finding that the ICC would have to make. Otherwise, you could not bring a case. Only then, if it is a monopolistic practice.

To repeat, if the ICC finds that the traffic diversions have occurred as a result of the exercise of market power, they will then determine the divestitures or conditions necessary to eliminate the market power of the Consolidated System, and to provide the petitioning railroad fully competitive connecting access to each major rail market.

For the benefit of those Senators and staff listening on their boxes, there has been some implication by the Department of Justice and the Department of Transportation that this would kick in if traffic were diverted for some other reason. That is not true. It would have to be as a result of the exercise of market power or the result of a monopoly being created by the sale of Conrail to Norfolk Southern which, incidentally, I believe would have monopolistic power. Whether it chose to exercise it or not remains to be seen.

That would do great damage to Midwest railroads, Southern railroads, Western railroads, and Eastern railroads that try to do business with this monopoly railroad.

Fourth, the amendment requires that any divestiture required shall be made at prices to be agreed by the Norfolk Southern and the divestee. In the event that the parties cannot agree on a price, the Commission is directed to set a price for the divested properties. In setting a price the Commission is directed not to take into account any value of the divested properties that results from the market power of the Consolidated System in any rail market.

And finally, the amendment requires that a final decision be made within 1 year of the date of filing the petition, and that the ICC follow the Normal Administrative Procedure Act and Interstate Commerce Act guidelines.

RATIONALE BEHIND CERTAIN PROVISIONS

Finally, Mr. President, I would like to explain the rationale behind some of the provisions of this amendment that I expect will be questioned by those who support Norfolk Southern's desire to have a clean bill with no amendments.

First and foremost I want to make it very clear that this is not an attempt to reregulate the industry in any way. I think that this is clear enough on its face, but I want to emphasize this point.

Indeed, many of the strongest advocates of deregulation support this amendment. This does not confer any unusual authority on the ICC. In fact, merger proposals normally are required to be approved by the ICC unless they have a specific statutory exemption, as is the case here.

When the ICC does approve a merger under the normal procedures, it frequently retains jurisdiction to modify conditions or to impose new conditions on the merged railroad if it utilizes its monopolistic conditions to the competitive detriment of other railroads. This is modeled after a frequent ICC practice and is not really giving the ICC any unusual authority that it does not have in most other mergers. In fact, it is simply restoring a small portion of what would normally have been within its power if Congress had not granted an exemption.

I think that is important to focus on, Mr. President, that when the ICC does approve a merger under the normal procedures, it frequently retains jurisdiction to modify conditions or impose new conditions, and that is what this would do. It is not a rebirth, not a part of Staggers, it is not an effort to reregulate. It is what is done in merger cases normally, except here where Congress has granted an exemption.

Second, the amendment requires Norfolk-Southern to show that the diversion resulted because of superior service and efficiency rather than because of its greater market power. This burden of proof is placed on Norfolk-Southern for two very good reasons. Most important, Norfolk-Southern will be the only entity with the data necessary to prove the reasons for the diversions. To place the burden on the petitioning railroad would be to require them to prove a negative. That is almost impossible in any case. Norfolk-Southern is clearly in the best position to prove what caused the diversions and the amendment reflects that reality.

The second reason is that Norfolk-Southern has consistently stated that no diversions will result from the merger. I feel it is only fair to require that they prove their point.

Mr. President, the Department of Transportation has indicated that at the most, the diversions will be 2 percent. Norfolk-Southern has consistently insisted there will be no diversions, so they both should be supporting this amendment if they mean what they say. I am amazed that they are not supporting the amendment, because it is well within the percentages they have given. It is well within the things Norfolk-Southern has said publicly. If we are to trust them, they should be supporting this amendment.

Mr. President, there were two letters sent, one by the Department of Transportation and one by the Department of Justice, stating their positions on the amendment I am now proposing. I just saw those letters last night. They have been circulated. I have circulated a letter in response to them to each Senator. Let me first make a few remarks about those letters, as I think that, if they are carefully read by staff and Senators, they will increase the reasons for my amendment.

As I am sure It is no surprise to anyone, both letters oppose the amendment. I am sure that the distinguished floor manager will be discussing them a bit later but I would like to address the individual points raised in each letter at this time as well. I ask unanimous consent that both letters be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORTATION,
FEDERAL RAILROAD ADMINISTRATION,
Washington DC.

The Honorable LARRY PRESSLER,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR PRESSLER: We strongly oppose your "diversion protection" amendment No. 1438 to the pending Conrail sale bill, S. 683, for a number of reasons.

Norfolk Southern has been negotiating in good faith with all the regional railroads who have approached them. They have already executed agreements with a number of regional railroads including the Soo/Milwaukee, Kansas City Southern, and Iowa Interstate railroads in the midwest.

The amendment you propose does nothing to address the concerns of the vast majority or regional carriers and their shippers. The remedy provisions neither adequately protect shippers nor provide a structure that is workable in real world situations. The amendment is also of doubtful constitutionality. As drafted, the amendment

Utilizes terms and concepts that have no legal meaning in ICC case law. It is thus impossible to say with certainly how the Commission will interpret its language, and whether the amendment will actually achieve what its authors intend.

The authority granted by the amendment is much broader than the author's apparent intent. Under the Pressler amendment as drafted a railroad suffering diversions in Minnesota could request trackage rights to New York City, and the ICC has full authority to grant them. Moreover, the amendment creates no procedure for sorting out conflicting claims to trackage by the dozens of railroads who could hypothetically be entitled to a remedy.

The remedies do not take adequate account of shippers' interests. For example, the "sale of line" provision could seriously damage shippers. Fragmenting Conrail into numerous smaller segments might expand the systems of some railroads, but it would force many shippers to pay joint rates and switching charges they do not pay today.

The amendment fails to mandate specific remedies to protect gateway access and joint routings. These are crucial shipper issues, as well as the basic remedy the carriers negotiating with Norfolk Southern have argued for.

For shippers served by two railroads, the amendment's use of line sales to shift market shares could reduce competition by eliminating one railroad from the market.

The line sale provisions would favor larger carriers, with liquid assets, over smaller carriers without them.

The compensation provisions are of questionable constitutionality, closely resembling a condemnation proceeding without a fair market value assessment.

While we agree that it is appropriate to address the concerns of the midwestern regional railroads, we think carefully crafted private agreements are the best answer.

Yours very truly,

JOHN H. RILEY,
Administrator.

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
ANTITRUST DIVISION,
Washington, DC.

Honorable JOHN C. DANFORTH,
Chairman, Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: The Senate is now considering S. 638, which would authorize the sale of the Government's interest in Consolidated Rail Corporation ("Conrail") to Norfolk Southern Corporation ("NS"). I am writing to express the strong opposition of the Department of Justice to proposed amendment No. 1438 to S. 638 offered by Senator Pressler on January 27, 1985. That amendment would authorize certain railroads for ten years to petition the Interstate Commerce Commission ("ICC") for divestiture of rail assets or imposition of conditions by alleging that they had been injured by the "diversion" of traffic as a result of the NS/Conrail merger and the exercise of market power by the consolidated NS/Contrail system. Unless NS could prove that the diversions had occurred because of "superior service and efficiency," the ICC would be required to presume that the diversions occurred as a result of the exercise of "market power" by NS/Conrail. The ICC would then be required to determine what additional divestitures or conditions were necessary to eliminate such market power in each "major rail market" served by the consolidated system.

The Department strongly opposes the proposed amendment because it raises serious competitive issues for the future of rail transportation in this country. First, under the amendment, a competitor of NS/Conrail could seek relief from the ICC if it merely alleged diversions that exceed three and one-half percent of the number of carloads handled by the affected railroad in 1985, or reroutings resulting in a loss to the affected railroad of revenues equal to or greater than three and one-half percent of its 1985 railway operating revenues. As demonstrated by the recent ICC staff study that examined the diversions that might result from an NS/Conrail merger, there is a wide variety of views as to how to define and calculate diversons. Moreover, diversions generally reflect efficiencies of improved transportation offerings, rather than competitive problems, made possible by rail mergers. Thus, a competitor of NS/Conrail need only allege "diversions" of three and one-half percent in order to trigger a complex ICC proceeding that could last up to one year and could result in a required divestiture or significant constraints on NS/Conrail operations that would be wholly unjustified by any competitive problems.

Second, the amendment is particularly troublesome because it would grant some railroads an unprecedented administrative vehicle by which to seek to seize rail lines from, or have onerous competitive conditions imposed upon, their rival without having to make even a preliminary showing that the alleged diversions resulted from the exercise of market power. Rather, the burden would be on NS to establish by "clear and convincing evidence" that the diversions occurred because of "superior service and efficiency on the route to which the traffic is diverted." In the absence of such a showing, the ICC would be required to presume the existence of market power and to order relief. This provision not only shifts the burden of proof from the party normally required to bear it—the petitioner—but it also imposes a higher standard upon NS than would normally be imposed in IC proceedings. Thus, this provision significantly enhances the likelihood that the amendment would undesirably frustrate shippers' choices and hinder rather than promote competition.

Third, the amendment would condemn the exercise of "market power" without defining that critical term. It thus is entirely unclear whether the amendment would condemn only predatory conduct and the exercise of monopoly power, or whether it also could be used to punish any effort by NS/Conrail to compete vigorously but lawfully. Moreover, the amendment states that the ICC "shall accord substantial weight" to the Department's merger Guidelines in determining whether NS/Conrail has "market power" in any relevant market. As we have repeatedly stated, however, the Department does not employ the Guidelines' Herfindahl-Hirschaman Index in measuring market concentration in analyzing rail mergers because of the unavailability of information necessary to perform the required calculations. Rather, the Department uses a variety of screening methodologies developed to assess the likely competitive effects of such transactions. Thus, this provision is fundamentally at odds with the way in which the Department analyzes the competitive aspects of rail mergers.

Fourth, this amendment would authorize the ICC to impose conditions that would require NS/Conrail to accept traffic from connecting carriers in order to maintain their competitive relationship. As we stated in our April 30, 1985 letter (a copy of which is enclosed) concerning an earlier proposal to amend S. 638, such conditions are, in effect, market allocation and pricing arrangements that undermine the ability of merging carriers to realize the efficiencies that could otherwise be realized through their merger. Such conditions may result in a significant attenuation of competition between the merged carriers.

For all these reasons, the new regulatory regime that the amendment would impose on the ICC and NS/Conrail probably would cause the loss of many, if not all, of the efficiencies that the NS/Conrail merger would otherwise produce, and would harm rather than promote vigorous competition in the rail industry. The Department of Justice strongly opposes this amendment.

Sincerely,

DOUGLAS H. GINSBURG,
Assistant Attorney General.

Mr. PRESSLER. I begin with the letter from the Department of Transportation. I stated earlier in the debate that the Department has long since lost its credibility and objectivity regarding this issue. Nothing illustrates the point better than this letter. Let me explain:

First, DOT says that Norfolk Southern has been negotiating in good faith with the regional railroads to work out the problems they originally said never existed. Mr. President, I have talked to several of the regional railroads and that is just not true. As proof, DOT cites three examples of railroads with whom Norfolk Southern has reached private agreement, Including "Iowa Interstate Railroads in the Midwest."

They do not bother to mention that the State of Iowa is adamantly opposed to this sale or that Iowa DOT is part of a Midwestern coalition opposed to this bill as written. They do not talk about the Chicago-Northwestern Railroad, the principal railroad that goes across my State and the State of Iowa.

I find it hard to believe that DOT and Norfolk Southern know what is best for Iowa better than does Iowa itself. I have had a series of meetings in my office with regional railroads from the West, the Midwest, and other parts of the country—the East, too—and that is simply not true. There have not been agreements reached or offered with most regional railroads. There have been some, but they have been done in a flavor which I question very much. I do not think they are in good faith because they have not offered the same thing to all the railroads.

Second, the letter states that this amendment does nothing to address the concerns of the vast majority of regional carriers and their shippers. Again, the position of the regional railroads and the shippers contradicts DOT's letter.

I have been informed as recently as this morning through contacts with the Coalition for a Competitive Conrail, which consists of shippers from across the Nation, and others, that shippers around the country support the concept of this amendment. They have not had the opportunity to read the amendment in detail, but they do support its concept and principle. The point is that the Department's comments in this area are way off base. As for the regional railroads, they have read it and support it as well without exception. If anyone can cite an exception to that, I would welcome their bringing that exception to the floor.

Third, the letter states that the amendment "utilizes terms and concepts that have no legal meaning in ICC case law." So it is uncertain "whether the amendment will actually achieve what its authors intend." This argument is a bit hard to address here, since the DOT did not bother specifying terms and concepts to which they are referring.

This is a very vague charge to send around in a letter to all Senators. It is hard for me to answer. The only plausible interpretation we can give this argument is that they were repeating the concern of the Department of Justice about the extent to which the term "market power" is defined. For that, the amendment clearly directs the ICC to the interpretation given it in many other agency cases. To the extent that DOT implies the concept of market power is foreign to the ICC, I can only assume they have not read the Interstate Commerce Act. The term "market power" is most clearly used there. Let me quote a phrase from section 10505 of that act. The purpose of that section is "to protect shippers from the abuse of market power."

Fourth, the DOT claims that the amendment gives the ICC much broader authority than the authors intended, citing an outrageous example of a Minnesota railroad requesting trackage rights into New York. The amendment clearly limits the authority of ICC to provide relief only to the extent "necessary to eliminate the market power of the consolidated system."

Of course, it leaves discretion to the ICC. It does so because there is no way to predict the specific conditions under which a regional railroad will be harmed. But to imply that the ICC will be so irresponsible in the implementation of any statute really does not—it just could not be true. The short answer to this question is simply this: If the ICC cannot be trusted to provide a reasonable remedy, as required by the amendment, as they have in every other merger case, then indeed, one should vote against the amendment.

Fifth, the DOT almost humorously argues that the amendment might favor large railroads over small ones. Again, they fail to elaborate on this statement, so it is hard to determine their rationale. Maybe by small carriers, they are referring to Norfolk Southern. All the small railroads we have heard from favor this amendment, so I have a hard time understanding DOT's point.

The sixth point regarding the two letters that were sent around last night, is that the DOT questions the constitutionality of the amendment's compensation provisions. Evidently, DOT mistakenly interprets this to be a condemnation provision. this is clearly not the case. This is simply a condition of sale that Norfolk Southern is perfectly free to refuse and therefore raises no constitutional question.

Mr. President, I have one final comment on those letters.

The DOT letter states:

• • • the amendment fails to mandate specific remedies to protect gateway access and joint routings. These are crucial shipper issues, as well as the basic remedy the carriers negotiating with Norfolk Southern have argued for.

Mr. President, that is exactly the kind of amendment I offered in the Commerce Committee, which DOT opposed. Now they say they would have supported it. They have changed their minds. Perhaps I should bring it up here. I would be very pleased to offer the amendment I offered in the Commerce Committee if they would agree to support it—at least, from the language I have read, which is contradictory. I suspect that they would find another reason not to support it.

Apparently, DOT is interested in preserving deregulation when it suits its purposes.

The fact is that the Department will not support my amendment. That is the truth of the matter. This is clear from their position on every good-faith amendment offered here today. This is a good-faith amendment; by the very standards DOT has set up, they should endorse this amendment. By the very things they said before the Commerce Committee, they should endorse this amendment. By the very things Norfolk Southern has said, they should endorse this amendment.

It seems that we are in the position that Norfolk Southern feels they can push this bill through the Senate without accommodating regional railroads in any way. This is a very small accommodation, and I think the letters that the Department of Justice and the Department of Transportation sent are contradictory. They contradicted things they said in the committee. They were vague, and I think they are misleading. I hope Senators and staff members listening will take a look at them in light of the six points I have made.

Mr. President, I wish to read a letter that I sent to John Riley, Administrator. I will read from the letter—I shall not read all of it—which I have circulated to every Senator, but some of the staff listening may have not obtained this letter.

Mr. President, after reading this letter I believe I will ask that my amendment be laid aside, to be brought back later this afternoon for a vote. I do not ask that yet. I want to get the correct language here, and Chairman DANFORTH and I are working on that.

If someone can write me the correct language to do that and preserve my rights to vote, I would appreciate it.

I do want to share this letter with those listening on the boxes, and let me say, Mr. President, I think that this amendment is an example of the frustrations some Senators have had in getting any change.

The Department of Transportation and Norfolk Southern feel that they have the votes to plow on ahead full speed and they are going to run into great difficulty in the House of Representatives unless they are much more flexible.

There have been a lot of good faith efforts from smaller regional railroads to enter into agreement with Norfolk Southern. They have been brushed aside. There have been a lot of good faith efforts by Senators, and I have joined with my colleague, Senator LONG, in the Commerce Committee to get small changes to accommodate some of the smaller railroads. The Department of Transportation's and the Department of Justice's response has been to totally distort the content of the amendments and go forward simply because they feel they have the votes and they are not willing to accommodate anywhere.

I found the flavor of this to be a bit unpleasant because, by the Department's own numbers and by what Norfolk Southern has said, they should be supporting this amendment.

Let me read the letter that I have addressed to John Riley regarding the letters that were sent.

Last night I was able to obtain through another Senator a copy of your undated letter to me stating the Department of Transportation's opposition to my amendment.

I might say that although the letter is addressed to me, we did not obtain a copy of it except through another Senator.

Although your position is no surprise, I was disappointed that the Department cannot support an amendment which could never go into effect unless the figures you supplied the Senate were incorrect by a factor of two. Let me respond to the issues you raise.

First, you state the Norfolk Southern has been negotiating in good faith with the regional railroads to work out the problems they originally said never existed. You made the same arguments in another eleventh hour letter delivered on the morning of a Commerce Committee vote on another regional amendment. But Norfolk Southern has never made any substantial offers to any of the railroads most adversely affected by the merger. They have negotiated deals with only those railroads which are politically necessary or which are not substantially impacted. As proof of Norfolk Southern's "good faith" negotiations, you cite three examples of railroads with whom Norfolk Southern has reached a private agreement, including "Iowa interstate railroads in the Midwest." But you fail to mention that the State of Iowa is adamantly opposed to this sale, or that the Iowa DOT is part of a midwestern coalition opposed to S. 638. I find it hard to believe that the DOT or Norfolk Southern know what is better for Iowa than does Iowa itself.

Second, the letter states that this amendment "does nothing to address the concerns of the vast majority of regional carriers and their shippers." Again, the position of the regional railroads and the shippers contradicts your letter. I have been informed as recently as this morning through contacts from the Coalition for a Competitive Conrail, which consists of shippers across the nation, that shippers around the country support the concept of this amendment. They have not had the opportunity to read the amendment in detail, but they do support its concept and principles. As for the regional railroads, they have read it and support it as well.

Third, the letter states that the amendment "utilizes terms and concepts that have no legal meaning in ICC case law" and so it is uncertain "whether the amendment will actually achieve what the authors intend." This argument is a bit hard to address here since you did not specify the "terms and concepts" to which they were referring. The only plausible interpretation I can give this argument is that you were repeating the Department of Justice's concern about the definition of the term "market power." The amendment clearly directs the ICC to the interpretation given in many other agency cases. To the extent that DOT implies the concept of "market power" is foreign to the ICC, I can only assume that you have misread the Interstate Commerce Act. The term "market power" is used most clearly there. Let me quote a phrase from Section 10505 of that Act. A purpose of Section 10505 is "to protect shippers from the abuse of market power."

Fourth, you state that the amendment gives the ICC much broader authority than the authors intended, citing and outrageous example of a Minnesota railroad requesting trackage rights into New York. The amendment clearly limits the authority of the ICC to provide relief only to the extent "necessary to eliminate the market power of the consolidated system."

Let me say that citing that example of a Minnesota railroad seeking trackage rights into New York would have nothing to do with this. There would have to be a showing of abuse of market power of the consolidated system.

Of course it leaves discretion to the ICC. It does so because there is no way to predict the specific conditions under which a regional railroad will be harmed. But to imply that the ICC would be so irresponsible in the implementation of any statute is ridiculous. The ICC has this broad authority in virtually every other merger case.

Fifth, you argue that the amendment might favor large railroads over smaller ones. You fail to elaborate on this statement, so it is hard to determine your rationale. Maybe by "small carriers" you are referring to Norfolk Southern. All the small railroads we have heard from favor this amendment, so your point is difficult to understand.

Sixth, you question the constitutionality of the amendment's compensation provisions. Evidently, you mistakenly consider this to be a condemnation provision. That is clearly not the case. This is simply a condition of sale that Norfolk Southern is perfectly free to refuse, and therefore raises no constitutional question.

Finally, and most outrageously, the letter states "the amendment fails to mandate specific remedies to protect gateway access and joint routings. These are crucial shipper issues, as well as the basic remedy the carriers negotiating with Norfolk Southern have argued for." This is exactly the kind of amendment I offered in the Commerce Committee, which you opposed by saying it would reregulate the railroad industry. It seems to me that the Department's double standard here has come back to haunt you. I would be very pleased to reoffer that amendment on the floor today if you would agree to support it. Apparently, DOT is interested in preserving deregulation only when it suits its purposes.

THE ICC'S JURISDICTION

Mr. President, the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission to impose conditions on mergers is extremely broad. Section 11344(c) of the Interstate Commerce Act specifically provides that "The Commission may impose conditions governing the transaction."

In Baltimore & Ohio R. Co. v. United States, 386 U.S. 372 (1986) the Supreme Court described this power of the ICC as follows:

Once a valid order is entered by the Commission, it, of course, has the power to retain jurisdiction for the purpose of making modifications that it finds necessary in the light of subsequent circumstances or to assist in compliance with prior conditions. 386 U.S. at 387.

The Commission has exercised this power broadly with the approval of the courts. For example, in approving the merger of the Northern Pacific and the Great Northern Railway, the Commission retained jurisdiction to require inclusion of other railroads stating as follows:

The Commission shall retain jurisdiction over these proceedings for a period of 5 years following consummation of the transactions herein authorized, or such other period as the Commission, for good cause shown, may hereafter prescribe for the purpose, among others, of considering petitions under section 5(2)(d) of the act, by any railroad in the territory involved requesting inclusion in the merger so authorized. The Commission shall also retain jurisdiction over these proceedings for a period of 5 years following consummation of the transaction herein authorized, or such other period as the Commission, for good cause shown, may hereafter prescribe, to impose such just and reasonable conditions upon petition by any party in interest, or in its own motion, after hearing, as may be necessitated by any cumulative or crossover problems stemming from approval of this merger and any other transaction authorized under section 5 with respect to the territory involved. Consummation of the transactions herein authorized shall constitute irrevocable assent by applicants to the power of this Commission to impose, after hearing, such just and reasonable conditions as may be necessary or appropriate. 331 ICC at 359.

When the BN sought to attack the ICC's jurisdiction to impose these conditions, the Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals in Chicago stated:

[W]e hold that the ICC had jurisdiction to impose Condition 33. Section 5(2)(d) gives the ICC authority in a railroad merger proceeding to require the inclusion in the merged line of another railroad in the same territory "as a prerequisite to its approval" of the merger. In the present case, the ICC merely conditioned its approval of the merger on, inter alia, a five year reservation of jurisdiction to consider § 5(2)(d) petitions for inclusion of other railroads in the territory. The ICC has such authority. Section 5(2)(d) provides in part that the ICC shall approve a proposed merger if it finds that subject to such terms and conditions and such modifications as it shall find to be just and reasonable, the proposed [merger] . . . will be consistent with the public interest, . . . [Emphasis added.]

Condition 33 is a condition which the ICC imposed as being consistent with the public interest. It cleared the way for the ICC to proceed with the authorization for an important merger, . . . Chicago Milwaukee v. United States, 585 F.2d (7th Cir. 1978).

The ICC unquestionably has jurisdiction to condition the approval of a merger on the grant of trackage rights or the divestiture of lines, just as it has the jurisdiction to require inclusion of another railroad. Most mergers have included conditions requiring alleviation of anticompetitive consequences. For example, in the Union Pacific merger case, the Commission required the Union Pacific to give the Denver & Rio Grande trackage rights from Pueblo, CO, to Kansas City, and the Southern Pacific trackage rights from Kansas City to St. Louis.

There is no statutory reason why the ICC's power to retain jurisdiction to order postmerger divestitures or grants of trackage rights in light of postmerger experience should be any narrower than its power to retain jurisdiction to require postmerger purchase of other railroads in the light of postmerger experience.

Indeed, the Commission has exercised its authority to retain jurisdiction to require postmerger divestitures or grants of trackage rights as recently as January 8, 1985, decision in Finance

Docket No. 29640 (Sub. No. 9) on the proposed Milwaukee Road by several carriers, including Chicago & North Western, the Soo Line, and the Grand Trunk. In addressing a Burlington Northern request for trackage rights to certain utilities in the event the Chicago & North Western were permitted to purchase the Milwaukee, the Commission stated at p. 26 of its decision:

> While the evidence before us does not demonstrate a need to impose such a trackage rights condition at this time, however, we recognize that evidence could arise at some future date that would justify such a condition. For example, if, following a CNW/MILW combination, the utilities experienced appreciably diminished service levels or significantly increased rates that were attributed to the acquisition, imposition of trackage rights could be justified. Accordingly, we will retain jurisdiction to consider imposing these conditions at some future date if the need arises.

There is simply nothing out of the ordinary in the ICC retaining jurisdiction to perfect its merger decisions in the light of postmerger experience. As I have pointed out, this has included postmerger jurisdiction to require the purchase of other railroads (the Northern Lines Merger case), and to require the postmerger grant of trackage rights (Milwaukee acquisition). It has also encompassed retention of jurisdiction to estabish a price for trackage rights granted in the merger decision (See Union Pacific Merger Decision, 366 I.C.C. 459 (1982)), and to establish the price for a railroad included in the merger (See Penn Central Merger Decision requiring inclusion of the New Haven, 330 I.C.C. 328).

Concededly, in the majority of Interstate Commerce Commission cases, the Commission has been able to articulate fairly specifically the areas in which post-merger remedial action may be required. This is possible because, by the time a decision is issued, the Commission has conducted a detailed examination of the competitive consequences of a proposed merger, and the adequacy of the proposed remedies, with the assistance of a fully developed public record produced with the opportunity for cross-examination.

The process that has been followed in connection with this merger proceeding simply doesn't permit this level of specificity. The Congress is being asked to approve the merger before the Department of Justice has even let the contract to a consultant to study the viability of proposed divestees. The details of this transaction are shrouded in mystery. So far as we have been able to determine, the Department of Justice has not yet obtained from Guilford, Pittsburgh & Lake Erie, or Norfolk Southern any operating or financial plans that would show whether the competitive problems that the Department of Justice identified in its January 29, 1985, letter have, in fact, been solved. The Department of Justice concedes that it has not examined the effect of the merger on carriers outside the Conrail region. The ICC simply wouldn't give approval to such a transaction without determining the effect of the transaction on connecting and competing carriers, and resolving the issues that are still open here. Indeed, if it did, the Court of Appeals would reverse it as did the Supreme Court in Baltimore & Ohio v. United States, 386 U.S. 372 (1967), where the Supreme Court, while approving the power of the ICC to retain jurisdiction to make postmerger adjustments, said that the Commission simply had not performed its duties prior to approving the merger.

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, I have been given a copy of a recent letter to Senator DANFORTH, the chairman of the Commerce Committee, on which I serve, from Assistant Attorney General Douglas Ginsburg, which expresses "strong opposition" to the Pressler amendment, which I have cosponsored, giving modest protection to regional railroads.

This does not surprise me, in that Mr. Ginsburg has increasingly taken the posture that there is no such thing as a bad merger. Mr. Ginsburg is distressed that small carriers competing against the new $7-billion giant could seek relief from the Interstate Commerce Commission because, argues Mr. Ginsburg, "diversions generally reflect efficiencies of improved transportation offerings."

Mr. President, Mr. Ginsburg ignores the fact that major diversons will be off carriers who are already in a fragile condition. I suggest that Mr. Ginsburg talk to shippers in Nebraska as to whether they agree that the Chicago North Western should contribute to a Norfolk Southern owned Conrail, or to shippers in Michigan as to whether the Ann Arbor Railroad or Grand Trunk should contribute, or to shippers in Louisiana as to whether the Illinois Central should contribute, or to shippers in New York as to whether the Susquehanna should contribute, or to shippers in Vermont as to whether the Central Vermont should make its contribution by diverting traffic to the largest transportation monopoly in the world in the name of "efficiency."

I suggest, Mr. President, that the answer is a resounding "No." The taxpayers of Nebraska have already contributed to Conrail. We are not going to ask our shippers to contribute Chicago Northwestern profit to Norfolk Southern's new Conrail acquisition without some kind of protection.

I strongly urge my colleagues to get off the kick that is obviously on in the U.S. Senate to vote down every amendment and to ram through the administration-dictated sale of Conrail to Norfolk Southern, lock, stock, and barrel, without thinking, without amendment, without any change.

I strongly urge my colleagues to understand what is going on and to support at least this much needed amendment by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PRESSLER].

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I am an original cosponsor of the amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota. I have cosponsored this amendment because of my concerns regarding the serious impact a merger of Conrail and Norfolk Southern may have on small and regional railroads.

Mr. President, I have been contacted by a number of shippers, port authorities, and elected officials within my State about this issue. These individuals are greatly concerned that a merger of Conrail and Norfolk Southern will jeopardize service to Louisiana by the Illinois Central Gulf Railroad.

Many shippers in my State depend upon the ICG for rail service. These shippers fear that a consolidated Conrail/Norfolk Southern system—by virtue of its enormous size—will divert traffic away from the much smaller ICG and to the new merged system.

The ICG projects that this diversion could result in a revenue loss of up to $51 million per year. If this projection proves to be accurate, both the ICG and its customers in Louisiana stand to lose a great deal.

The amendment under consideration is a direct response to this problem. It is intended to insure that shippers who depend upon small and regional carriers will not have their service disrupted as a result of the proposed merger of Conrail and Norfolk Southern.

Mr. President, there are some who may argue that Congress should not attempt through legislation to protect these smaller railroads and their customers. Opponents of this amendment may argue that any traffic diversions that result from the merger are simply the consequences of the market in operation.

What these opponents overlook is the fact that it is Congress that is being asked to approve the very merger which threatens these smaller lines. It is only Congress through adoption of the Pressler amendment that can attempt to prevent the problems this merger will create. Surely, we owe this much to these smaller railroads and their customers.

Mr. President, the amendment under consideration is limited in scope. It is only applicable to small and regional railroads who suffer traffic losses as a result of the market power of the consolidated Conrail/Norfolk Southern system. Traffic losses for any other reason fall outside of this amendment.

This amendment provides a remedy through the ICC in the event that a small or regional railroad sustains traffic losses of 3½ percent or more as a result of the merger. The Department of Transportation is of the opinion that diversions of this size are not likely to occure. I hope this is true.

I also know that good intentions are of little benefit if significant diversions do, in fact, occur as a result of the merger Congress is being asked to approve.

This amendment is necessary to insure that small and regional railroads and their customers are treated fairly. I certainly urge my colleagues to support this proposal.

REGIONAL RAILROAD AMENDMENT

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my distinguished colleague from South Dakota, Senator PRESSLER, in offering this amendment designed to provide much-needed protection for small and regional railroads from at least some of the anticompetitive effects of a Conrail-Norfolk Southern merger.

Our amendment permits these small railroads to go to the Interstate Commerce Commission for relief if they experienced traffic diversion of 3½ percent or greater due to the anticompetitive impacts of the merger. The amendment is not designed to protect small railroads from stronger competition, only from monopoly power.

The need for this amendment is clear. The Government has a responsibility to return Conrail to the private sector in a manner which treats all affected parties, including small railroads, as fairly as possible. S. 638 does not meet this responsibility. Instead, it immunizes the merger from the antitrust laws, and provides affected railroads and others with none of the usual procedural mechanisms available at the Interstate Commerce Commission. In other railroad mergers, small railroads and large railroads have a chance to argue competitive issues before the ICC, and to obtain appropriate relief if they make their case. In this proposed sale, however, they have not been provided with any such opportunity.

It must be remembered that the Midwest, where many of these smaller railroads operate, has already suffered dramatically from major restructuring of its railroad industry. The Rock Island Railroad was liquidated. The Milwaukee road also fell into bankruptcy; it lost most of its trackage and the remnants were merged into the Soo Line. Other Midwestern railroads, while continuing to exist, are smaller and have been financially weakened by the major mergers that occurred around them.

It is also important to remember that the Federal Government has an important financial stake in the continued financial health of many of these railroads. Several hundred million dollars in Federal direct loans and loan guarantees—including loans at below-market interest rates—have been made to the small Midwestern railroads. To cite just three examples, the Chicago and Northwestern received roughly $200 million, the Illinois Central Gulf received $152 million, and the Milwaukee received $60 million. This is more than one-third of the amount the Government will receive from Norfolk Southern for Conrail. If the monopoly power of a Conrail-Norfolk Southern system erodes the earning power of Midwestern and other small railroads, the Government will, in effect, be responsible for working to undermine the ability of these railroads to repay it.

It is clear, Mr. President, that the Department of Transportation's recommendations will cause substantial diversions of traffic from Midwestern railroads. The staff of the Interstate Commerce Commission found that the Chicago & Northwestern could lose over $45 million in traffic; the Illinois Central Gulf could lose over $32 million; and the Grand Trunk Western could lose almost $29 million.

The amendment we are offering, however, is not based on these figures. Instead, it is based on estimates made by the Department of Transportation. The Department asserts that no railroad will suffer more than 2-percent diversion. The amendment almost doubles the Department's figures, and requires railroads to demonstrate diversion of 3½ percent caused by the anticompetitive aspects of the proposed merger in order to go before the ICC.

If the Department's view is correct, the amendment will never go into effect. If the Department is wrong, however, this amendment is essential to provide at least minimal protection to railroads that could be devastated by the anticompetitive effects of the Department's recommended solution.

Mr. President, I believe this amendment is a reasonable solution to a problem ignored by S. 638. It provides a safety net for small railroads in case, as I believe, the Department of Transportation is wrong, and diversions caused by the monopoly power of a combined Conrail-Norfolk Southern system are much greater than they are now estimating. I hope my colleagues will find it possible to support this amendment. I earnestly urge its adoption.

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, if the chairman of the Commerce Committee is agreeable, I am prepared to lay this amendment aside so another can be offered, if we can return to it later.

Mr. DANFORTH. All right.

Senator LAUTENBERG. I know has an amendment to offer. He is not on the floor now.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri yield for a moment?

Mr. DANFORTH. Yes.

Mr. METZENBAUM. If I could have the attention of the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. DANFORTH. Senator PRESSLER has the floor, I believe.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Will the Senator from South Dakota yield?

Mr. PRESSLER. I have not yielded the floor.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Dakota yield for a question?

Mr. PRESSLER. Yes.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Would the Senator from South Dakota be willing, in his unanimous-consent request, laying his measure aside temporarily and be willing at the same time to include the fact that the Senator from Ohio might offer an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota and that also could be laid aside with the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. PRESSLER. That is fine. Yes.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that my amendment be temporarily laid aside until the hour of 1:45 p.m.

Mr. METZENBAUM. With the understanding that the Senator from Ohio may offer an amendment to the pending amendment?

Mr. PRESSLER. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is that the Senator's understanding?

Mr. PRESSLER. Yes.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I wonder if the Senator from South Dakota wants to set aside the amendment until a time certain. Why not just lay his amendment aside and in that case he could just call for the regular order and bring his amendment up?

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I say if the Senator from South Dakota does that and someone has the floor or we are in a quorum call, he would not be able to call his amendment up unless he had unanimous consent for a time certain. I think I am right.

Mr. PRESSLER. Let us say 1:45, so the Senator from New Jersey can proceed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Do we have a request?

Mr. PRESSLER. I submit the request.

Mr. METZENBAUM. And with that is the provision that the amendmemt of the Senator from Ohio can be called up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? If not, it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT NO. 1569

(Purpose: To direct the Secretary of Transportation to solicit and consider new sealed, competitive bids for the purchase of the interest of the United States in the common stock of Conrail)

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. METZENBAUM] proposes an amendment numbered 1569 to amendment No. 1438.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment reads as follows:

In lieu of the language proposed to be inserted, insert the following:

That this Act may be cited as the "Conrail Sale Act of 1985".

SEC. 2. (a) As soon as is practical, the Secretary shall solicit and consider new, sealed, competitive bids for the purchase of the common stock of Conrail. The specifications for such bids shall be sufficiently detailed so as to assure sufficient information and data for use by the Secretary in considering among others, matters such as the use of money and other assets of Conrail; the source of cash payment for such common stock; and the protection of the rights and benefits of the current employees of Conrail.

(b) One hundred eighty days following the date on which the Secretary solicits bids under subsection (a) of this Section, the Secretary shall report to Congress the results of such solicitation.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays in connection with my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there sufficient second?

There does not appear to be a sufficient second.

Under the previous order, the two amendments are set aside until 1:45.

AMENDMENT 1570

(Purpose: To protect affected regions after implementation of the Secretary's plan)

Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, Senators Moynihan and Bradley, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call reort.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. LAUTENBERG], for himself, Mr. MOYNIHAN, and Mr. BRADLEY, proposes an amendment numbered 1570 to amendment No. 1437.

Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment reads as follows:

On page 19, insert before line 1 the following new section:

SEC. 111. (a) The Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new title:

"TITLE VIII—PROTECTION OF AFFECTED REGIONS AFTER IMPLEMENTATION OF THE SECRETARY'S PLAN

"DEFINITIONS

"SEC. 801. (a) For purposes of this title—

"(1) the term 'affected region' means any State, county, port or port district in which any dominant railroad is the only railroad—

"(A) owning or controlling trackage rights into such region; or

"(B) carrying in excess of 80 percent of the total interstate rail freight in such region;

"(2) the term 'alternative railroad' means any railroad that desires and is capable of providing railroad transportation in an affected region, but lacks necessary trackage rights;

"(3) the term 'dominant railroad' means—

"(A) the Corporation or Norfolk Southern Corporation after the date of implementation of the Secretary's Plan pursuant to section 401(a)(4) of this Act and the sale of the interest of the United States in the common stock of the Corporation to Norfolk Southern Corporation pursuant to section 401(a)(5) of this Act; or

"(B) any corporation created by Norfolk Southern Corporation as a result of such implementation and such sale, which, acting jointly or severally, operates as a railroad in an affected region, and owns or controls all trackage rights into such region or carries in excess of 80 percent of the total interstate rail freight in such region; and

"(4) the term 'governmental authority of any affected region' means any governmental authority authorized by appropriate State law, Federal law, or agreements between or among States to maintain legal actions on behalf of an affected State, county, port or port district.

"PROTECTION OF AFFECTED REGIONS

"SEC. 802. (a)(1) The governmental authority of any affected region may file a complaint in the United States district court for any district in which such affected region is located, seeking an order granting trackage rights into such region for any specified alternative railroad. All relevant dominant railroads shall be named as defendants in such complaint.

"(2) The court may grant the relief sought by the complaint if the plaintiff governmental authority establishes, by a preponderance of the evidence that—

"(A) the specified alternative railroad sought in good faith to negotiate an agreement with the defendant dominant railroad pursuant to section 11343(a)(6) of title 49, United States Code;

"(B) such negotiations were not successful; and

"(C) granting of the trackage rights sought in the complaint is practical and will not unreasonably impair the operations of the defendant dominant railroad over the affected rail lines.

"(3) If the court determines that the plaintiff governmental authority has met its burden under subparagraphs (2)(A) and (B) of this subsection, but not with respect to subparagraph (2)(C), the court shall prescribe such lesser amount of trackage rights, if any, that plaintiff by preponderance of the evidence establishes is practical and will not unreasonably impair the operations of the defendant dominant railroad over the affected rail lines.

"(b) The court shall establish the terms of any traffic rights ordered under subsection (a). The terms shall include such payment to the defendant dominant railroad by the specified alternative railroad that provides adequate compensation for the use of the affected rail lines. Adequate compensation shall include a fair contribution to the profits of the defendant dominant railroad.

"(c)(1) Operations by any specified alternative railroad pursuant to the grant of trackage rights under subsection (a) are contingent upon the execution by the defendant dominant railroad and any specified alternative railroad of an agreement embodying all the terms established by the court under subsection (b). The court shall order the defendant dominant railroad to execute such agreement.

"(2) The agreement referred to in paragraph (1) of this subsection, upon execution by the dominant railroad and a specified alternative railroad, shall be exempt from the antitrust laws and from all other laws, including State and municipal law, as necessary to allow the parties to implement the agreement, in the same manner as an agreement made pursuant to section 11341 of title 49, United States Code.

"(3) The court which orders the grant of trackage rights shall have exclusive jurisdiction to resolve any disputes arising under the executed agreement referred to in paragraph (1) of this subsection.

"(d) The remedies provided for in this section shall not preclude any action or relief pursuant to the Sherman Act (15 U.S.C. 1 et seq.).".

(b) The table of contents of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"TITLE VIII—PROTECTION OF AFFECTED REGIONS AFTER IMPLEMENTATION OF THE SECRETARY'S PLAN

"Sec. 801. Definitions.

"Sec. 802. Protection of affected regions.".

Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, I rise to offer an admendment to S. 638 to address some of the anticompetitive aspects of the proposed merger of Conrail with Norfolk Southern. This amendment goes to the heart of the debate over the sale of Conrail to Norfolk Southern. It addresses the enormous economic power which would stem from this merger, and provides relief for captive communities and shippers in the Conrail service area should this power be abused.

The amendment I am offering provides remedies for States, counties, port authorities or port districts which will be subject to a monopoly on rail freight service enjoyed by Norfolk Southern under the sale proposed by S. 638. In the event that monopoly position is abused, this amendment gives adversely affected communities the right to seek relief in the U.S. district courts. The courts would have the right to grant trackage rights to a competing carrier, if a competing carrier is willing and able to provide service and negotiations with Norfolk Southern have failed.

Mr. President, it is particularly important that this amendment be adopted as part of this bill. In this legislation, which implements the Secretary of Transportation's plan to sell Conrail to Norfolk Southern, the Senate is asked to approve the creation of the largest railroad in the country. In addition, we are asked to immunize this sale from ICC and antitrust examination.

The Senate essentially is passing judgment on a merger, and a very large and complicated merger. Mergers are nothing new in the railroad industry. There has been a dramatic increase in the consolidation of this industry over the last 25 years. The merger of Conrail and Norfolk Southern will be, however, the biggest of all. This consolidation has coincided with the deregulation of the railroad industry under the Staggers Rail Act of 1980. So, the number of service providers in the industry has become smaller at the same time that the Congress has moved to deregulate the industry.

Mr. President, New Jersey is no stranger to this phenomenon. Since the creation of Conrail, New Jersey has been a captive State, with Conrail our only major service provider. The Port of New York and New Jersey has been a captive port. Conrail is its only major railroad and the Port of New York and New Jersey is Conrail's major port. The sale of Conrail to Norfolk Southern would alter that arangement fundamentally. In the future, the Port of New York and New Jersey could find itself captive to one railroad, which does not have one major port, but two or more. And, perhaps more importantly, a railroad which has made major investments in other ports. This would provide a powerful incentive for Norfolk Southern to divert traffic to the ports in which they have invested, away from the New York-New Jersey area. We could also see diversion of freight traffic from the Port of New York and New Jersey to other ports where rates are kept low through competition.

In arriving at a divestiture outline to coincide with this sale proposal, the Department of Justice attempted to address the question of how to maintain multiple rail service to communities that have multiple service today. But, the Justice Department did not even address the problems of monopoly States like New Jersey. Therefore, the legislation before us does absolutely nothing to enhance the options of shippers in New Jersey and other monopoly communities and States.

What will happen in these States if this dramatic merger is approved by Congress? Shippers will have fewer options. And ports, which were captive before the merger, will still be captive, but to a much larger economic entity.

Mr. President, in my estimation, the jewel in the crown of the Conrail sale is the Port of New York and New Jersey. If Norfolk Southern becomes the sole railroad serving this port, what will it have gained? It will have gained monopoly access to a port that generates the following:

Over $14 billion annually in economic activity to the region; 191,600 jobs, 103,100 of them direct port industry jobs; $4.2 billion in wages and salaries; $2.3 billion in business income; and $400 million in State and local income and sales taxes.

Indeed, the Port of New York-New Jersey is the jewel in the crown of the Conrail sale.

Mr. President, the amendment I am offering seeks to ensure that the economic interests of captive communities, and particularly the State of New Jersey, the port community which serves New York and New Jersey, and the shippers throughout this region are protected.

Mr. President, the amendment I am offering is a matter of preventive medicine. For, once in place, it will serve as a deterrent to the abuse of monopoly power. It does so by holding out the possibility of competition to captive communities and the threat of competition to Norfolk Southern.

I have supported the deregulation of the railroad industry, along with other modes of transportation. But, while deregulation has led to improved service and lower rates or prices in many instances, there are some situations in which deregulation can only accomplish just so much. In aviation, for example, we have seen airlines born virtually overnight. The barriers to entry to the industry have all but disappeared. But it is very difficult to start a railroad overnight.

Temporary international air route certificates are analogous to the remedies provided in this amendment. DOT extends temporary authority to airlines to fly international routes as a means of approximating competition in a part of the aviation industry that deregulation cannot reach. Incumbent carriers argue that these certificates are often routinely recertified and limit their flexibility with respect to services and fares. That means that the possibility, the mere possibility, of losing a route tends to keep fares down and service up. My amendment is designed to apply the same competitive pressure should Conrail be sold to Norfolk Southern.

Mr. President, this amendment will have no effect on Norfolk Southern unless two things are true. First, Norfolk Southern will have to be pricing its services sufficently above its costs to make the market attractive to a competitor. Shippers are not going to want another carrier if it means paying higher rates. Second, a competing carrier has to try to enter the market and be turned aside by Norfolk Southern. Only if these conditions obtain will a State, county or port authority have a case to bring to court.

Mr. President, I want to stress that this amendment applies to areas in which one railroad controls 80 percent or more of rail freight movements. While the captive situation in the Port of New York and New Jersey will be made worse by a Norfolk Southern takeover or Conrail, Conrail as it is presently constituted would be covered under this amendment. So, I am not just addressing this amendment to Norfolk Southern. I am addressing monopoly control per se.

The first question that will be asked about this amendment will be: Why use the courts and not the Interstate Commerce Commission?

The answer is very direct and very simple: The ICC cannot accomplish the purposes of the amendment, the granting of extensive trackage rights. The ICC can grant the joint use of terminal facilities, but that is not the issue in a State with no other major railroad but Conrail. This amendment permits the district courts to order the same kind of remedy that they have applied to other U.S. industries for years.

Beyond the legal impediments to using the ICC is the very practical fact that the President wants to put the ICC out of business. Who would one complain to then? The Department of Transportation, which is responsible for recommending this merger?

As my colleagues well know, the ICC's record of dealing with captive shipper complaints has not been exemplary under this administration. There will be those who cheer the ICC's demise, not because they do not need protection from abuse of monopoly power, and artificially high rates, but because they get no protection now.

Finally, Mr. President, it will be said that having a court assign trackage rights is a matter of confiscating property. That is clearly not the intent of this amendment.

The amendment specifies that a competing carrier must compensate Norfolk Southern for the use of its facilities, including a reasonable return on its investment and a just return to profits. The courts presently have the authority to set compensation for the use of facilities under the essential facilities doctrine, which was used in the case of the AT&T/MCI settlement.

Mr. President, if this amendment becomes law, I doubt that it will ever be used. Like a temporary international air route certificate, it will serve to keep Norfolk Southern honest. It should keep service up and prices down as though there was a competitive marketplace.

All that this Senator is asking for with this amendment is protection for my State's vital economic interests by providing for just the possibility of competition. This amendment does not break up Conrail; this amendment does not give 1 inch of track to another railroad. All this amendment does is let the free market dictate when competition is called for and, in that case, allow for competition.

I hope my colleagues who face captive control of their coal mines, farms, or ports will support this amendment.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a letter from the Port Authority of New York-New Jersey in support of this amendment be printed in the RECORD, along with an editorial from the New York Times which urges Congress to explore ways to stimulate more competition in the rail industry, including the option of requiring companies to lease their tracks and terminals to competitors at reasonable rates.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JANUARY 27, 1986.

Re Proposed Sale of Conrail.
Hon. FRANK R. LAUTENBERG,
Hart Senate Office Building,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR LAUTENBERG: I had the privilege of testifying before the Senate Committee on the Judiciary on April 2, 1985 regarding the proposed sale of the United States Government's interest in Conrail. At that time, I took the opportunity to point out to the Committee that the proposed sale of the only major railroad serving our port and our region causes no small concern to the Port Authority.

While our region is now enjoying relatively efficient rail service, the possibility that our sole major rail carrier might be controlled by a railroad system that may have its primary focus on other major competing ports causes us continuing concern. The analysis that has been performed by the Department of Justice regarding the anti-competitive effects of the acquisition of Conrail by the Norfolk Southern unfortunately did not focus on those areas of the country which have been deprived of competition in its rail service network for a number of years. For this reason, we at the Port Authority have advocated before House and Senate Committees that any legislation dealing with the disposition of Conrail should contain in it some provision whereby a rail carrier can acquire on reasonable terms trackage rights to provide competing service to our port upon abuse by a dominant rail carrier of its market position. I hasten to add, we have not suggested that Congress at this time designate rail lines in our areas for divestiture or transfer to another carrier. It is not our intent to deprive Conrail of the economies of scale that it now enjoys and are important to its success until and unless there is an abuse of a dominant market power.

To perpetuate a legal condition that would permit an existing monopoly carrier to inhibit competition by other rail carriers, however, is clearly contrary to the spirit of the statutes that created Conrail and deregulated the railroad industry. For this reason, we were most gratified to learn that you are considering the introduction of an amendment to the legislation authorizing the sale of Conrail addressing the concerns that have been expressed by the Port Authority as well as others. We have had an opportunity to review a draft of the proposed amendment and can strongly support it as providing what we feel is vital protection against potential market abuse that could adversely effect our port and our region.

I have enclosed herewith a copy of my statement before the Committee on the Judiciary as well as the testimony of Hugh Welsh, the New Jersey Solicitor of the Port Authority before the House Subcommittee on Commerce, Transportation and Tourism regarding this subject. We would be pleased to discuss with you the facts and concerns set forth in this testimony or provide any additional information that might be helpful.

Very truly yours,
PATRICK J. FALVEY,
General Counsel/Assistant
Executive Director.

NEXT STEPS IN RAIL DEREGULATION

When Congress relaxed price controls for freight railroads in 1980, it sought an artful balance. It wanted to give railroads incentives to rebuild their collapsing systems. But it wanted also to protect shippers from being gouged by rail monopolies. Some of these shippers now complain that the balance has tilted in favor of railroads, and they make a good case. If deregulation is to work for everyone, the reforms of 1980 need fine tuning.

Most cargo shipping is vigorously competitive. In setting prices, truckers and airlines must keep a close eye on the competition. Railroads, too, are held in check for some products in some regions. If they try to overcharge the large manufacturers of high-value products like machinery or auto parts, they risk losing the business to another railroad or an enterprising trucker.

But railroads exert great market power in carrying bulk commodities on underserved routes. So Congress put some limits on the railroads' freedom to set their own rates. Where a shipper can show that a rail company dominates a transportation market, the Interstate Commerce Commission is empowered to intervene. And if the commission finds a railroad's total revenues to be adequate and its prices unreasonable, the shipper can be granted rate relief.

By and large, this partial deregulation has worked well. Railroads are posting good profits. More important, they are investing billions to modernize their systems. And many shippers are getting better service for the same old rates. But some shippers, notably power companies buying coal from Western mines, have been seriously overcharged. And the I.C.C. has so far denied them relief. The commission, it appears, clings to the outdated rationale that the railroads need every last penny to stay in business.

A coalition of commodity shippers, electric utilities, labor unions and consumer groups urges legislation, to reduce the I.C.C.'s discretion, forcing it to come down harder on strong railroads. Things may have to come to that if the commission refuses to tighten its guidelines for rate relief. But the dreary history of price regulation makes very clear that prices set by regulators can never be entirely fair or efficient.

The long-term goal of reform should be to keep easing off regulation by making the shipping industry ever more competitive. At least three steps could be taken toward that end:

Congress should authorize construction of pipelines to carry mixtures of pulverized coal and water from mines to power plants. Such coal slurry pipelines have been blocked at state level by railroad lobbying. If Congress pre-empts authority over pipelines, the mere threat of their construction would discourage rail overcharges.

The I.C.C. or Congress, if necessary, should halt rail mergers that reduce the number of carriers serving shippers of bulk commodities.

Congress should explore ways to stimulate more competition among existing rail systems. For example, it might require rail companies to lease their tracks and terminals to competitors at reasonable rates.

The first goal of rail deregulation—a more productive, financially stable system—has been achieved. The next goal should be insuring that railroads share the benefits with consumers.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I rise today to join my distinguished colleague, Senator LAUTENBERG, in cosponsoring this amendment to S. 638, the Conrail Sale Amendments. This amendment will protect shippers, ports, localities, and the States from monopolistic practices by any railroad. It will ensure shippers using the railroad are charged fair rates.

In a region served by a dominant railroad, that is, one which controls 80 percent or more of the rail service in the region, this amendment would establish a procedure whereby the U.S. district court could review and grant relief to another railroad seeking to enter the market. If negotiations between the dominant railroad and an alternative railroad are unsuccessful, then the court may grant relief to the alternative railroad in the form of trackage rights. The court would also determine a fair payment to the dominant railroad for such trackage rights.

Currently, Conrail operates more than 2,600 route miles in New York. More than 5,000 New Yorkers work for Conrail. More than 2,500 New York enterprises ship via Conrail. Each year 300,000 freight cars originate from Buffalo; 18,000 freight cars originate from Long Island alone. It is essential that shippers be protected from freight overcharges, regardless of which railroad or group eventually succeeds in purchasing Conrail.

I enthusiastically support this amendment, and I urge my colleagues to do the same.

Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, I urge the adoption of the amendment and ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is not a sufficient second.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, I think before we get a sufficient second for anything we will have to have a manager for the other side of the floor.

I will move to table the amendment in about a minute.

Mr. President, the Port of New York is one of the clear beneficiaries from the sale of Conrail to Norfolk Southern. The Port of New York is now served only by Conrail. After the divestiture, it will be served by both Conrail and Guilford.

What the Senator from New Jersey would do is basically put the court in the same business that the ICC is in today. Now shippers can petition the ICC in case of inadequate competition or inadequate service. And the ICC has the power to open up access to competitive and competing railroads.

I do not think that the Senate wants to get the courts in basically the regulatory business any more than the courts are already in the regulatory business.

Also, I think what this does is to interject into the whole business of railroading a wild card. In fact, not only one wild card, but every district court in the country becomes a wild card open to anyone who wants to file suit in that district court.

It seems to me that if we are going to have an area of regulation, we should keep that in the regulatory agencies, and not expand it to every Federal district court in the country.

Therefore, Mr. President, I move to table the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion. All in favor say, "aye."

Mr. DANFORTH. I ask for the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is not a sufficient second.

Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, is the definition of a sufficient second not a manager and comanager of the bill? I have been placed in the enviable position of being the representative on our side to comanage this.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The answer is in the negative. The Constitution provides that one-fifth be present.

Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion to table the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Missouri. The yeas and nays have been ordered and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. SIMPSON. I announced that the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WALLOP] is necessarily absent.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Montana [Mr. BAUCUS] and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. NUNN] are necessarily absent.

I further announce that the Senator from Hawaii [Mr. INOUYE] is absent on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any other Senators in the Chamber who wish to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 51, nays 45, as follows:

So the motion to lay on the table amendment No. 1570 was agreed to.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is not in order.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

Mr. PRESSLER. Before that, may I ask, Mr. President, what is the pending business? I do not want to hold things up here at all but——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio is asked to withhold.

Mr. PRESSLER. If it was the intention of the Senator from Ohio to offer an amendment that has no relationship to mine, I would not object. I would like to ask unanimous consent to delay consideration of my amendment until 2:15.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT NO. 1572

Purpose: To direct the Secretary of Transportation to solicit and consider new sealed, competitive bids for the purchase of the interest of the U.S. in the common stock of Conrail.)

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. METZENBAUM] proposes an amendment numbered 1572.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

In lieu of the language proposed to be inserted, insert the following: That this Act may be cited as the "Conrail Sale Act of 1985".

SEC. 2. (a) As soon as is practical, the Secretary shall solicit and consider new, sealed, competitive bids for the purchase of the common stock of Conrail. The specifications for such bids shall be sufficiently detailed so as to asure sufficient information and data for use by the Secretary in considering among others, matters such as the use of money and other assets of Conrail; the source of cash payment for such common stock; and the protection of the rights and benefits of the current employees of Conrail.

(b) One hundred eighty days following the date on which the Secretary solicits bids under subsection (a) of this Section, the Secretary shall report to Congress the results of such solicitation.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, this amendment is very simple, very direct. It directs the Secretary of Transportation to solicit new bids for the sale of Conrail.

Conrail today is a very substantial Government asset. In 1981, it earned $39 million; in 1982, it earned $174 million; in 1983, it earned $313 million; and in 1984, it earned $500 million; and in 1985, it earned $440 million. It is probably one of the few instrumentalities of Government that has money in the bank, surplus money.

It has $915 million in the bank. It has so much money in the bank that even in the deal for Norfolk Southern to acquire it, there is a stipulation that anything in excess of $800 million that it has shall redound to the benefit of the Government.

The U.S. Railway Association, Conrail's independent banker, says that

"Conrail's viability as an independent entity is reasonably assured."

Conrail, in other words, is a very substantial going concern.

Norfolk Southern is not the only company that has expressed an interest in purchasing Conrail. We now have two additional offers on the table. Let us compare all three.

In return for Conrail, Norfolk Southern would pay the Government $1.2 billion. But at the same time, Norfolk Southern would be able to depreciate Conrail's $3.5 billion of assets.

In addition, Norfolk Southern would not have to pay interest and dividends that Conrail, under Federal ownership, would have to begin paying the Government in 1988.

Present projections are that if Conrail remained in the Government's hands, Conrail would repay the Government about $800 million between 1988 and 1989—almost $300 million a year.

According to the Congressional Budget Office, the interest and dividend loss would be slightly less than $300 million each year, totaling approximately $0.8 billion from 1988 through 1990.

CBO also estimated "revenue losses to the Federal Government of approximately $100 million annually from 1987 through 1990, as a result of a sale to Norfolk Southern."

As a result, the Government will not gain 1 cent from Norfolk Southern in return for Conrail.

With respect to the Morgan Stanley offer, that group is now willing to pay $1.4 billion for Conrail. That is $200 million more than the Norfolk Southern offer.

For the life of me, I do not understand why anybody in this body who is so much in favor of the Norfolk Southern offer is so indifferent to that additional $200 million. If you wanted to sell it to Norfolk Southern—which I would not support—but if you did I would think that you would say to them, "We expect you to pony up that additional $200 million, at least to equal the bid of Morgan Stanley.

In addition to the loss of that $200 million, the Department of the Treasury indicated in its letter of January 23, 1986, to Senator DANFORTH, that the sale of Conrail to the Morgan Stanley group would result in a net revenue gain to the Treasury of $24 million.

The fact is that the word is beginning to get out that Conrail is a pretty good deal after all. No; I want to change that. The sale of Conrail to Norfolk Southern is probably one of the best business deals that have been talked about or have been present before the U.S. Congress in many a year, and it is probably one of the best business deals that has ever been made, if and when it is permitted to go forward.

Now we have a third offer on the table. The Allen Co., working with the First Boston group, recently submitted a proposal to purchase Conrail for $1.64 billion—nearly a half billion more than Norfolk Southern.

I am not going to stand on the floor of the U.S. Senate and comment on the relative merits of Morgan Stanley or the Allen offer. I know that $200 million is money, and I know that $440 million, which is the Allen/First Boston figure, is a lot of money. But there is absolutely no question in my mind that we can get a better deal for Conrail than that which we have from Norfolk Southern. There is absolutely no reason why we should not attempt to get a better deal.

This amendment simply seeks to ensure that Conrail is sold to the private sector in accordance with current law.

The Northeast Rail Service Act of 1981 directed the Secretary of Transportation to develop a plan for the sale of Conrail that would promote competitive bidding and that would maximize the return to the United States on its investment.

The fact is that no such competitive bidding occurred, and the fact is that the Government is not maximizing its return. The Government has $7 billion in this deal—$7 billion. It is making $440 million. It has $950 million in the bank. And what are we doing? We are really going headlong, fighting, pushing, shoving, doing whatever is necessary, to make this sale become a reality to Norfolk Southern. I think it is bad business for the U.S. Government.

The Department of Transportation and its investment banker, Goldman Sachs, simply took the first offer they received for Conrail, which was $1 billion, from the Allegheny Corp., and publicly announced that the offer was within the range of reasonable compensation.

I never heard anything more absurd in my life. I never heard of such a preposterous way to conduct business. I am trying to say that I am quite shocked that Goldman Sachs, which is certainly a respected, knowledgeable, and reputable banking firm, would take the $1 billion offer, go public with it, and say that it was within the range of reasonable compensation. It obviously is not within the range of reasonable compensation, because we know that $400 million more is being offered by Morgan Stanley. We know that $640 million more is being offered by First Boston-Allen, and we do not know how much more could be obtained if competitive bids were taken.

Why in the world do those who come on the floor and talk about competitive bidding with respect to procurement for the Department of Defense and other arms of Government shy away from the same procedure as pertains to sealed competitive bids when we are talking about selling one of the Government's most valuable assets?

The quotation about it being within the range of reasonable compensation was confirmed as accurate by Federal Railroad Administration Deputy Administrator James Rooney, in his testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee on April 2, 1985.

In other words, the entire bid process was prejudiced from the very start. Any other company that may have been about to make an offer knew then that Conrail could be purchased for about $1 billion.

If another company had been looking at the deal and if they went to their board and said, "Look, I think this is a great opportunity; I think we should make an offer at $2 billion," the board or the stockholders would have thought they had lost their marbles. They would have said, "Are you out of your head? When they are already saying that the billion dollar offer is within range, you want to come in with a $2 billion offer?"

Why would they not get closed, sealed, competitive bids? Sure, some higher bids came in, but they were highly leveraged and involved paying the Government with its own money. That, in itself, proves the point that Conrail is a very substantial asset.

Mr. President, the intent of this amendment is to introduce a proper bid procedure. It would direct the Secretary to solicit new sealed bids specifying how the purchaser would pay for the railroad, how it would treat Conrail's cash and other assets, and what steps would be taken to protect the rights of Conrail's employees.

I have no problem and I believe the way those sealed bids should be obtained is for the Secretary of Transportation to spell out all of the terms and conditions that are applicable with respect to the bid so that everyone bids on the same basis, so that everyone is obligated to the same commitments, so that everyone knows what the contract terms are going to be and they cannot just say, "Well, give us just a potpourri of bids, come in with any kind of bid that you want and we will then take a look at them." You ought to be able to compare apples with apples and oranges with oranges, but what was done in this case was they were comparing apples with watermelons, and that is no way to conduct Government business.

In the interest of protecting the taxpayers' $7 billion investment in Conrail, I urge my colleagues to support the amendment.

Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second?

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, without making a precedent I ask unanimous consent that the yeas and nays be ordered notwithstanding the fact there was not a sufficient second.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, I have to object to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, what this amendment does, of course, is to go back to square one and open up a whole new bidding process.

I ask Senators to reflect on the question how many bids are we going to get. I mean, we have had a bidding process and 15 bids were submitted, with countless, countless man-years, countless millions of dollars worth of time and money spent on preparing bids to be submitted in good faith in a bidding competition, and then we say submit more bids.

Mr. President, if we agree to this amendment no one is ever going to bid for anything again that the Federal Government wants to sell.

I move to table the amendment and ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Will the manager yield for a minute?

Mr. DANFORTH. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second?

There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Ohio be allowed to proceed for 1 minute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I thank the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. President, I just want to say that should this matter be sent back to the Department of Transportation and should the Department of Transportation then take sealed bids and then come back to the Senate with the award to the highest bidder after having taken those competitive bids, I want to make the public assurance that I would not then see fit to battle the matter on the floor.

I would then think that the Government had acted properly and there would not be any delay or further debate as far as this Senator is concerned.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion to lay on the table the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

On this motion, the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. SIMPSON. I announce that the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WALLOP] is necessarily absent.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Montana [Mr. BAUCUS] and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. NUNN] are necessarily absent.

I further announce that the Senator from Hawaii [Mr. INOUYE] is absent on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HECHT). Are there any other Senators in the Chamber who wish to vote?

NOT VOTING—4

Baucus	Nunn

So the motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion to table was agreed to.

Mr. HOLLINGS. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I take this time to speak against the cloture motion which we are going to vote on at 3 o'clock today. I do so to bring to the attention of the Senate certain facts, and to urge our colleagues, Mr. President, to reject at least for now the imposition of cloture on this legislation.

It has always troubled me generally when anybody files a cloture motion on the very minute a bill hits the floor. It has traditionally been the custom of the Senate to permit full debate, and then if it was the judgment of the leadership or of a substantial number of Senators that the debate was irrelevant, nongermane, or proceeding simply for the purpose of delay in the face of the will of the Senate to proceed, at that point a cloture motion would be filed, and we would proceed to vote on it.

In the case of this legislation, on the day we took up the bill in earnest on Tuesday, we were supposed to debate the billon Tuesday, and because of the tragedy of the space shuttle there was no debate. The leader sent a cloture motion to the desk, and that was it. Here we are voting on cloture at 3 p.m. today, just a little over 2 days after that motion was filed.

I have amendments that I want to offer. They are serious amendments. They deserve debate. They really ought to be considered not under the limitations of Postcloture where I am going to be limited to 1 hour. I do not seek to filibuster this bill, however, I might end up using every trick in the trade if I do not have proper opportunity to get my amendments considered, and properly debated. I can file—indeed I have filed a lot of amendments.

I have no wish at this point to engage in a battle of tactical wits with my colleagues who are involved in this legislation. But make no mistake: If we are going to have debate prematurely brought to a close and thereby deny the thoughtful consideration of germane amendments, or even nongermane amendments, which are relevant to the bill, then if those opportunities are foreclosed, Mr. President, I am prepared to use every legitimate parliamentary device to keep everybody here right through the weekend and beyond, if necessary.

For the record, I just want people to understand exactly what we have been able to do. The burden, when it comes to whether or not cloture should be invoked here in the Senate, is a burden of proof that rests with the people who have filed the cloture motion and seek to terminate debate.

The proof that is necessary is that the Senate is not proceeding deliberately and with purpose to a conclusion.

Mr. President, we have not had the time to proceed deliberately and with purpose to a conclusion.

I just checked with the Parliamentarian at the desk right in front of you, Mr. President, and this Senate has not been inactive on the Conrail bill.

We have been on the bill. I am not talking about any of the skirmishing on the motion to proceed, during which I talked a total of 1 minute. As of 2 p.m. today, we have been on this bill a maximum of 14 hours and 20 minutes. That includes quorum calls, votes, debate, and the reading of amendments a maximum of 14 hours and 20 minutes. Two days of honest work minus about 1 hour and 40 minutes.

We have considered a total of five amendments. We are not through voting on those five. One of them, probably the major amendment considered so far, Senator SPECTER's amendment regarding the Morgan Stanley offer, had 12 speakers on it, who wanted to debate that amendment. It is not an excessive number. Nobody spoke for an excessive amount of time.

The Dixon antitrust amendment also clearly was an important amendment. There were 10 speakers on that amendment, not an excessive number.

Senator LAUTENBERG's amendment, with only two or three speakers, had about 1 hour of time.

So far we are proceeding with Senator PRESSLER's amendment. We have had an amendment to it which took 15 minutes, Senator METZENBAUM's amendment, with two speakers.

Senator DANFORTH, who is managing the bill, had an amendment with seven speakers on it.

Mr. President, this is not a filibuster. We are trying to go about the work of the Senate in an orderly way. The record proves it. But a very good way to have a filibuster—and the rules on postcloture filibusters are, as we know, fairly flexible—is to have this cloture motion jammed down the Senate's throat. The best thing that could happen to those people who are proponents of this legislation, if they want to get a bill—and hopefully it is not identical to the bill that we have before us—is that they do not succeed with this cloture motion. Indeed, they would be well advised to vote against it.

I have some amendments that ought to be considered. There are other meritorious amendments. We do not want to be disadvantaged by gagging the Senate prematurely, unfairly and unnecessarily, simply because some people have some planes to catch on Friday or Saturday to get out of here.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, the Senator from Pennsylvania, and I appreciate his subsequent comment, brought up this matter. I want to make clear we have done nothing unusual in this matter except to use the ordinary procedures of the Senate, to bring out the issues as to the manner in which bids were received, as to the failure to conform with the antitrust laws of this country, and as to the fairness and equity of the entire proposition. We have not had an opportunity nor enough time to be able to discuss the matters in their entirety nor to call up their amendments. We have had no choice under the circumstances.

Let us recognize what happened. Immediately upon the substitutes being offered, immediately, a very unusual procedure was involved. The majority leader laid down a cloture petition. That is not the normal way to use cloture. Cloture normally occurs, or there is an effort to obtain cloture, after there has been an extended debate and when the manager of the bill wants to bring the matter to a conclusion.

What we have before us now is a new procedure. I say it is that procedure that creates the problem. It is the fact that immediately upon laying down the substitute bill, at that very moment, the leadership laid down a cloture petition. Therefore, it meant that we had a limited time. We unfortunately had to go out of session on Tuesday and had no opportunity on Tuesday to act. We were limited to acting only on Wednesday and then a few hours today, on Thursday.

That means that many of us who have amendments that we would like to call up had to be certain that those amendments were in order in order that we could call them up postcloture. But there has been no evidence whatsoever as of this moment that there is any filibuster, that there is anything other than the usual procedure except the procedures that have been used by the managers of the bill. It is they who filed a cloture motion immediately upon filing the substitute bill.

Yes, indeed; I have some amendments to call up postcloture, but it is because they did not give me an opportunity to call them up prior to cloture. I called one up this morning. I tried to get one added onto Senator PRESSLER's amendment, then found I had an opportunity to call it up independently.

At this point, Mr. President, I withdraw the amendment to the Pressler amendment.

The amendment (No. 1569) was withdrawn.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I want to make it clear that the reason we are going to have some amendments postcloture is that we did not have a chance to call them up prior to cloture. In one-half hour, we will have the vote on the cloture motion.

There have been other Senators here today trying to get recognized in order that they might call up their amendments. At this moment, nobody can call up an amendment and get any adequate time for debate because the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota is the pending business. That matter is to be acted upon either at 2:15 or 2:30 or something of the kind. At 3 o'clock, we go into the cloture vote. So there will be some postcloture amendments, but it will not be in an effort just to extend the debate for time purposes only, but in order to make it clear to the American people and to Members of the Senate what this issue is all about and to give them an opportunity to correct some problems that exist.

Shortly after the cloture vote, I intend to call up an amendment having to do with the whole matter of treating the employees, because I think the employees have been treated very shamefully under the memorandum of agreement. I shall discuss that further after the cloture motion, because there is not adequate time to discuss it at the present moment.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT NO. 1438

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, what is the pending business?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Amendment No. 1438 by the Senator from South Dakota is the pending business.

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment and send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has the right to withdraw his amendment.

The amendment (No. 1438) was withdrawn.

AMENDMENT NO. 1582, AS MODIFIED

(Purpose: To provide protection to regional carriers against unfair or destructive competitive practices)

Mr. PRESSLER. I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from South Dakota (Mr. PRESSLER) proposes an amendment numbered 1582.

Insert a new Section 304 as follows after Section 303 and renumber Sections 304 through 306 as Sections 305 through 307:

"SEC. 304. Subtitle IV of title 49, United States Code, is amended by inserting a new section 10735 as follows:

"SEC. 10735. REGIONAL RAILROAD GATEWAY PROTECTION

(a) For purposes of this section, unless the context requires otherwise:

(i) "Affected Carrier Routing(s)" means the freight route(s) of a Midwest Regional

Carrier designated by the Interstate Commerce Commission under subsection (c) of this section pursuant to a finding under subsection (b) of this section as the route(s) from which the relevant diversions have occurred;

(ii) "Base Revenues" means the total railroad freight revenues a railroad collected during the last full calendar year prior to the enactment of the Conrail Sale Amendments Act of 1985 multiplied by a fraction the numerator of which is the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics, Consumer Price Index for Urban Wage Earners and Clerical Workers, all items (1967=100) for 1986 and the denominator of which is the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics, Consumer Price Index for Urban Wage Earners and Clerical Workers, all items (1967=100) for the year concerning which a complaint is brought under this section;

(iii) "Exempt Joint Rate" means a transportation charge for deregulated railroad freight traffic specified in an agreement to which both a Midwest Regional Carrier and Norfolk Southern/Conrail are parties;

(iv) "Midwest Regional Carrier" means a Class I rail carrier: (A) not affiliated with or operated as a part of another United States Class I rail carrier, (B) the total freight revenues of which do not exceed 3.6 percent of total United States rail freight revenues, and (C) principal freight routes of which connect its service territory with the Chicago Terminal District;

(v) "New tariff joint rate" or "new exempt joint rate" means any tariff joint rate which is created through selective rate adjustments, excluding general rate increases or decreases;

(vi) "Norfolk Southern/Conrail" means the Norfolk Southern Corporation, its rail affiliates, and the Consolidated Rail Corporation;

(vii) "Shortline railroad" means a rail carrier which, together with any affiliates, earned rail operating revenues of less than $90,000,000 in 1984;

(viii) "Tariff joint rate" means a rate on regulated railroad freight traffic on file with the Interstate Commerce Commission to which tariff rate both a Midwest Regional Carrier and Norfolk Southern/Conrail are parties; and

(ix) "Through revenues" mean the entire transportation charge exclusive of any lawful agreement any party may have for refund or discount of charges to shippers.

(b) Upon receipt of a complaint from a Midwest Regional Carrier prior to the tenth anniversary of the date enactment of the Conrail Sale Amendments Act of 1985, the Interstate Commerce Commission shall conduct a proceeding in which the complaining Midwest Regional Carrier shall have the burden of proving:

(i) that it suffered a cumulative diversion of its railroad freight revenues to Norfolk Southern/Conrail from the date the sale of the interest of the United States in the common stock of the Consolidated Rail Corporation to Norfolk Southern Corporation is consummated through the date the complaint is filed in excess of three and one-half percent of its Base Revenues;

(ii) that the diversion of railroad freight revenues referred to in paragraph (b)(1) of this section resulted from an unfair or destructive competitive practice (or practices) of Norfolk Southern/Conrail and not from fair and effective competition from Norfolk Southern/Conrail that benefits shippers and consumers, such as superior service or lawful lower rates; and

(iii) that the diversion of railroad freight revenues referred to in paragraph (b)(i) of this section did or will result in a loss of essential railroad freight services.

(c) If the Interstate Commerce Commission finds that, in a proceeding conducted under this section, the criteria set forth in subsection (b) of this section have been met, the Interstate Commerce Commission shall, in every case, designate Affected Carrier Routings and cause Norfolk Southern/Conrail to maintain, keep in effect, or concur in the establishment or re-establishment of tariff joint rates or exempt joint rates via such Affected Carrier Routings as follows:

(i) Norfolk Southern/Conrail tariff joint rates and exempt joint rates via Affected Carrier Routings (A) in existence on the date the sale of the interest of the United States in the common stock of the Consolidated Rail Corporation to Norfolk Southern Corporation is consummated, (B) applicable to traffic moving between origins and destinations on Norfolk Southern/Conrail and shortline railroads connecting with it and origins and destinations on the Affected Carrier Routing, shortline railroads connecting with it, and connecting lines beyond it, and (C) applicable to traffic moving via Chicago, shall be maintained or restored and shall remain in effect: Provided, however, That either Norfolk Southern/Conrail or the Midwest Regional Carrier, or both, may take any or all Rail Carrier Cost Recovery increases in tariff joint rates, or increases in rates according to another index agreed upon between them, or, in the case of exempt joint rates, either may increase its share of through revenue as may be necessary to maintain the ratio of Norfolk Southern/Conrail's share of through revenues to the Midwest Regional Carrier's share of through revenue on the Affected Carrier Routing that exists on the date the sale of the interest of the United States in the common stock of the Consolidated Rail Corporation to Norfolk Southern Corporation is consummated.

(ii) Whenever Norfolk Southern/Conrail establishes a new traiff joint rate or exempt joint rate on traffic moving between origins and destinations on Norfolk Southern/Conrail and origins and distinations on an Affected Carrier Routing, shortline railroads connecting to it, and connecting lines beyond it, Norfolk Southern/Conrail shall concur in the application of the same tariff joint rate or exempt joint rate via Norfolk Southern/Conrail—Chicago—Affected Carrier Routing between the same origin and destination points: Provided, however, That the actual mileage traversed via Norfolk Southern/Conrail—Chicago—Affected Carrier Routing shall not exceed 110 percent of the mileage traversed by the routing cited by the new tariff joint rate or exempt joint rate established by Norfolk Southern/Conrail.

(iii) Revenues from traffic on routes governed by paragraph (c)(ii) of this section shall be divided among the carriers according to the standard divisions of railroad revenue customarily applicable to such routes.

(iv) On routes governed by paragraph (c)(ii) of this section, either Norfolk Southern/Conrail or the Midwest Regional Carrier, or both, may take any or all Rail Carrier Cost Recovery increases in tariff joint rates, or increases in rates according to another index agreed upon between them, or, in the case of exempt joint rates, either may increase its share of through revenue as may be necessary to maintain the ratio of Norfolk Southern/Conrail's share of through revenues to the Midwest Regional Carrier's share of through revenue on the Affected Carrier Routing that exists on the date the sale of the Consolidated Rail Corporation to Norfolk Southern Corporation is consummated.

(v) Nothing in this section or Subtitle IV of title 49, United States Code, shall require Norfolk Southern/Conrail or any Midwest Regional Carrier to maintain any tariff joint rate or any Affected Carrier Routing established or re-established under this section beyond the fifteenth anniversary of the date of enactment of the Conrail Sale Amendments Act of 1985.

(d) The Interstate Commerce Commission shall expedite consideration of any complaint filed under this section. The Interstate Commerce Commission shall conclude evidentiary proceedings by the end of the fourth month after the filing of such complaint. The Interstate Commerce Commission shall issue a final decision by the end of the sixth month after the filing of such complaint.

(e) Nothing in this section shall require Norfolk Southern/Conrail to participate in a rate which causes Norfolk Southern/Conrail to receive revenues lower than 110 percent of its variable cost for performing its part of the service as calculated by using Interstate Commerce Commission Rail Form A.

(f) Nothing in this section shall preclude either Norfolk Southern/Conrail or any Midwest Regional Carrier from entering into otherwise lawful refund or discount arrangements with shippers singly or collectively with respect to any railroad traffic subject to this section.

(g) Nothing in this section shall preclude either Norfolk Southern/Conrail or any Midwest Regional Carrier from seeking under this Subtitle or other proper legal authority to discontinue its operations over or to abandon service over particular lines.

(h) The Interstate Commerce Commission shall not suspend any rate or tariff or any railroad during the pendency of any proceeding under this section.

(i) Nothing in this section shall invalidate or supercede, in whole or in part, any traffic protective agreement Norfolk Southern/Conrail has entered into or enters into with any other railroad.' "

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, we have been negotiating with the Department of Transportation throughout the morning and into this afternoon on a compromise amendment. We have worked out an agreement on an amendment that is not totally satisfactory to me. We have had a very lengthy and useful negotiation with the Department of Transportation by which I think, in the House and during the conference, we can regain the full thrust of the purpose of my initial amendment.

We are still negotiating over a few minor word changes and some other details, but I believe I am prepared to offer this compromise with the clear understanding that this is a beginning of a process which is intended to lead to legislation which truly addresses the concerns of the midwestern and other regional carriers.

Because of the sheer lack of time needed to carefully draft and evaluate the substantive provisions of this type of legislation, I would be the first to admit that the amendment I am offering is anywhere close to perfect, and it is very doubtful whether it will adequately address all the concerns of the affected railroads.

I should stress here that I have not had the opportunity to evaluate the effect of this compromise regional railroad amendment.

The regional railroads with which I have been working, namely the Chicago North Western, Illinois Central Gulf, and Grand Trunk have not seen this proposed amendment. And so I do not know whether it is acceptable to regional railroads who stand to suffer from traffic diversions.

However, I accept the good intentions of the Department of Transportation to continue working with us on an ongoing basis to come up with an agreement acceptable to all. So I am proposing it as the base line from which I will attempt to build a framework of protection for regional railroads, and I do so with some reservation. My offering this amendment is very much based on my perception of the Department of Transportation's good faith commitment to continue working to perfect this amendment in such a way that it truly addresses the regional railroads' concerns. These railroads will have a significant amount of input as we go forward with this process.

The one real concern I do have about offering this compromise is that I am certain that Norfolk Southern and others will use it to argue that the regional railroad issue is now taken care of. Let me state most emphatically that this is not the case. It does not solve the problem of the midwest and other regional railroads. We have a long way to go and I look forward to working with the Department of Transportation on this issue rather than continuing to do battle with them.

I am pleased the Department has recognized the problem. After today, we can go forward in addressing it completely.

I thank Senator DOLE, Senator DANFORTH, and others who have worked with me on this. I have spoken at length of what my goals are.

I think the talks we had with the Department were useful, and I think that during the conference, on which I hope to serve, we will find it useful. I shall not seek a rollcall vote on this if this amendment is agreeable with both sides.

I thank the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, who, I believe, has agreed with this amendment.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, let me say that throughout the lengthy deliberations in the Commerce Committee, the Senator from South Dakota has been intrepid in his efforts to provide some degree of assurance that other railroads, particularly in the Northwestern part of our country, will not suffer from diversion. He has insisted that the Commerce Committee address this matter. He has insisted that we hold hearings. He has discussed at some length with me and with members of the Commerce Committee staff what steps could be taken to try to assure some measure of protection for these railroads. He has prepared an amendment which he offered earlier today. That amendment, which dealt with diversion and which gave certain continuing powers to the ICC, I thought, was a bad amendment. It was one that would have, I believe, put the Norfolk Southern constantly before the ICC in protracted cases. This amendment, however, I think, is far more reasonable. As far as this Senator is concerned, I am prepared to support it.

The amendment, Mr. President, would allow for the protection of through routes that Midwestern railroads now have with Norfolk Southern. The new amendment would not have, in my view, the same anticompetitive effects as the original one, so I am prepared to support this amendment.

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, I move the amendment.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, I shall move fairly quickly. First of all, there are just two or three word changes from our original compromise I earlier sent to the desk. I ask unanimous consent to send a modification of my amendment to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has a right to modify his amendment.

The modification is as follows:

Insert a new Section 304 as follows after Section 303 and renumber Sections 304 through 306 as Sections 305 through 397:

SEC. 304. Subtitle IV of title 49, United States Code, is amended by inserting a new section 10735 as follows:

SEC. 10735. REGIONAL RAILROAD GATEWAY PROTECTION.

(a) For purposes of this section, unless the context requires otherwise:

(i) "Affected Carrier Routing(s)" means the freight route(s) of a Midwest Regional Carrier designated by the Interstate Commerce Commission under subsection (c) of this section pursuant to a finding under subsection (b) of this section as the route(s) from which the relevant diversions have occurred;

(ii) "Base Revenues" means the total railroad freight revenues a railroad collected during the last full calendar year prior to the enactment of the Conrail Sale Amendments Act of 1985 multiplied by a fraction the numerator of which is the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics, Consumer Price Index for Urban Wage Earners and Clerical Workers, all items (1967=100) for 1986 and the denominator of which is the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics, Consumer Price Index for Urban Wage Earners and Clerical Workers, all items (1967=100) for the year concerning which a complaint is brought under this section;

(iii) "Exempt Joint Rate" means a transportation charge for deregulated railroad freight traffic specified in an agreement to which both a Midwest Regional Carrier and Norfolk Southern/Conrail are parties;

(iv) "Midwest Regional Carrier" means a Class I rail carrier: (A) not affiliated with or operated as a part of another United States Class I rail carrier, (B) the total freight revenues of which do not exceed 3.6 percent of total United States rail freight revenues, and (C) the principal freight routes of which connect its service territory with the Chicago Terminal District;

(v) "New tariff joint rate" or "new exempt joint rate" means any tariff joint rate which is created through selective rate adjustments, excluding general rate increases or decreases.

(vi) "Norfolk Southern/Conrail" means the Norfolk Southern Corporation, its rail affiliates, and the Consolidated Rail Corporation;

(vii) "Shortline railroad" means a rail carrier which, together with any affiliates, earned rail operating revenues of less than $90,000,000 in 1984;

(viii) "Tariff joint rate" means a rate on regulated railroad freight traffic on file with the Interstate Commerce Commission to which tariff rate both a Midwest Regional Carrier and Norfolk Southern/Conrail are parties; and

(ix) "Through revenues" mean the entire transportation charge exclusive of any lawful agreement any party may have for refund or discount of charges to shippers.

(b) Upon receipt of a complaint from a Midwest Regional Carrier prior to the tenth anniversary of the date enactment of the Conrail Sale Amendments Act of 1985, the Interstate Commerce Commission shall conduct a proceeding in which the complaining Midwest Regional Carrier, except with respect to product and geographic competition for which Norfolk Southern Conrail shall have the burden of proof, shall have the burden of proving:

(i) that it suffered a cumulative diversion of its railroad freight revenues to Norfolk Southern/Conrail from the date the sale of the interest of the United States in the common stock of the Consolidated Rail Corporation to Norfolk Southern Corporation is consummated through the date the complaint is filed in excess of three and one-half percent of its Base Revenues;

(ii) that the diversion of railroad freight revenues referred to in paragraph (b)(i) of this section resulted from an anti-competitive practice (or practices) of Norfolk Southern/Conrail and not from fair and effective competition from Norfolk Southern/Conrail that benefits shippers and consumers, such as superior service or lawful lower rates; and

(iii) that the diversion of railroad freight revenues referred to in paragraph (b)(i) of this section did or will result in a loss of essential railroad freight services.

(c) If the Interstate Commerce Commission finds that, in a proceeding conducted under this section, the criteria set forth in subsection (b) of this section have been met, the Interstate Commerce Commission shall, in every case, designate Affected Carrier Routings and cause Norfolk Southern/Conrail to maintain, keep in effect, or concur in the establishment or re-establishment of tariff joint rates or exempt joint rates via such Affected Carrier Routings as follows:

(i) Norfolk Southern/Conrail tariff joint rates and exempt joint rates via Affected Carrier Routings (A) in existence on the date the sale of the interest of the United States in the common stock of the Consolidated Rail Corporation to Norfolk Southern Corporation is consummated, (B) applicable to traffic moving between origins and destinations on Norfolk Southern/Conrail and shortline railroads connecting with it and origins and destinations on the Affected Carrier Routing, shortline railroads connecting with it, and connecting lines beyond it, and (C) applicable to traffic moving via Chicago, shall be maintained or restored and shall remain in effect: Provided, however, That either Norfolk Southern/Conrail or the Midwest Regional Carrier, or both, may take any or all Rail Carrier Cost Recovery increases in tariff joint rates, or increases in rates according to another index agreed upon between them, or, in the case of exempt joint rates, either may increase its share of through revenue as may be necessary to maintain the ratio of Norfolk Southern/Conrail's share of through revenues to the Midwest Regional Carrier's share of through revenue on the Affected Carrier Routing that exists on the date the sale of the interest of the United States in the common stock of the Consolidated Rail Corporation to Norfolk Southern Corporation is consummated.

(ii) Whenever Norfolk Southern/Conrail establishes a new tariff joint rate or exempt joint rate on traffic moving between origins and destinations on Norfolk Southern/Conrail and origins and destinations on an Affected Carrier Routing, shortline railroads connecting to it, and connecting lines beyond it, Norfolk Southern/Conrail shall concur in the application of the same tariff joint rate or exempt joint rate via Norfolk Southern/Conrail—Chicago—Affected Carrier Routing between the same origin and destination points: Provided, however, That the actual mileage traversed via Norfolk Southern/Conrail—Chicago—Affected Carrier Routing shall not exceed 110 percent of the mileage traversed by the routing cited by the new tariff joint rate or exempt joint rate established by Norfolk Southern/Conrail.

(iii) Revenues from traffic on routes governed by paragraph (c)(ii) of this section shall be divided among the carriers according to the standard divisions of railroad revenue customarily applicable to such routes.

(iv) On routes governed by paragraph (c)(ii) of this section, either Norfolk Southern/Conrail or the Midwest Regional Carrier, or both, may take any or all Rail Carrier Cost Recovery increases in tariff joint rates, or increases in rates according to another index agreed upon between them, or, in the case of exempt joint rates, either may increase its share of through revenue as may be necessary to maintain a the ratio of Norfolk Southern/Conrail's share of through revenues to the Midwest Regional Carrier's share of through revenue on the Affected Carrier Routing that exists on the date the sale of the interest of the United States in the common stock of the Consolidated Rail Corporation to Norfolk Southern Corporation is consummated.

(v) Nothing in this section or Subtitle IV of title 49, United States Code, shall require Norfolk Southern/Conrail or any Midwest Regional Carrier to maintain any tariff joint rate or any Affected Carrier Routing established or re-established under this section beyond the fifteenth anniversary of the date of enactment of the Conrail Sale Amendments Act of 1985.

(d) The Interstate Commerce Commission shall expedite consideration of any complaint filed under this section. The Interstate Commerce Commission shall conclude evidentiary proceedings by the end of the fourth month after the filing of such complaint. The Interstate Commerce Commission shall issue a final decision by the end of the sixth month after the filing of such complaint.

(e) Nothing in this section shall require Norfolk Southern/Conrail to participate in a rate which causes Norfolk Southern/Conrail to receive revenues lower than 110 percent of its variable cost for performing its part of the service as calculated by using Interstate Commerce Commission Rail Form A.

(f) Nothing in this section shall preclude either Norfolk Southern/Conrail or any Midwest Regional Carrier from entering into otherwise lawful refund or discount arrangements with shippers singly or collectively with respect to any railroad traffic subject to this section.

(g) Nothing in this section shall preclude either Norfolk Southern/Conrail or any Midwest Regional Carrier from seeking under this Subtitle or other proper legal authority to discontinue its operations over or to abandon service over particular lines.

(h) The Interstate Commerce Commission shall not suspend any rate or tariff of any railroad during the pendency of any proceeding under this section.

(i) Nothing in this section shall invalidate or supercede, in whole or in part, any traffic protective agreement Norfolk Southern/Conrail has entered into or enters into with any other railroad.

(j) The Interstate Commerce Commission shall establish evidentiary standards sufficient to give petitioners a fair and reasonable opportunity to meet their burden of proof.

Mr. Pressler. Mr. President, there are three changes to our original compromise, which were as follows:

The change in subsection (b) is intended to shift the burden of proof to Norfolk Southern under certain circumstances.

The change in subsection (b)(ii) clarifies one element of causation needed to maintain a case before the ICC.

The addition of subsection (j) is intended to make it much easier than under the present ICC evidenciary and discovery rules for the petitioning railroad to obtain Norfolk Southern's cost data and other information needed to meet its burden of proof.

Mr. President, the regional railroads I have been working with, the Chicago Northwestern, Illinois Central Grand Trunk have not seen this proposed amendment. We have worked only with DOT. I thank them very much. I do not seek a rollcall vote. I do yield to Senator KASTEN, an original cosponsor, for any remarks he may have at this moment.

Mr. KASTEN. I thank the Senator for yielding.

Mr. President, the chairman, the ranking member, Senator PRESSLER and I have all been working together to try to deal with special problems which have affected the regional railroads, particularly the Chicago & Northwestern. I believe that this is a positive step. I appreciate the work of everyone involved. I am hopeful that we now can move forward and have eliminated a large number of objections and problems that are coming from the Chicago & Northwestern and various shippers in the Midwestern regions that are concerned.

I am pleased to be a consponsor of this amendment, and I have enjoyed working with the chairman, the ranking member, and others, as we have tried to work out this difficult problem.

Mr. President, I am convinced that adoption of this amendment will give the railroads and shippers in the Midwest the protection that they need in order to gurantee their gateway in Chicago as well as competition to the East.

As any Senator from the Midwest knows, the area's regional railroads are concerned that if Norfolk Southern acquires Conrail, these smaller railroads could dramatically suffer from heavy diversions of traffic. What these small railroads really want and need is gateway and rate protection. Although Secretary of Transportation Dole has received assurances on these matters from Norfolk Southern, the fears persist. Fortunately, this amendment provides these railroads with the necessary protection to dispel those fears.

The amendment does this: in the event that the railroads' worst fears should come true, the railroad in question must show that traffic has been diverted by Norfolk Southern through anticompetitive means instead of by fair competition beneficial to both shippers and consumers.

Those same railroads must show that these diversions have exceeded 3.5 percent of total revenues as well as showing that the diversions have affected the regional railroad's viability in a detrimental fashion.

Once damage has been proven, the regional railroads will receive what they have been seeking: preservation of the status quo on the affected lines' rates as well as the opportunity to take advantage of new lower rates on parallel routes. The Interstate Commerce Commission would also be directed to expedite its proceedings so that decisions as well as relief could be handled quickly.

Mr. President, as my colleagues can see, this amendment addresses the paramount concerns of the Midwestern's regional railroads, especially those of the Chicago & Northwestern. No one wants to see Congress favoring one railroad over another. Both the Chicago & Northwestern and the Soo-Milwaukee have provided the shippers and consumers of Wisconsin with competitive rates and excellent service. I certainly do not want to see the service of either of these great railroads suffer as a result of this sale.

Mr. President, in the end, Norfolk Southern will be able to vigorously compete in the Midwest, the regional railroads will have the necessary protection against antirail competition, and most importantly, competitive rates and benefits to shippers and consumers will be enhanced making them the biggest winners of all.

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, Let me reiterate that this amendment does not necessarily give the Midwestern railroads or shippers the full protection they need. It is intended only as a starting point. We have a long way to go. I move adoption of the amendment.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, as I have stated earlier, I accept the amendment. I do want to make it clear that Norfolk Southern does not agree with this amendment, but in the interest of moving the bill forward as we approach a cloture vote, I do accept it and I urge Senators to support it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment (No. 1582, as modified), was agreed to.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLLINGS. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, pending the return of the distinguished chairman to the floor, I will make some remarks.

We did not like that amendment. The Senator from South Dakota believes it is innocuous. That was his word. He said it did not really force anything. Mr. Reilly of DOT worked it out with him. Norfolk Southern feels they should be permitted to negotiate.

That is the real concern we have—that we do not gain anything, we do not lose anything, we do not change the picture we have, just the opportunity to negotiate with those who have that right, and let the market forces operate.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHAFEE). The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, I have two amendments that I would like to offer. The first one addresses the prevention of small and captive shippers from gaining critical information from the Interstate Commerce Commission. Access to this information is necessary to protect them from discrimination in the ratemaking process. While the law says such shippers may have this information if they suspect discrimination, a snarl of regulations poses an effective block to their getting it. My amendment would remove that block and restore fairness to the system.

The second amendment has to do with fairness as well. Under current law, railroads have at their disposal a number of tools to prevent any but railroad-owned cars from operating on railroad tracks. Several years ago, in the 1970's, there occurred a widespread shortage of railcars. Railroads could not or would not spend the money to accumulate the needed railcars and undertook a campaign to encourage shippers to buy or lease their own cars. Many shippers did just that to meet the demands of their customers and allow their business to grow. In the meantime the railroads, in the improved business environment brought about by the Staggers Act, began to accumulate more cars of their own until today a surplus exists. The railroads now are in a position to insist that shippers use railroad-owned cars, meaning shippers are forced to park their own cars. Mr. Buzz Fitzpatrick, Director of the U.S. Department of Agriculture's Department of Transportation Office, discussed this problem in a short article in October's Traffic World magazine. Calling the situation unfair, he said:

> There hasn't been an equitable arrangement overall * * *. Some railroads are more equitable than others but generally there hasn't been the equitable arrangement there should be.

My amendment would simply require the railroads to accept shipper-owned cars purchased or leased prior to 1980. This protects against what is becoming a monopoly over railcars by railroads and restores the equity Mr. Fitzpatrick suggests is missing.

Mr. DANFORTH. Will the Senator from Idaho yield for a question?

Mr. SYMMS. Certainly.

Mr. DANFORTH. I appreciate the concerns of my friend from Idaho, and recall that he testified on these same concerns recently in a hearing of the Surface Transportation Subcommittee of the Commerce Committee. These are issues that indeed should be considered. In fact, I am informed by Senator PACKWOOD, the chairman of the Surface Transportation Subcommittee, that his Subcommittee has scheduled a legislative hearing on the Staggers Act in the near future. I would suggest that this hearing would present an excellent forum in which to consider the Senator's amendments. Would the Senator consider withdrawing his amendments at this time in favor of bringing them up in the context of the upcoming hearing?

Mr. SYMMS. I thank my friend from Missouri for his support of my concerns. I am happy to hear of the upcoming action by the Commerce Committee on these issues. I will withdraw my amendments for the time being pending their being taken up by the Commerce Committee.

CLOTURE MOTION

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the hour of 3 p.m. having arrived, the clerk will state the motion to invoke cloture.

CONRAIL SALE AMENDMENTS ACT OF 1985

Mr. CRANSTON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California is recognized.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, under cloture, I transfer my 1 hour to the minority leader, Senator BYRD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who seeks recognition?

Mr. METZENBAUM addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A quorum is present.

Mr. BYRD addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The minority leader is recognized.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, on my time I ask the distinguished majority leader what his plans are now for the afternoon and the evening, and tomorrow with respect to rollcall votes, especially with respect to tomorrow because of the memorial service that will be conducted in Texas.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, if the minority leader will yield, we would like very much to complete action on this bill. The vote is rather decisive. It is 70 to 27. We ought to go ahead, and complete action on the bill.

I know there are some germane amendments that will be offered. We intend to stay here as long as necessary this evening, and probably tomorrow. I do not know of any other choice.

If one or two Members want to keep us here, that is their option. We are prepared to go to final passage, and do it by 5 o'clock this afternoon, and not be in tomorrow.

I know there are some amendments that are germane, and will be offered. But I think a rather clear majority have spoken on this matter.

We would like to complete it.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, as far as I am concerned, we can vote now. But that is not my purpose in asking the distinguished majority leader, and I understand that he has to press on for final action on this matter. But there is a question which I hope the distinguished majority leader will answer, if he can.

In the event that we do not finish this measure today, does he intend to keep the Senate in tomorrow with rollcall votes? It is perfectly all right with me. I am going to be here anyway. As I say, we have had our shot.

As far as I am concerned, we invoked cloture, and I voted against cloture. So I have no problem.

I can vote right now on the rest of the amendments, and on final passage. But if we do not finish today, what can the Senators depend on on both sides of the aisle with respect to going to the memorial service tomorrow?

Will they miss rollcall votes here, or would the distinguished majority leader be able to tell us more after passage of a little more time this afternoon?

Mr. DOLE. Obviously, I want Senators to attend the memorial service. Many Senators' States are involved, and persons from their States are directly involved in this tragedy. If we can reach some agreement on a final vote, even as early as say next Tuesday, I would be prepared to say we would not be in tomorrow. But just to entertain one or two Members of the Senate or have them entertain us for the next 8 or 9 days does not appeal to me at all. If that is the case, I think we have to do what we can to bring this matter to a close.

I might be in a better position later on in the next 2 or 3 hours. There will be a plane available. It will not be a matter of catching an airplane tomorrow. It would be my hope we could complete action on this matter this week, and then take up TV in the Senate on Monday of next week. It may be that in a couple of hours I will be in a better position.

Mr. BYRD. Very well. I thank the majority leader.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the substitute.

Mr. METZENBAUM addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio.

AMENDMENT NO. 1531

In lieu of the language proposed to be inserted, insert the following:

That this Act may be cited as the "Conrail Sale Amendments Act of 1985".

FINDINGS

SEC. 2. The Congress finds that—

(1) the Northeast Rail Service Act of 1981 (45 U.S.C. 1101 et seq.) provided for an orderly return of Conrail freight service to the private sector;

(2) the provisions of the Northeast Rail Service Act of 1981 were successful in removing Conrail's obligations beyond railroad freight service and in otherwise preparing Conrail for an orderly return to the private sector;

(3) acting under section 403 of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 (45 U.S.C. 763), the Board of Directors of the United States Railway Association twice found Conrail to be a profitable corporation;

(4) acting under section 401 of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 (45 U.S.C. 761), the Secretary engaged an investment banker and arranged, through open competitive bidding and negotiation, to sell the interest of the United States in the common stock of Conrail;

(5) the Secretary's Plan for the sale of Conrail provides for sale of the interest of the United States in the common stock of Conrail to Norfolk Southern Corporation;

(6) the Secretary found that sale of the interest of the United States in the common stock of Conrail to Norfolk Southern Corporation best meets the sale criteria of (A) leaving Conrail in the strongest financial position after the sale, (B) preserving patterns of service to shippers and communities in the region Conrail serves, and (C) maximizing return to the Federal Government consistent with the criteria specified in clauses (A) and (B);

(7) amendments to the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 (45 U.S.C. 701 et seq.) and related laws are needed to permit the sale of the interest of the United States in the common stock of Conrail to Norfolk Southern Corporation and to permit cancellation of the interest of the United States in Conrail debt and preferred stock; and

(8) the Secretary's Plan satisfies the requirements of the Northeast Rail Service Act of 1981, including the intent, goals, and objectives relating to the sale of the interest of the United States in the common stock of Conrail and the requirements of section 401(e) of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 (45 U.S.C. 761(e)).

TITLE III—MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

COMMON CARRIER STATUS OF CONRAIL AFTER SALE

SEC. 301. (a) Conrail's status as a common carrier by railroad under section 10102(4) of title 49, United States Code, shall not be affected by virtue of sale of the interest of the United States in Conrail's common stock. Purchase of Conrail stock shall not alone be the basis of a determination that the acquiring entity has become a common carrier by railroad under section 10102(4) of title 49, United States Code.

(b) The Definitive Agreements shall contain a binding commitment by Norfolk Southern Corporation to continue to operate Conrail in full compliance with the provisions of section 10731(e) of title 49, United States Code.

CONSUMMATION OF SALE

SEC. 302. The sale of the interest of the United States in the common stock of Conrail shall be deemed to be consummated on the date title to the common stock passes to Norfolk Southern Corporation and the United States receives the cash purchase price.

CONTRACTS

SEC. 303. (a) Except as provided in subsection (b) of this section, nothing in this Act shall affect—

(1) Conrail's obligation to carry out its transportation contracts and equipment leases, equipment trusts, and conditional sale agreements, in accordance with their terms; and

(2) the obligation of any transferee of divested assets to carry out transportation contracts and equipment leases, equipment trusts, and conditional sale agreements to which such assets are subject, in accordance with their terms.

(b) If a divestiture carried out pursuant to the Secretary's Plan precludes Conrail from providing a transportation service for which it has contracted without a right of termination that may be exercised in the event of the sale of the interest of the United States in the common stock of Conrail and the divestiture will result in a change or modification in the movement of the traffic involved, the transferee of the divested rights and properties and Conrail shall provide the contracted-for service on terms and conditions which, to the maximum extent possible, conform to the terms and conditions in the contract.

CONGRESSIONAL OVERSIGHT OF COMPLIANCE

SEC. 304. The Secretary shall, no later than January 31 of each year, submit to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation of the Senate and to the Committee on Energy and Commerce of the House of Representatives a report setting forth each certificate which Norfolk Southern Corporation and Conrail provided to the Secretary, during the preceding year, certifying compliance with the covenants contained in the Definitive Agreements.

SEC. 305. If any provision of this Act or the application thereof to any person or circumstances is held invalid, the remainder of this Act and the application of such provision to other persons or circumstances shall not be affected thereby.

(b) Sections 108(a), 201 and 202 of this Act shall take effect on the date of consummation of the sale of the interest of the United States in the common stock of Conrail.

(c) Any provision of this Act which, pursuant to Article I, Section 7 of the Constitution, provides for raising revenue shall only be effective upon the enactment into law of a bill which has originated in the House of Representatives enacting such provision.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, this amendment is one that repeals the immunity given to the ESOP fiduciaries. There are 48,211 Conrail workers and the fiduciaries have an obligation to protect the trust assets. But under this provision as it is before us, the fiduciaries are given immunity. No reason is given for that immunity. All my amendment would do is repeal the immunity.

The workers who built Conrail are being asked to subsidize the acquisition. They stand to lose their retirement security. They are being shortchanged by nearly $400 million.

This sale plan would provide Conrail's employees a combined payment of $375 million for their 15 percent share of Conrail stock and for wages deferred between 1981 and 1984. That is not enough to give a fair price for the shares owned by ESOP.

The value of the ESOP, calculated on the basis of the amount Norfolk Southern is paying the Government per share of stock, is $212 million. Add to that the deferred wages of about $290 million per year between 1981 and 1984, and the total comes to $502 million, not including interest.

When you add in the interest, the total comes to $762 million.

But there is only $375 million being made available, so the employees are being short changed by $387 million. No wonder Norfolk Southern wants the fiduciaries protected. No wonder this agreement would provide for their protection.

Norfolk Southern plans to buy out Conrail's employees for less than half of what they are due.

Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is not a sufficient second.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

The legislative clerk continued to call the roll.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DANFORTH addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, the overwhelming majority of employees of Conrail approved of the buyout of the ESOP that is provided for by the deal. It seems reasonable that the fiduciaries should be immune from what amount to nuisance suits as part of the whole transaction. Therefore, I move to lay the amendment of the Senator from Ohio on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. DANFORTH. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Ohio may proceed for 1 minute.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The objection is heard.

The question is on agreeing to the motion to lay the amendment of the Senator from Ohio on the table. The yeas and nays have been ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk called the roll.

Mr. SIMPSON. I announce that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ARMSTRONG] is necessarily absent.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Montana [Mr. BAUCUS], and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. NUNN] are necessarily absent.

I further announce that the Senator from Hawaii [Mr. INOUYE] is absent on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. EVANS). Are there any other Senators in the Chamber desiring to vote? .

The result was announced—yeas 69, nays 27, as follows:

NOT VOTING—4

Armstrong	Inouye
Baucus	Nunn

So the motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

(Later the following occurred:)

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, I should like a point of information. Was the last vote on a tabling motion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes, the last vote was on a motion to table.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, how was I recorded on the last vote?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky was recorded in the affirmative.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, I thought it was an up-and-down vote, and in my inability to be sure that it was a tabling motion, I voted in the affirmative but wanted to vote in the negative.

Since it will not change the outcome, I ask unanimous consent that my vote be changed from "aye" to "nay."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, reserving the right to object—and I will not object—the tradition is that if the change of the vote does not affect the outcome of the vote, Senators are generally allowed to change their votes; and with that understanding, I have no objection.

Mr. FORD. That was my understanding, and that was part of my unanimous-consent request, that it would not change the outcome.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(The foregoing tally has been changed to reflect the above order.)

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to.

Mr. CHAFEE. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, I inquire of the Chair how long the last vote took.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Twenty-one minutes and ten seconds.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, I am told that there are well over 100 amendments at the desk. It is my hope to cut off the time for voting shortly after 15 minutes for each vote. I think that otherwise this is going to be even more prolonged that it might otherwise be.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate is put on notice that 15 minutes are allowed for a rollcall vote, and Senators should govern their actions accordingly.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, under the rules of the Senate, following cloture, each Senator is allocated 1 hour. At this point, I allocate my 1 hour to the minority leader.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. TRIBLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

VISIT TO THE SENATE BY THE MEMBERS OF THE CONGRESS OF THE REPUBLIC OF PERU

Mr. TRIBLE. Mr. President, it is my honor today to accompany to the floor of the U.S. Senate eight distinguished members of the Congress of Peru.

These gentlemen represent the Senate and the Chamber of Deputies. They are here to build a greater understanding between our two countries.

Let me say that I believe it is credibly important that those of us who represent the United States learn more about the realities, the problems, and the opportunities for those nations to our south.

I welcome them, and I hope that their visit here will lead to greater understanding between our two countries.

RECESS

Mr. TRIBLE. I at this point ask unanimous consent the Senate stand in recess for 5 minutes, and I invite my colleagues to take this opportunity to warmly welcome these good gentlemen to the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair notes with pleasure the presence of our distinguished visitors from Peru.

There being no objection, the Senate, at 4:10 p.m., recessed until 4:15 p.m.; whereupon, the Senate reassembled when called to order by the Presiding Officer [Mr. EVANS].

CONRAIL SALE AMENDMENTS ACT OF 1985

The Senate continued with the consideration of the bill (S. 638).

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, my understanding is that the Senator from Pennsylvania wishes to call up an amendment shortly.

Under the circumstances, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I take this time to urge my colleagues who have legitimate amendments to offer the amendments. There is a lot of pressure from Members asking me about how late tonight, and how long tomorrow. Of course, we want to accommodate those Members with amendments that they would like to offer. I am not in a position to indicate what may develop tomorrow. But if there are Members who are not on the floor in their offices, if they can be notified by members of their staff, we would like to bring this matter to a close. It would be appreciated.

It seems to me the Senate has spoken rather quickly. We would like to move on to final disposition. But obviously, if there are amendments that were not offered prior to cloture being invoked that are germane and are meritorious, of course we want to act on those hopefully without much debate, and with rollcalls that will permit us to finish this bill sometime between now and tomorrow morning.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, will the Chair please advise the Senator from Nebraska about what is the pending matter before the U.S. Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the substitute amendment.

Mr. EXON. Is there any reason the Chair could give me that we do not proceed to a vote on the matter before us?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is in front of us.

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, since we are not doing anything after nearly finishing a postcloture filibuster, I would call attention of the Senate to the question of where are all those people who were standing on the floor of the Senate Friday before Christmas or thereabouts wondering why in the world we cannot operate this body in a usual and a conventional manner?

I think this is a typical explanation of why we cannot get anything done.

The situation is simply this: right or wrong, cloture was invoked. I voted against cloture. I thought that was the wrong thing to do because I think the bill that is being passed here is a very bad one. But cloture was invoked.

The normal procedures are, I think under the founders of the Constitution and the early framers of the rules of this body, that after cloture is invoked, cloture has been invoked. Then as I understand it, and I am a relative newcomer here, we came along with the postcloture filibuster. That should be properly exercised and used.

But it seems to me that is not what we are going through here right now at 20 minutes of 5 in the afternoon is, when there are those who wish to leave for some good and valid reason. If we are going to have a postcloture filibuster, let us have a postcloture filibuster. I would suggest that those who want to take part in that have the obligation to be on the floor. I do not understand either the majority or minority protecting whoever it is who wants to come on this floor and offer whatever they want in a series of amendments.

I call upon those who have been on this floor on many occasions saying it is time we straighten out the affairs of disorder while protecting the rights of all to come forth now and say let us move forward in the U.S. Senate and take care of our legitimate business.

I would remind my colleagues it was shortly before Christmas when we called a special meeting one morning. We got the majority leader and the minority leader there and we said, "Is it not terrible the way we run this body?" Everybody who was there agreed it was terrible the way we ran this body. I think it is even worse when we run this body in a fashion that either the majority leader or the minority leader, or both, are protecting certain individuals, for whatever reason I do not know, and they are not here to press forward with their rights in a postcloture filibuster.

That is why we waste time in meaningless, needless, and time-consuming quorum calls all at the time when we pretend we have a lot of important business to carry on.

For the life of me, Mr. President, I do not understand why, a few moments ago when there was no one on the floor of the Senate to proceed with amendments in a postcloture filibuster, we did not move briskly ahead at that time with a final vote on the measure.

As long as we are going to continue, both the majority and minority leadership of this body, to protect Senators who are not here on the floor, as long as we are going to delay, as long as we are going to put in quorum calls when someone suggests we move ahead, then we are kidding ourselves if we think we are ever going to make any meaningful reforms in the way this place does business.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the substitute amendment.

Mr. DOLE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I certainly share the views expressed by the distinguished Senator from Nebraska. Indeed, this bill could be finished if amendments were here to be voted upon. I know there is a Senator on this side with amendments and a Senator on the other side with an amendment. But we are going to stay here. I hate to inconvenience 98 Members for the convenience of 2 Members. A number of our colleagues have already departed.

I have no quarrel with the remarks of the Senator from Nebraska. I would hope the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania, Senator HEINZ, would come to the floor. He indicated earlier he had four amendments. We have been waiting now for 40 minutes for him to come to the floor. If he does not come to the floor, we will have a rollcall and have Senators come in. That will inconvenience Senators on both sides. We can resort to having a quorum call every hour, permitting someone to go home for a while and then have to come back and then at sometime we will be prepared to vote. If we have to do that, we will do that. We will not let 1 or 2 Senators inconvenience 97.

Mr. GOLDWATER. If the Senator will yield, I was glad to hear my friend from Nebraska comment on filibuster because earlier several of us who have been here for some years were talking about filibusters and the way they used to be heard. The first thing we heard every year was, "Let us amend rule XXII." That went on for years and years.

We finally amended rule XXII until we have gotten it into the god-awful shape it is in today when one man can abuse the whole Senate. That is what is happening today. One man or two men. It is not 50 or 60 but one man or two men.

In fact, this Senate is being abused to the extent by one man that many of us are not going to be able to go to Houston tomorrow to pay our respects to some decent Americans. I resent it deeply.

If I were the floor leader, I would recess and go home.

I am glad the Senator from Nebraska spoke as he did and I hope other people will speak likewise. It is an abuse by a few people of a rule that has been amended and amended all in the interest of decency and human beings. I do not like what is going on one bit.

Mr. EXON. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. GOLDWATER. Yes, I yield.

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, I appreciate the remarks by my friend and colleague, Senator GOLDWATER.

I hope no one is misunderstanding what I am saying. This Senator was accused, I think wrongfully, not too long ago of filibustering in the Senate. It was not post-cloture filibuster but it was a mini-filibuster or a filibuster, call it what you will, because I happened to feel very strongly about a farm bill that I was not satisfied with. But I thought we lived within the rules. We stayed on the floor. We did whatever was necessary within the rules.

I guess what I am most objecting to is that I came on the floor a few moments ago and looked around and no one that I knew of participating in the filibuster was on the floor. It seems to me that that would have been the time and fully under the rules, since those who were filibustering were not here to protect themselves, to move ahead with the vote. But when I brought that up, someone somewhere said, "We have to protect" a certain Senator from that side of the aisle who was away somewhere "and we are waiting for him to come over to offer four or five amendments."

I suggest when you get especially into a post-cloture filibuster situation you had better be here to protect your interests or you fall by the wayside.

Let me make it clear, I am not critizing anyone who is legitimately using the rules in regular filibuster or in post-cloture filibuster so long as they are here under the rules to protect their interest. But when they are not, I suggest we should move expeditiously ahead—I suspect that the vast majority of this body would like to do that—and have the vote. If they are not here to protect themselves, they lose.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. EXON. I yield.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I am glad the Senator mentioned the rules. If there is one thing wrong with this body, it is that we do not follow the rules. How many times do we complete a vote in 15 minutes? Do you know how many days we spent last year going over the 15 minutes? It was 12 days. Why? We were waiting for one man. I do not know why we wait for one man. I think most of us can get over here and vote, but now we wait for someone with an amendment. If they do not get here, we have an old expression, to hell with them.

[Laughter.]

Mr. METZENBAUM addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, let us not lose our perspective. I want to say to my friend from Nebraska that I was not absent; I was having a sandwich in the cloakroom. I was here. We are not moving forward at the moment because the Senator from Pennsylvania indicated he wanted to call up an amendment at 4:30. At 4:20, I did not call up an amendment but decided to wait until after 4:30.

But the fact is there is no filibuster going on. Everyone is talking about filibuster. Let us put this in its proper perspective.

Immediately upon filing the substitute bill, the majority leader laid down a cloture motion. The U.S. Senate has been known as a body that has open and free debate; but a cloture motion cuts off debate.

On Tuesday, unfortunately, we could not be in session for reasons that are well known to all of us, so there was not that much time left on Wednesday and we had Senators on the floor trying to get their amendments up. The Senator from Ohio had amendments to call-up but the Senator from New Jersey wanted to callup one; the Senator from Arizona wanted to call-up one but did not get his called up. The Senator from South Dakota took a lot of time in connection with his amendment and there was not an opportunity to call up every amendment.

Immediately after cloture was invoked, I called up an amendment, a germane amendment. I have other germane amendments which I expect to call up. But I thought it was a matter of courtesy to the Senator from Pennsylvania to permit him to go with his amendment as the second one.

I say to my colleague from Nebraska, we are not in a post-cloture filibuster, we are in a post-cloture situation that became inevitable because a cloture motion was filed prematurely without the Senate having had an ample opportunity to debate this subject.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold?

Mr. METZENBAUM. I yield the floor.

Mr. EXON. I say to my friend and colleague from Ohio, whom I have stood with, I think, on every vote in the matter before us, I doubt if we differ one iota. I think we have the same concern about the matter before us. But whatever he calls it, we have invoked cloture on this bill.

I think whatever you call it, any series of amendments thereafter, regardless of the timeliness or lack of timeliness of the cloture motion that was filed by the majority leader—which he has every right to do—we are not in a situation of stalling. You can say it is not a filibuster if you wish.

I think, though, Mr. President, my friend and colleague from Ohio, for whom I have a highest respect, has just proven the point I made when I arose. He said he went off the floor to have lunch in the cloakroom. When he did that, he lost his right to the floor. Of course, fortunately from his standpoint, he transferred the obligation at that time to the leadership on this side of the floor. So we have a strained situation.

We have the majority leader, who is strongly in support of this measure, allowing the protection from his side of the aisle—I might have done the same for my colleague from Ohio had he asked me to do so. But I came on the floor and there was no one.

It seems to me the statement the Senator from Ohio made proved my point. If Senators are not here at the right time to protect their interest, why is it not the responsibility of the leadership to move ahead? Now they cannot do it because the Senator is on the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the substitute amendment.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, does the Senator from Pennsylvania seek recognition?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the substitute amendment.

CALL OF THE ROLL

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I move that the Sergeant at Arms be instructed to request the attendance of the absent Senators. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

CONRAIL SALE AMENDMENTS ACT OF 1985

AMENDMENTS NO. 1560

(Purpose: To restrict the definition of definitive agreements)

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I call up my amendment No. 1560.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. HEINZ] proposes an amendment numbered 1560.

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 4, line 14, insert after "paragraph (4)(A)" the following: "except that such term shall not include any agreements unless there is a binding and restrictive agreement with Norfolk Southern Corporation that—

"(A) such corporation's ability to utilize Conrail's built-in losses (determined presumptively by an allocation among Conrail's tangible and intangible assets of the cash price paid for the Conrail stock, plus remaining Conrail liabilities, less Conrail cash, marketable securities, inventory, and the value of its excess pension assets) shall be restricted in a manner consistent with existing Federal tax law and regulations and with the Secretary's understanding that Norfolk Southern Corporation shall abide by, and remain subject to, the limitations set forth in Income Tax Regulations section 1.1502-15 and other related provisions of the Federal Income Tax Regulations, and

"(B) such corporation will not directly or indirectly utilize Conrail's built-in losses by any means or through any device or method (including, but not limited to, stock or property transfers, or other capital or operating arrangements, having the effect of shifting taxable income to Conrail) having the effect of reducing the Federal tax liability of Norfolk Southern Corporation's affiliated group (other than Conrail and its existing subsidiaries).".

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, very simply this amendment would not permit the sale to Norfolk Southern to occur unless there is an agreement with Norfolk Southern which restricts Norfolk Southern's ability to use Conrail's built-in depreciation deductions and which restricts Norfolk Southern's ability directly or indirectly to shift Norfolk Southern's taxable income to Conrail.

I might say, Mr. President, that this amendment is for all intents and purposes entirely consistent with statements made by the Secretary of Transportation, Mrs. Dole.

There is a reason both why she is right in her policy pronouncement and why this amendment is right, and it is simply a matter not just of commonsense but of dollars and cents. The tax benefits to Norfolk Southern by virtue of this sale simply constitute a rebate of a portion of the $1.2 billion purchase price that has been agreed upon. And for every dollar of extra tax benefit that Conrail cannot use and which Norfolk Southern can use to shelter and successfully avoid taxes on existing profitable operations, the taxpayers, the Treasury, we the Federal Government are out of pocket by exactly that amount, and the purchase price is accordingly worth to us that much less.

How much is the rebate? How much money are we talking about? What is the revenue loss to the Federal Government?

The administration concedes that it is $200 million. The Joint Tax and Congressional Budget Office, and I have somewhat more faith in them, estimate that it is $400 million. Both of these estimates, by the way, are through fiscal year 1990, and there are additional revenue loss in both cases in the outyears.

Let me tell you what the issue is not about. The issue is not whether tax benefits to Norfolk Southern flow from special tax treatment versus any other business transaction. No; that is not the issue. The issue is really, as I said at the outset, since we the Federal Government are the seller, and we are presumably interested in getting what we are getting, $1.2 billion, you have to net the tax benefit, whether it is $200 million or $400 million, to figure out how much this is really going to get the Government.

I said that the revenue loss is depending on the estimate you believe between $200 million and $400 million through fiscal 1990.

Compared to the Morgan Stanley offer, which would have raised the ante by $200 million, that really is a $400 million to $600 million difference.

My colleagues, I know, Mr. President, have elected not to adopt the Morgan Stanley approach, but in rejecting it without the adoption of this amendment, this Senate will have put a $400 million to $600 million hole in the $1.2 billion purchase price, not something I want to be guilty of.

Now, I want to be clear about what this amendment will limit. It will constrain, but it is not going to eliminate in its entirety the Norfolk Southern use of Conrail tax benefits. It is designed in response to the Secretary's statements that Norfolk Southern should not be allowed to gain access to Conrail's built-in deductions arising from assets as of the day of sale.

So, its goal is a modest goal and that is to limit the use of Conrail's tax deductions to offset Conrail's income, not other existing income producing operations of Norfolk Southern.

The amendment, as I stated, is drafted in a way to allow the maximum opportunity for the Revenue Service and the Treasury Department to nail down in advance all the problems to make it self-enforcing. How does it do that? Well, basically what it says is that there will not be an agreement to sell Conrail unless the IRS first gets a binding and restrictive agreement between the IRS and Norfolk Southern, that restricts Norfolk Southern's ability to utilize Conrail's built-in losses, and that Norfolk Southern will not directly nor indirectly utilize Conrail's built-in losses by any means or through any device or method having the effect of shifting taxable income to Conrail.

How can Norfolk Southern reduce its tax liability? Very simply, if Norfolk Southern has a profitmaking subsidiary and decides we are going to shift that into the Conrail subsidiary, then it will use some of Conrail's excess depreciation to shelter income from that other subsidiary. This income shifting is going to cost the Federal Government money and that is what we should be alert to.

We probably are incapable of drafting an amendment that is perfect in closing off every avenue by which Norfolk Southern might some way or another utilize tax benefits derived by the acquisition of Conrail. This amendment requires the Internal Revenue Service to sit down with Norfolk Southern and execute an agreement consistent with the intent of Congress. I believe this amendment represents a very good-faith attempt to reduce the loss in tax revenues which we will suffer if we go ahead and sell Conrail to Norfolk Southern. It represents, by and large, quite an effective means of doing that, and most important it assures better than the bill before us and better than any other policy I am yet aware of that the Government actually receives the value of the $1.2 billion purchase price when all the receipts and lack of them are counted that we say we want to get.

I want to add to the RECORD at this point a quotation from a letter dated

December 20, written by Mrs. Dole, the Secretary of Transportation, to Congressman JAMES FLORIO, the chairman of the Subcommittee on Commerce, Transportation, and Tourism of the House Energy and Commerce Committee. The letter states in its relevant paragraph on page 5:

I should add, however, that both the Department of the Treasury and this Department believe that Norfolk Southern will not be able to gain access to Conrail's built-in deductions arising from the latter's depreciable assets as of the sale data. You will recall that I testified before your subcommittee that I do not oppose—do not oppose statutory language to ensure this result.

This statutory language ensures that result. It does not go beyond that intent. It is consistent with the Secretary's avowed policy. I urge my colleagues to adopt it.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Have the yeas and nays been ordered?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. They have not.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I commend my distinguished colleague for the introduction of this amendment. On the face of the current record, it is obvious that any sale of Conrail to Norfolk Southern will be a bonanza for Norfolk Southern and a tremendous loss for the American taxpayers. Conrail is an entity which has cost the Federal Government in excess of $7 billion.

This body has rejected a superior offer from Morgan Stanley which would produce $200 million more than that offered by Norfolk Southern. There are tremendous losses to the consumers of this country by the antitrust implications and the reduction of competition by a joinder of Conrail and Norfolk Southern, and there should not be any further losses to the American people, the American taxpayers of American business or American consumers.

The disclosures by the Congressional Budget Office show a loss of some $400 million in taxes. The updated report by the Department of the Treasury, doubtless partisan in nature, shows an overall loss in the range of $175 million, reduced to present value to $125 million. Other analyses have demonstrated the tax loss in the range of $400 million.

Considering the bonanza and great value to Norfolk Southern of the tremendous value in the Conrail assets, it is the judgment of this Senator that Norfolk Southern ought not to be the beneficiary of these tax breaks. And for these reasons I am pleased to join my distinguished colleague from Pennsylvania in support of this amendment.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, first, it should be said that this amendment is really, I believe, sour grapes. This amendment is to say: "Well, we lost. We lost the cloture vote, we lost the Morgan Stanley vote and, having lost all that, let's change the deal in such a way that it would be totally unattractive to Norfolk Southern. Let's kill it."

Mr. President, I think we have made that decision in the Senate. We made that decision after considerable debate over the purchase cost and the tax consequences. The tax matters have been studied. The Treasury Department has studied them at great length. The Treasury Department has written letters on the subject, analyzing the tax consequences. It has all been debated in the Senate. Now, postcloture, the Senator from Pennsylvania suggests that we get into it all again.

Mr. President, what the Senator from Pennsylvania would do in his amendment is to rewrite the built-in deduction rules in our tax laws. And these constitute some of the most complex aspects of the tax laws of this country. The consolidated return regulations, which are touched by this, comprise some 127 pages of the tax regulations. It is an extraordinarily complicated rewriting of the method of computing deductions for Norfolk Southern after the deal is entered into.

I do not think we want to get into this complex matter involving a fine tuning of our tax laws, aimed at one company—one company—a company specific. I do not think it is right. I do not think we want tax laws that single out one company.

I think that, given the fact that it totally wrecks the deal and wrecks the economics of this deal, this is an amendment we do not want to agree to and, therefore, Mr. President, I move to table the amendment.

Mr. HEINZ. Will the Senator withhold his motion for just a minute?

Mr. DANFORTH. I will withhold my motion to table for 1 minute.

Mr. HEINZ. Well, would the Senator from Missouri be willing to answer a question or two?

Mr. DANFORTH. No, I am not. I am not going to get into a debate on this.

I move to table the amendment and I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. DANFORTH] to table the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SPECTER]. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk called the roll.

Mr. SIMPSON. I announce that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER] is necessarily absent.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. NUNN] and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STENNIS] are necessarily absent.

I further announce that the Senator from Hawaii [Mr. INOUYE] is absent on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any other Senators in the Chamber who desire to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 63, nays 33, as follows:

So the motion to lay on the table amendment No. 1560 was agreed to.

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to.

Mr. FORD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, the Senate has worked its will on this amendment, but I want to draw the attention of the Senate to something I think is not in the tradition of the Senate.

I said earlier today that it is important for substantive amendments to be carefully weighed and evaluated and to be debated. The amendment I offered a few minutes ago—perhaps the results would not have been any different—was debated briefly by me. I spoke for 6, 7, or 8 minutes. Senator SPECTER spoke for 2, 3, or 4 minutes.

In opposition, the Senator from Missouri, the manager of the bill, spoke for 1 or 2 minutes. I asked him if he would yield for a question and he said, "No."

It is his right not to yield for a question. He was within every single right of not yielding.

But, nonetheless, when we are considering an amendment of serious importance that involves some $200 million or $400 million, depending on who you believe, it is in the interest of good debate, serious, professional legislative work, to answer reasonable questions.

The Senator from Pennsylvania did not have a chance to propound the question. He was not given a chance.

Mr. President, I fear that this is one of the consequences that we inflict upon ourselves when our leadership decides, as is the leadership's perfect right, to file a cloture motion on the very instant a bill is taken up by the Senate and sends out the word, "It is time to move ahead down the track," and it does not make any difference whether anybody wants to have a chance to ask where the train is going or why it is leaving.

This is too important a body, our tradition prizes debate too highly, to simply rush, without proper consideration.

How much more time might we have spent? Five minutes? Ten minutes? At the outside, 15 minutes. At least we would be making the record clear to the public as to what the issues were.

The public is not going to know. Maybe that is the way we want to write the public record. I do not think most of us do. And I am not going to second-guess my colleague from Missouri; I am not going to try to ask him after the fact a lot of pertinent questions as to whether, in fact, there would have been, in his judgment, $200 or $400 million worth of revenue loss. I think I know how he would have answered that question had he let it be asked. He would probably have let it be answered in the affirmative, because he knows what the facts are.

When he claimed that the amendment was rewriting the 127 pages of the consolidated return portion of the Internal Revenue Service Code, if I had had the opportunity to ask him if he had read the amendment and whether, in fact, it modified one word in the Internal Revenue Code—which it does not—I am sure he would have, on reconsideration, corrected the record.

When, had I had the chance, I would have asked him whether or not the Secretary of Transportation had made the statements that I quoted into the RECORD in her letter of December 20 to Mr. FLORIO, a factual matter, I think the Senator from Missouri would have answered that accurately and agreed that that was the policy of the Department of Transportation, at least on December 20.

When I first came to this body, someone said, "Well, John, you may have disagreements with people, but just remember something: Everybody is entitled to their own opinion but we are only entitled, you and whoever you are debating with are only entitled to one set of facts." The purpose of the debate in this body is at least to isolate what the facts are. We can differ in our conclusions and the relevance of those important pieces of information, but we should never obscure the facts.

We should not obscure the ability of the Senate to illuminate issues. I fear that the last 2 days, we have very much darkened in this body the light in which the debate should be carried on.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. RIEGLE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GRAMM). The Senator from Michigan.

Mr. REIGLE. I thank the Chair. I want to acknowledge the remarks of the Senator from Pennsylvania, who, I think, makes very important points here.

I appreciate the feeling with which he expresses his points. I want to join him. I feel the same uneasy feeling that he has just ably described. I think examples of arbitrariness are less than what we ought to see in terms of the conduct of the Senate toward any Senator, regardless of which side of the aisle—not just here on the floor but in committee as well, not just on this issue but other issues as well. I think this is an important matter to at least think about at this particular moment.

I congratulate the Senator from Pennsylvania for making those points, for insisting, I think, upon his proper rights as a Senator to try to have an important matter of this kind looked at, evaluated, weighed.

I got the feeling yesterday and in the previous days of debate on this matter that, in a sense, the fix is in. It has been in for a long time. The decision was made some time ago in the administration to go with the Norfolk Southern package come hell or high water, even if they were the low bidder and there was a big difference in dollar offers; even if there were no operating plan; even if there were major antitrust problems and no clearance from the Justice Department; even if there were no labor agreements, all of which is the case, and was the case when we took this up in the committee.

We were not able to get straight answers on any of those things at that time. There was a big rush to report it out, bring it up, make it the first big business of the Senate in the second session. Frankly, in my view, any matter that comes out and is complex and is the first item out of the box had a hard time getting the kind of consideration it ought to get, especially one that I think is not one that Members see, Members off the Commerce Committee or outside the immediate geographical areas affected, or necessarily able to spend all that much time working on. We have spent a lot of time on other things—Gramm-Rudman, and people in other committees on other things, tax reform and what have you. So this is a matter many Senators are beginning to deal with in an immediate way for the first time when it was brought to the floor just a matter of a few days ago.

So, Mr. President, this is the kind of question, an important question, a big question in terms of the policy issues, in terms of the fallout, in terms of how the economic system is going to work and certainly in dollars and cents terms, right down into the budget deficit itself, which is, of course, a problem of enormous magnitude, as we all know. It seems to me this is the kind of issue where we would not want to hurry and we would not want to suppress facts or questions or information, as the Senator from Pennsylvania speaks about them, but rather, that we would want to accord ourselves the opportunity to get as much information as possible, have full debate, not run roughshod over anybody, in order to see to it that, in the end, we can all walk away with the confidence that at least we have had our say, there has been full consideration and a proper consideration. And if we have to be on the losing side, at least we can leave with the satisfaction that there was a full and open and balanced and fair debate.

It seems to me we are entitled to that, the country is entitled to that. And no Senator, whether he is a committee chairman or in any other position of leadership, has the right, in my view, to run over the edges in that area, not now or at any other time.

So I hope—I know when we are on the floor for long periods of time and people are tired and tempers are short, I think it is easy sometimes to be arbitrary, not necessarily even intentionally. But that is not any excuse for it, whether it is intentional or unintentional. I hope that we would not see ourselves in that situation. I think we are hurrying too fast on this and we do not have the answers.

I am frank to say as a member of the Commerce Committee that has jurisdiction in this matter—and I have served on that committee now for 9 years—I have seen a lot happen on that committee over that period of time, under a variety of leadership, on different issues that have come down the track. I will make it as plain as I can make it: I think we have done a poor job on this situation in this committee. I do not think we have done a good job to bring it out here because we do not have the definitive answers in any one of the question areas that properly need to be raised and settled on this matter.

We do not have final determination from the Justice Department on the antitrust issues, yet we are urged to go ahead despite not having that. In fact, because we know there are problems in this area, we are asked to put an antitrust exemption in the law to create a special waiver to forestall problems that are here in the antitrust area. I do not think that is a way to handle a matter of this complexity.

On the labor agreements, when I asked that question, there are a lot of jobs involved here and I think it is important to ask what is going to happen to those people. I think they have some right to know. I think it is a fair question, one that deserves an answer. We were told in the committee that there were agreements worked out, there were understandings. It turned out that was false. Those were false assertions. Afterward, I gathered all of the labor organizations in my office and I asked them point blank if this was true. And they said no, it was not true. It was not true then and it is not true today. So there are no understandings and agreements in that area. There ought to be. They may not be ones I would agree with or they would agree with but, nevertheless, if we are about to execute this deal it seems to me we have a right to have that kind of issue sorted out.

How about an operating plan? I have a lot of shippers in my State. I will not necessarily name them by name, well-known companies, major shippers that use the rail lines all across the country who are very much concerned about what is going to happen in terms of freight rates and accessibility in getting their products to market, and so forth, They are very much concerned.

The Department of Transportation in my State has come back with an adverse finding on it because we are finding in my State that businesses are harmed rather than helped in this package. Others apparently feel they are helped. But we do not have a comprehensive operating plan yet. We did not have it at the time the committee met. I asked for it. We were told it was not ready, and it has not been put together since. We do not have it today and yet we are asked to go ahead.

Of course, that brings us around to the question of the dollars and cents. Since the committee acted some time ago, things have changed. One of the things that has changed is one of the serious bidders in this case, Morgan Stanley, putting together a consortium of major blue-ribbon investors around the country, has come to us and said, "Look, we are willing to buy these assets and to continue this railroad in operation and we are willing to pay more money, cash on the table, a cashier's check at the closing, that will be $200 million higher than the bid that has been made by Norfolk Southern." And you will not have all the other problems. You will not have the anticompetitive problems because you will maintain a competitive railroad and the other matters will be worked out and in addition the tax credits, which our own Congressional Budget Office tells us are $400 million that adversely will come right down through to the Federal deficit if this deal goes through as recommended to Norfolk Southern, they have said. But they do not have to say it. We can say it. We know that they, these defects, do not apply in the case of the Morgan Stanley offer, and so just the sheer dollar difference magnifies up from $200 million to at least $600 million. In fact, the figure is higher because there are some other factors.

And so it is adverse in that respect. And yet in the interest of what, I am not quite sure. The momentum. People have taken positions. People's reputations are at stake. People have gotten out on this limb, and so forth, and so we have to go ahead and we have to do this despite all these facts.

I do not think the Senators from Pennsylvania particularly enjoyed the struggle that they have had to go through, Senator SPECTER, who for many days was involved, and Senator HEINZ, who has just spoken a moment ago. Others of us who have strong feelings about it have not taken time to speak many times on this. I have only spoken once and that was yesterday. I had hoped we would see some movement because these facts are very powerful facts. Something needs to be changed here.

We ought not to just automatically be backed into the decision at the end of having to accept the Norfolk Southern offer because that offer on its face and in comparison to our other options is defective. The bid is not high enough. It is much too low. The antitrust problems are there. They have not been resolved. We do not have the labor understandings, nor do we have an operating plan. So why are we going ahead? Why are we going to do something that on every major count is adverse as one would weigh it to the interests of the country.

I want to say something I said yesterday. This is not to speak against Norfolk Southern. I think that it is a very well-managed railroad. They have a very fine record of success. I applaud that. I think they know how to operate very successfully in the railroad business, but that does not mean that you turn around and sell them very valuable public assets at less than full value. We should not sell them oil lands or anything they might want at less than full value or less than somebody else is standing there saying they are prepared to offer us as is the case in at least the other two offers. I think at this point if we opened up this bidding the way we ought to, we would get additional bidders coming forward at even higher price levels.

I do not blame Norfolk Southern in a sense for wanting to get a good deal if they can. If they come in and buy these assets at far less than full value, they are doing a good job for their shareholders, they are enhancing the value of their company. That is the way the private enterprise system works. But that is not the way the public system works. These are public assets. Conrail does not belong to the Commerce Committee or to any member of the Commerce Committee or to the Transportation Department or to the Reagan administration or to this Senate or to this Congress. The Conrail system today belongs to 240 million Americans and they have been asked to invest in it over a period of time by our actions, and we have done so. And lo and behold it has worked quite well; a successful railroad operation has been put together that has enhanced the rail transportation system in this country.

We have more people at work, we have more competition on rates, holding rates down, we have more options for shipping for people out there who need to ship their goods over the rail system. So we have come out ahead.

It has been a good investment. We are making money. It is a profitable operation. I am not prepared to go from that to say that it ought to stay within the Government, because I do not think that. I think it is time to move it out into the private sector. So I would agree, for example, with the position of the committee that the time to act on this is in this timeframe. That does not mean today or tomorrow but certainly within the period of the next few months.

I think in calendar year 1986 we ought to be able to make a reasoned and rational and sound decision on this issue. But we are not in a position to make it right now even though we are being rushed into that. We are being backed into what I think is clearly a defective alternative. But the people who are the losers here are not just the Senator from Pennsylvania, who I think was not treated properly, if I may say so, a short time ago in this matter, and others of us who may in one way or another have gotten a little bit in the way of short shrift in terms of a chance to weigh in with facts and a position on this thing. But if we sell these assets at less than full value, if we go with the low bidder and not a higher bid that is available, we are really defrauding the American people. We are taking the money out of their pockets because they are the ones who own Conrail, not any of the other agencies of Government that I mentioned before. It is the American people that own it, 9½ million people of Michigan who are equity holders in Conrail today and they deserve to get full value when it is sold. That is true of the people of every one of the other 49 States.

So I do not think we are being unreasonable to ask for that. In fact, I would say that the people who say, "No, we cannot get that and we have to hurry and time is up, let's go ahead and let's do it now," I think they are the ones being unreasonable, most unreasonable.

The public will be the loser in this case. That is the thing that is painful. We have just gone through this exercise—I serve as many of my colleagues do as a member of the Senate Budget Committee, and I have now for some years, and I have watched as we have gone through all of the tortured exercises of trying to bring down the Federal budget deficits.

I have watched Chairman DOMENICI lead that effort, who I think is one of the most talented Members of this body, working long hours. I think he impaired in some instances his own health to try to get the job done. But here we are still with budget deficits in the range of $200 billion a year, and we are trying now with automatic, across-the-board cuts in Gramm-Rudman, if they take effect, to bring the budget deficits down because we do not have enough money.

We are in a very bad financial condition, fiscal condition. Here is a chance to do something to help that problem but not if we do not sell to the high bidder. If we have a chance to sell it for at least $200 million more than what is being recommended here, and in fact have an additional $400 million available through the offset of the tax credits, so a total of $600 million or six-tenths of a billion dollars, that is a lot of money.

Let us bring that down through to the bottom line; namely, the Federal budget deficit. Let us use that for the remainder of this fiscal year, the part that would kick in and for the coming fiscal year. Let us use that to reduce that deficit. I think this is one of the few things we can do. I think there is a consensus to privatize, if you will, with respect to Conrail.

I think there is a bona fide consensus on both sides that says it is time to move it out from under the umbrella of Government and into the private sector. That clearly is the view that I hold. But having established the notion that that is the sensible thing to do, why under any set of arguments are we prepared to do that at less than full value and less than somebody else is willing to pay?

I used the analogy yesterday of the New York Stock Exchange because if you want to buy or sell a security that passes through the New York Stock Exchange you do it in an open market. It is done right there on the floor and you come down and you offer what you have for sale and somebody is bidding on the other side. The sale is consummated between the person selling and the highest bidder, because the person who is selling wants the highest offer, and they have a right to get it, and that is why we have an open market system. It is one thing that differentiates our economic system from that of other nations that operate differently. I believe in that very strongly. I thought that when I served on the other side of the aisle, and I think it as well when I serve on the side of the aisle.

If we try to sell securities on the floor of the New York Stock Exchange or in an open market and there is more than one bidder, normally we would sell to the high bidder. We would take the person who is offering the highest price. But here we are being asked to violate all those rules of commerce, all those rules of common sense and the things we talk about in terms of how we work on our way through commercial transactions. In this sense, the loser is the American people, because this belongs to them.

So here we are, in the process of selling it off, being urged to auction it off, but instead of selling to a higher bidder, we are going to sell it to the low bidder.

It is not surprising that the Senator from Pennsylvania, the Senator from Nebraska, the Senator from Iowa, the Senator from Minnesota, this Senator, and Senators I have talked to on that side of the aisle do not have a good taste in their mouths about this. They might not say it the way I am saying it because of the relationships involved. Nobody wants to offend anybody else in the administration or anybody on the committee or in a position of leadership on this issue. But is that more important than being willing to offend the American people, willing to offend common sense, in terms of the decision we will have to make here and the effects that everybody will have to live with?

I think that sometimes we end up concerning ourselves on matters such as this, and we end up doing the wrong thing for our own personal purposes: personal reputations, the awkwardness of reversing a position, the awkwardness of opening the bidding process again, if new bids have come in that are higher.

Everybody says, "No, we can't do that, because maybe that will reflect a little badly on this person or that person." What about the American people? When we get television in here, and I gather that it is coming, and the American people have a chance to watch this—if they were watching this debate over the last several days and we were to have a referendum and they could vote as to who would get these assets, I have no doubt in my mind what the American people would do. They would say, "Sell to the high bidder. We need the money."

People are now talking about higher taxes, some on that side of the aisle and some on this side of the aisle. Nobody wants to think about that in terms of solving the deficit problem. I should think they would say, "If you are going to sell public assets, sell them at the highest price. Get all the money you can. That is my money. Those are our assets."

That is what the people of Michigan would say, even without knowing about the problems that relate to the transportation difficulties this package would create for our section of the country. They would say, "Get full value. I don't want my taxes going up. I want the deficit going down."

So if you can sell this for $1.8 billion instead of $1.4 billion, sell it. I do not think we worked very hard to get buyers. In fact, I think that if we opened the competition again for the next 6 months—and I am talking about legitimately—if the Department of Transportation said to the country, "If there is anybody out there willing to come forward with a serious operating plan and is willing to offer $1.6 billion, $1.8 billion, or $2 billion or more." and presumably there would be some tax offset on the tax credits, I think other people would come forward.

That is my judgment, but we have already seen it happen in the case of two other serious bidders, and I think we would see more. But they, the Transportation Department, are not prepared to do that, because for some reason—and it is not clear to me exactly what the reason is—we are in an awful hurry to do this.

I know why Norfolk Southern is in a hurry—because it is a very good deal for them, and they know it. I do not disparage them for trying to make the best deal they can. But we are not here as agents for Norfolk Southern—at least, I hope we are not. I sometimes feel, when I hear some of the comments, that perhaps we are. But I do not think we are. I think we are here as agents for the American people, and the American people deserve the best deal they can get.

I can tell you pointblank that the Commerce Committee has not brought the best deal before the Senate. That is not the best deal, and it is not an adequate deal. It is a poor deal; it is a bad deal.

As I say, I am somewhat at a loss to understand exactly what the circumstances were in the collection of judgments that would have brought us to this, to do something in a hurry here that really is unsound. It is far less sound than other options available to us this very day. I think better options could be found, if we were willing to work at it.

I will conclude by saying this to the Senator from Pennsylvania. I have served with him a long time. We served together in the House on the same side of the aisle. We served on the opposite sides of the aisle in the House. We have served in the Senate a long period of time. I though what he said was very important and I think very well said and very appropriate.

If we ever get to the point here where any Senators, through any set of circumstances, as to who is in charge or how bills are being managed or the frustrations of debate or who is on what side of what position—if we ever get to the point here where one Senator is more important than another, or there is any appearance that anybody thinks that or acts that way, we are in big trouble, because that is not the way it is. We are all equal in this body, regardless of the size of the States we represent or how long we have been here, and that is how it should be. My State is the 8th largest, but that does not mean anything in terms of whether somebody else happens to be from the State that is 50th in size in terms of rank. When we come here on the floor, we should be able to act back and forth in good faith between each other, accord each other the privilege of being able to present our point of view, to argue it, to get full answers, and to get the facts out on the table. When that does not happen, the Senate and the country are losers.

If we back into this Norfolk Southern thing the way it has been done here, I think the Senate will not have met its responsibility to the American people. I think it will be a disappointing performance from start to finish, in terms of that being the outcome and our saying that is the best we can do in light of the existing circumstances. It is not the best we can do. We can do a lot better, but we are not going to do a lot better if we are not willing to make the effort to do it.

Those are the views of this Senator.

I reserve the remainder of my time, in terms of my 1 hour.

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I am not going to respond to the conspiracy theory that has been propounded by the Senator from Michigan. I am not going to spend time saying that we are all guilty of falsehoods, as he has suggested, or untruths, or that this has been illegitimate dealing for this railroad, as he has characterized it, or that we are all participating as defrauders, as he suggested.

Everything that the Senator said he said last night at the top of his lungs.

It is not as though this is the first time we have had a chance to debate this. We have had this before this body for nearly 2 weeks, and indeed if it is all that important I notice that last Friday we did not even meet by agreement. The Senator from Michigan and his conferees on the other side who are opposed to this wanted to take the day off. They did not want to debate this.

This suggestion that we have not had a chance to go through this matter thoroughly is hogwash.

Now he suggested that there has not been an opening for people to come forward and bid. The bidding started in this in 1982 and at some time you have to say enough is enough and you close the door and get on with making your decision.

Now, Mr. President, I am not going to go through all the details of the bidding. We know that it was narrowed down. There were various bidders that fell out or could not raise the money, and finally the decision was made and so it came before the Commerce Committee and there they went through it and in considerable detail.

I do not think there is any conspiracy in this body, as suggested, or that we are all lacking courage. What a suggestion that in a vote of 70 to 27, 70 people here who voted that way somehow did not have the courage to stand up; we were being subverted in some fashion or locked into a position because of friendships or leaderships or people in important positions.

Clearly somehow the suggestion is that the Secretary of Transportation has a grip on us and that we do not know how to vote.

Mr. HOLLINGS. I wish she did.

Mr. CHAFEE. That is nonsense.

Now, the Morgan Stanley vote, 53 to 39, there is a vote on it. Somehow all of us did not know what we were doing. We just did not understand it. The Senator from Michigan understood it. He is speaking for America but the rest of us are all pandering to some special interest or group because we do not stand up, we are not like he, red-blooded virile Michigander who can tell us how to do things around here. That is nonsense.

Let us just suggest how we got into this position. We came back from recess after spending the last part of December talking about the quality of life in the Senate and things are going to be better as the group who is opposed to know. What did they start off doing? Something that the great filibusters in the past never even designed to do, and that is we are not even going to proceed. We are going to have a filibuster on the motion to proceed.

Is that fostering friendships and dealing with problems around here? Is that getting to the guts of an issue? If it is, it did not improve the quality of my life, I will tell you, in any fashion.

Now, we spent last week on it and this week, and the Senator from Michigan says we have not had a chance to discuss it. How long are we going to take? Cannot we reach a decision in this body or are we paralyzed? Do we have to go on and reopen everything for bidding?

Let us see. Mr. Marriott had a bid in there. We will look at it over again.

The Senator from Michigan said he wanted to sell this railroad. When does he want to sell it? In the year 2000? Are these people going to keep their bids open forever?

He said we would not know what is in it and there are untruths. Some of the charges here are so foolish that I do not understand a sensible person like the senior Senator from Michigan to say these falsehoods, untruths, and this conspiracy and defrauding and illegitimate bidding. That is nonsense and we know it.

There comes a time when we have to make up our minds, we have to fish or cut bait. We voted on this. We have had vote after vote. How many votes have we had on this matter, motions to table? How many votes today, I ask the Chair? I will ask anybody.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seven.

Mr. CHAFEE. Seven. Seven votes.

And can someone tell me what the closest was?

Mr. HOLLINGS. Fifty-four to forty-five.

Mr. CHAFEE. What is the closest vote, I ask the Chair in this matter?

Mr. HOLLINGS. Fifty-one to forty-five.

Mr. CHAFEE. Fifty-one to forty-five, and I do not know what that high watermark was?

Mr. METZENBAUM. Pretty close, antitrust.

Mr. CHAFEE. The Danforth motion to table Lautenberg; nothing to do with antitrust. That was a special favor for New York and New Jersey and that went down.

Mr. HOLLINGS. That is right.

Mr. CHAFEE. Now, you know, democracy is a pretty precious thing and the debate in this body is a pretty precious thing.

I have talked with some on the other side when they have talked about debating motions to proceed and filibustering, and the answer is the rules permit it. All they are doing is acting under the rules.

Ladies and gentlemen, if we feel that we can go to the ultimate of the rules in this body every time and that there is no comity, as it were, no feeling of getting on with the business, if we are going to debate everything, have a filibuster on the motion to proceed and then have a filibuster on the actual motion itself, and then use up our 100 hours, that is all permitted. But is that the way to do the business of the U.S. Government? I do not think so.

In the great issues, this hardly ranks as one of the great issues that has come before this body. In all fairness, what happens with Conrail is not going to determine the future of this Nation. But in the great debates in the past, those who have been involved with them and they were greater giants than we are, and I am talking about Senator Russell, and I am talking about those people who preceded us here, when the debate was over, when the cloture motion had been invoked, they went to the vote. The decision had been made, and we have to get on with the business of the people of the United States of America.

And so I think that is the important lesson. The Senator from Michigan thinks we are all wrong, the rest of us do not know what we are doing. Seventy of us—here are the votes: 56-37, 51-34, 61-32, 70-27, 69-27, 91 to 5. That was a motion to instruct the Sergeant at Arms, and I suppose we got a lot of people we normally would not get on that, even though there were five who did not quite understand this business. And 63 to 33.

What do you have to do to get on with the business of the United States? Were we going to spend this week, next week, ad infinitum, on this business? I do not think so. Let us get on. We have other tough things and the Senator from Michigan is a member of the Budget Committee and the problems with that budget make this Conrail business pale in importance. That is the big measure that we ought to be dealing with, and let us get on with it.

So, I want to say I categorically reject this business that we are all guilty of participating in some conspiracy over here or we are all guilty of falsehood or untruth or illegitimate bidding was partook here or that there was defrauding. These are all statements that the Senator who previously spoke used.

I would hope that if people have votes, they bring them up and let us vote on it and see if we cannot settle this matter once and for all and go on to other matters.

Thank you very much, Mr. President.

Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, I always find the Senator from Rhode Island entertaining if nothing else.

But I listened with great care to what he said. I say to the Chair, and I will address my colleague through the Chair, that he is free, obviously, to make whatever characterization that he likes about what I have said and that is something that he would have to decide for himself, but I want to make it clear that it would be well, I think, to use, if you are going to make characterizations, you ought to use direct quotes and not sort of round the edges off in terms of what is said or not said.

I am quite prepared to stand by everything I said a minute ago, every word of it, exactly as I said it and as I hope it was taken down accurately, and I must say I think the characterizations, not using the quotations, the characterizations just made, and I enjoyed the humor in the comments myself, are I think quite different from the spoken words that I said. It may sound the same to the Senator from Rhode Island, and that is as it is. But I would hope that in a matter of this consequence we would make sure that not just this Senator—I have only spoken twice; I have not been involved in any of the filibuster activities that have been cited in an earlier tiem, but I want all Senators to be heard including the ones on that side of the aisle, and this dicussion, I say to the Senator from Rhode Island, that I was attempting to address was initiated by the colleague on his side of the aisle, the Senator from Pennsylvania, and properly so, properly so.

You know, this shoe is going to have to fit on both feet eventually in terms of the kinds of procedures we are going to use around here. And you may find that being in the majority, especially for a party that has not been in the majority for a long, long time until recently, confers some sort of special privilege in terms of the use of the powers that go with that, but I do not think so.

I hope there would not be a misjudgment about that, because, in due course, and I hope by the time the elections are settled in this year, the majority will be back on this side. I hope that when that happens—and I think it will happen this time, and I hope that it will—but I hope that, when it does happen, we would be unfailing, unfailing in our courtesies to the Senators on the other side of the aisle in committee, in subcommittee, and on the Senate floor—all Senators, whether they happen to agree with us or not, those on our side of the aisle, those on the other side on the aisle.

I think the Senator from Pennsylvania was badly treated and improperly so. There is no excuse for it. And to put it off with a lot of asides and humor and so forth does not take the fact away. I am bothered about it, and, if it happens again, I will speak about it again.

I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, the Senate is considering legislation authorizing the sale of the Federal Government's ownership of Conrail to the Norfolk Southern Corp., as proposed by the Department of Transportation. The Conrail debate has involved shippers, State governments, and a number of railroads, including Conrail, Norfolk Southern, and the Chessie System Railroads, the largest railroads in the Eastern United States. This is a very difficult and complex issue in any event, but for me it has been especially difficult because all three of those railroads operate in my State of West Virginia. They all play major roles in the economy of my State, transporting West Virginia coal, steel, chemicals, and other commodities to markets in other parts of the country, or to destinations overseas.

West Virginia's economy, and, therefore, the jobs of thousands of West Virginians, depend heavily on efficient, economical rail transportation. Accordingly, I have been concerned about the implications for West Virginia of the proposed sale. For the past several months, I have listened carefully to all sides of the debate in an effort to determine whether the proposed sale of Conrail to Norfolk Southern would be in the best interests of West Virginia.

After weighing the information I have received regarding this issue, I have come to the conclusion that the sale of Conrail to the Norfolk Southern Corp. would not be in the best interests of West Virginia. For example, West Virginia coal is shipped by Norfolk Southern, the Chessie System railroads, the B&O and the C&O, and Conrail. A combined Conrail/Norfolk Southern railroad would have an economic incentive to ship and deliver coal from coal mines on its own system, rather than to deliver coal originated on the Chessie System. Consequently, between 3 and 5 million tons of West Virginia coal shipped on the B&O Railroad could be adversely affected. This amount of coal is not insignificant, for it represents from 7 to 12 percent of the West Virginia coal shipped out-of-State to domestic utility markets. More importantly, the potential loss of markets for this coal translates directly into the loss of more than 1,000 coal-mining jobs in West Virginia. In addition, diminished coal shipments on the B&O could result in the loss of railroad jobs, thereby further exacerbating the already difficult employment situation in West Virginia.

It is likely that other commodities of importance to West Virginia could be similarly affected.

In addition, Conrail plays an important competitive role in West Virginia. It has been aggressive in its efforts to develop and market West Virginia coal, particularly in the area of coal exports. If Conrail were sold to Norfolk Southern, economical alternative routes developed by Conrail for the shipment of West Virginia coal bound for the export market could be eliminated. This could further erode the competitiveness of West Virginia export coal in world markets, which, in turn, would have an adverse effect on coal-mining employment in West Virginia.

Mr. President, I believe that the Federal Government should not be in the freight railroad business. However, I cannot support a plan to return Conrail to the private sector that could have an adverse impact on West Virginia jobs, or diminish the prospects for economic growth in West Virginia. I must, therefore, oppose the proposed sale of Conrail to Norfolk Southern. Thus, yesterday I voted in support of the Morgan Stanley proposal to return Conrail to the private sector, through a public offering because I believe that an independent Conrail is in the best interests of West Virginia.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, the Senate is presently considering legislation authorizing the sale of Conrail to Norfolk Southern.

The merger of Conrail with Norfolk Southern, however beneficial in other respects, clearly would continue the trend toward concentration in the railroad industry which has already greatly reduced competition between railroads and transportation alternatives for thousands of shippers.

This problem has been enormously aggravated by the continuing failures of the Interstate Commerce Commission in administering the Staggers Rail Act of 1980. Congress intended that the ICC implement regulations and procedures which would permit captive shippers to challenge unreasonable rail rates. Under the standards and procedures implemented by the ICC since passage of the Staggers Act, shippers have attempted to challenge rail overcharges but without success. Furthermore, the ICC is constantly expanding the ranks of captive shippers because it refuses to preserve competitive transportation options through the use of joint rates, reciprocal switching, and other procedures.

This failure of the ICC to address captive shipper problems was the subject of the lead editorial in the New York Times on December 23, 1985. It points out that although some captive shippers have been seriously overcharged, the ICC has refused to grant rate relief. It criticizes the Commission for clinging to the "outdated rationale that the railroads need every last penny to stay in business."

Mr. President, many of us thought that Congress had effectively legislated protections for captive shippers in the Staggers Act in 1980. The record of the ICC makes clear that this is not the case. It is obvious that the exercise of monopoly power by the railroads is a problem that will not go away.

If Congress does in fact decide that Norfolk Southern should be allowed to buy Conrail, then it should also take steps to minimize the impact of that acquisition on future competition in the railroad industry and on captive shippers. It should clarify and strengthen the role of the ICC by enacting the Consumer Rail Equity Act (S. 477), which is now pending before the Senate Commerce Committee. I urge my colleagues to support legislation, which will enhance competition between railroads and give captive shippers a fair chance to challenge excessive rates at the ICC.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the New York Times editorial be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, Dec. 23, 1985]

NEXT STEPS IN RAIL DEREGULATION

When Congress relaxed price controls for freight railroads in 1980, it sought an artful balance. It wanted to give railroads incentives to rebuild their collapsing systems. But it wanted also to protect shippers from being gouged by rail monopolies. Some of these shippers now complain that the balance has tilted in favor of railroads, and they make a good case. If deregulation is to work for everyone, the reforms of 1980 need fine tuning.

Most cargo shipping is vigorously competitive. In setting prices, truckers and airlines must keep a close eye on the competition. Railroads, too, are held in check for some products in some regions. If they try to overcharge the large manufacturers of high-value products like machinery or auto parts, they risk losing the business to another railroad or an enterprising trucker.

But railroads exert great market power in carrying bulk commodities on underserved routes. So Congress put some limits on the railroads' freedom to set their own rates. Where a shipper can show that a rail company dominates a transportation market, the Interstate Commerce Commission is empowered to intervene. And if the commission finds a railroad's total revenues to be adequate and its prices unreasonable, the shipper can be granted rate relief.

By and large, this partial deregulation has worked well. Railroads are posting good profits. More important, they are investing billions to modernize their systems. And many shippers are getting better service for the same old rates. But some shippers, notably power companies buying coal from Western mines, have been seriously overcharged. And the I.C.C. has so far denied them relief. The commission, it appears, clings to the outdated rationale that the railroads need every last penny to stay in business.

A coalition of commodity shippers, electric utilities, labor unions and consumer groups urges legislation, to reduce the I.C.C.'s discretion, forcing it to come down harder on strong railroads. Things may have to come to that if the commission refuses to tighten its guidelines for rate relief. But the dreary history of price regulation makes very clear that prices set by regulators can never be entirely fair or efficient.

The long-term goal of reform should be to keep easing off regulation by making the shipping industry ever more competitive. At least three steps could be taken toward that end:

Congress should authorize construction of pipelines to carry mixtures of pulverized coal and water from mines to power plants. Such coal slurry pipelines have been blocked at state level by railroad lobbying. If Congress pre-empts authority over pipelines, the mere threat of their construction would discourage rail overcharges.

The I.C.C. or Congress, if necessary, should halt rail mergers that reduce the number of carriers serving shippers of bulk commodities.

Congress should explore ways to stimulate more competition among existing rail systems. For example, it might require rail companies to lease their tracks and terminals to competitors at reasonable rates.

The first goal of rail deregulation—a more productive, financially stable system—has been achieved. The next goal should be insuring that railroads share the benefits with consumers.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I would like to announce that I was called back to Montana yesterday afternoon for a critical meeting concerning the future of a major industrial facility in Columbia Falls, MT.

As a result, I was unable to be here to cast my vote on Senator SPECTER's amendment concerning the sale of Conrail to Morgan Stanley. Had I been present, I would have voted against the tabling motion on the amendment.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, there will be no more votes this evening. The Senate will not be in session tomorrow.

S. 638 LAID ASIDE UNTIL TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 4, 1986

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that S. 638 be laid aside until Tuesday, at 11 a.m.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, on Monday we will be in session. We will start debate on TV in the Senate, Senate Resolution 29. We will be back on Conrail on Tuesday, and I feel certain that we will conclude action on the Conrail bill hopefully early afternoon on Tuesday. There is no agreement. But I have checked with the principals. It seems to me that there are some important questions that should be raised. They will be raised.

I am confident we do not need an agreement. We have in effect the word of a number of the Senators that we will conclude action on Tuesday. If we finish early on Tuesday, we will be back on TV in the Senate. Then we will stay on that the balance of the week.

It would be my hope that we could dispose of that measure next week.

I would again indicate to a number of my colleagues—some 22 or 24—who would hope to be able to go to Houston tomorrow that we will not be in session. They will be able to go.

There will be no more votes this evening.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. DOLE. I ask unanimous consent that there now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business not to extend beyond the hour of 7:15.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

MAKING CERTAIN TECHNICAL CORRECTIONS TO AMENDMENTS TO THE FOOD SECURITY ACT OF 1985—S. 2036

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I send a bill to the desk on behalf of myself and the distinguished Senators ABDNOR, ANDREWS, BUMPERS, BENTSEN, NICKLES, COCHRAN, PRYOR, BOREN, ZORINSKY, MELCHER, HELMS, and BAUCUS, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be stated by title.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 2036) to make certain technical corrections to amendments made by the Food Security Act of 1985, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senate will proceed to consider the bill.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, if I could briefly explain, I know both Senators ANDREWS and ABDNOR want to comment on another matter.

Action on this issue is vital in enabling the Department of Agriculture to implement the 1986 commodity programs announced yesterday afternoon.

During the conference on the farm bill, conferees for the House and the Senate agreed to make limited cross-compliance a discretionary authority with the Secretary of Agriculture for all appropriate program crops—wheat, feed grains, cotton, and rice. If the Secretary decides to exercise this authority, he can prohibit a producer participating in any of these programs from exceeding his or her base acreage for any other crop for which an aceage reduction requirement is in effect. The purpose of this provision, as agreed to in conference, would be to prevent farmers from receiving benefits under one program while expanding their base for another crop deemed in surplus.

In drafting this provision into law after the conference, the discretionary language was maintained for cotton and rice but was accidentially deleted for wheat and feed grains. As a result, the Secretary now has no choice but to require wheat and feed grain producers who want to participate in their programs to confine their production of other crops with acreage reduction programs to their established bases.

If left unchanged, this requirement for limited cross-compliance will cause great hardship and inequity in rural America. First, some producers of fall-sown wheat and barley, who had no reason to expect such a restriction, have already planted beyond their bases for 1986 crops. In order to be in the program for wheat, these farmers will have to tear up considerable barley acreage.

This program will be compounded in Southern States where, in an effort to be fair, USDA has indicated its intention to require cross-compliance for cotton and rice if this amendment is not passed. Under such conditions, farmers who intend to join the cotton program in 1986 will be forced to confine wheat acreage to their program base.

I understand that the administration indicated in yesterday's program announcement that it will not require cross-compliance on any 1986 crop if this amendment is passed. However, in the event Congress is unable to pass a "clean" bill in a timely fashion, USDA will be forced to go ahead and try to make the existing legislation workable.

On behalf of the distinguished Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ZORINSKY], I have added a technical amendment to this bill to correct the procedures for establishing ASCS community committees. I understand this change is acceptable to all concerned, and we should therefore be able to accommodate it.

Several of my colleagues may have an interest in making other changes in the farm bill. But I ask all my colleagues to defer further amendments until a comprehensive corrections bill can be drafted. We need to get this change in cross-compliance in place immediately. Adding amendments will only invite efforts to broaden the legislation, reducing chances of its passage in both Houses and enactment into law. The cross-compliance issue is unique in that it affects all of the major commodities with acreage reduction requirements, and it is essential if USDA is to avoid serious complications in administering the 1986 programs.

I ask my colleagues to accept this important measure as it stands, and allow the 1986 farm programs to be implemented in a fair fashion, as conferees during the farm bill conference originally intended.

Mr. President, I have discussed this amendment with the Presiding Officer [Mr. COCHRAN]. We discovered in the drafting of the farm bill that the report language said one thing, the bill itself said another. It refers to what we call cross compliance. It is a very important matter to producers of many commodities. That is why there are so many Senators on both sides of the aisle cosponsoring the legislation. It is a flatout error.

In addition, the distinguished Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ZORINSKY], the ranking Democrat on the Agriculture Committee, discovered another drafting error with respect to certain ASCS offices. That correction has been made.

Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, I am pleased to join with my distinguished colleagues the Senate majority leader [Mr. DOLE] and the ranking member of the Agriculture Committee [Mr. ZORINSKY] in introducing this bill and asking for its immediate passage. I am very pleased with the expedited consideration that this bill is being given. Its passage is critically important to Texas farmers.

Mr. President, yesterday Secretary of Agriculture Block announced some parts of the 1986 commodity programs. I am very disappointed that the Secretary announced that he would require cross compliance for all commodities for the 1986 crop. That decision was his. Due to a drafting error in the 1985 farm bill cross compliance is required for some commodities. It is not required by law for all commodities.

Extending it to all commodities at this late date is a devastating blow to farmers in south Texas. Land preparation has been completed and planting is either underway or only days away. Cross compliance in many cases will make an enormous difference in what a farmer can plant.

In addition, due to the errors and confusion involving acreage bases, especially for feed grains, farmers do not know and probably cannot find out before planting what their feed grain acreage base is. Thus they do not know how to meet the cross-compliance requirements, but they are threatened with loss of all farm program benefits for all crops if they fail to meet these requirements.

The Secretary also announced that he would accept a technical corrections bill dealing with cross compliance, and that cross compliance would not be required for 1986 if it was discretionary for all crops. This bill does exactly that. It corrects an error in the farm bill and makes cross compliance discretionary for all crops.

The 1985 farm bill made cross compliance discretionary for cotton and rice but mandatory for wheat and feed grains. This was, I believe, an unintentional error. The statement of managers in the conference report indicates that cross compliance was to be distretionary for all commodities, but the bill language was not written that way. That needs to be corrected. There are things that the Secretary could do administratively to help this situation. He has not chosen to do that, and he has called on Congress to correct this mistake.

I will help in that effort. Cross compliance cannot be implemented for 1986. Too many farmers have gone to far on planting preparations to change now. They have plowed their land, bedded that land, fertilized, put down herbicides, purchased their seed. Major changes in the farm program at this late date will cost farmers in early-planting States such as Texas heavily. Farmers farther North will be inconvenienced, but not hurt nearly as bad. That is not equitable at all.

I will help, but I must point out that Texas farmers are once again being used as political pawns in farm bill maneuvers. They do not like that and neither do I. The Secretary did not have to announce cross compliance for cotton, but he did. That will be tremendously damaging to South Texas if it is not changed immediately.

Most south Texas farmers grow cotton and milo. Many were planning on participating in the cotton program and not participating in the milo program, since the feed grain bases are incredibly messed up and they have to plant right now. Cross compliance for cotton limits their milo planting to no more than their base acres.

But they do not know what their milo base will be. The local ASCS office cannot tell them. And yet they must plant in the next few days. Cross compliance means they may be denied price supports for cotton because of the same foulups that may deny them price supports for milo.

What little information that has been put out on bases has been riddled with errors that add to the confusion. I must point out to their credit that the USDA has been helpful in correcting these errors when I have brought them to their attention. They tried to correct their error in announcing separate bases for milo and corn. I was told that there would be one common feed grain base, as we have had in the past. But then the official announcement corrected this error only for farmers who have been participating in the program. That means that some farmers would be denied farm program benefits this year because of decisions they made up to 5 years ago. That is totally unfair.

I was told yesterday evening by the head of the Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Service that his intention was to treat everyone the same, and that he would look into this and correct any errors. I very much appreciate his cooperation. It is most helpful, and it is the second time that ASCS has corrected flaws in the feed grain bases after I have pointed them out.

But the fact is that the problems with feed grain bases cannot be corrected in time for many Texas farmers. If they have not planted they have at least made financial commitments of well over half their total production cost. At this point it will cost them just as much to leave the land idle and keep if free of weeds as it will to put in a milo crop. It is too late to make major changes in planting without suffering large losses.

In addition, ASCS probably cannot get the corrected information on feedgrain bases to the county offices before much of south Texas has planted.

By announcing cross compliance for cotton the Secretary has raised the ante. He has told Texas farmers that not complying with regulations that were not even written at planting time may make them ineligible for any price supports on any commodity. That is a death threat in many cases.

The Secretary has indicated that he will accept this bill, and I urge my colleagues to pass it quickly.

At the same time, I urge the Secretary of Agriculture to meet us part way. At least announce that there will be no cross compliance for cotton and rice. If that is what he really wants, then announce it in time for all farmers. Do not freeze south Texas farmers out of the farm program just as a political maneuver. It is too late to hold them hostage without adding to the damage that has already done by the late announcement of these farm programs. Corn Belt farmers will be OK if he removes cross compliance within a month or two. But in just a week or two south Texas will have already planted. It will be too late to go back. Mother nature does not wait on these things.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of my letter to Secretary Block be prinnted in the RECORD following my remarks.

These being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JANUARY 30, 1986.

Hon. JOHN BLOCK,
Secretarty, U.S. Department of Agriculture, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I urge you to reconsider your announcement that you would require cross-compliance for all farm program commodities for 1986. Cross-compliance cannot be required for 1986 without causing great hardships and inequities.

Because of the planting dates in South Texas farmers there cannot wait weeks or even days for passage of the technical corrections bill that you requested as a condition of not requiring cross-compliance. They must plant now, and any announcement you make later on removing cross-compliance will benefit Corn Belt farmers, not South Texas farmers.

In addition, there are major problems with your proposed methods of calculating feed grain acreage bases. Because of these errors and the resulting confusion, it will probably be impossible to tell many South Texas farmers what their feed grain base will be before they actually plant. Many farmers were planning to deal with this by participating in the cotton program but not participating in the feed grain program.

Your announcement of cross-compliance for cotton, which is not required by law, denies them that option. It tells these farmers that they cannot get any farm program benefits if they plant more than their base acreage of feed grains. Under current conditions that is an economic death threat for many farmers. At the same time they do not know what their feed grain base in and very likely will not know before they must plant. This is totally unfair.

I will cooperate in every way in expediting passage of a technical corrections bill to make cross-compliance discretionary for wheat and feed grains. In fact, I am introducing such legislation today. I urge you to meet us half-way by removing the cross-compliance requirement for cotton and rice. An immediate announcement of such action is the only way to avoid severe hardships for South Texas farmers.

Sincerely,

LLOYD BENTSEN.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, as I said, this bill contains, in effect technical corrections to correct drafting errors. I know other Members are concerned about yields and bases. I am pleased to yield to my distinguished colleague from North Dakota.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. President, I appreciate the majority leader's yielding. This type of correction is extremely important because it goes back to what we have had for so long, the opportunity to put in your wheat yield but not your corn yield. This lack of cross-compliance or the nonnecessity of cross-compliance fits very well in the rotation and growing patterns that have been established for so long.

Mr. President, as the majority leader knows, because we have been working with him, this is not the only technical correction we have to make. When you put together a farm bill that is as many pages long as this one is, there are a lot of different interpretations. Cross-compliance is one. Yields, proven yields, is another.

In this bill, there was a change made and we froze the yields to the 1981–85 5-year period. It was done, as we discussed in the committee, in order to make sure that the budget impact in those out years was understandable.

The budget impact could be based on a finite 5-year period. It would not keep going up as the proven yields went up or whatever with the vagaries of the weather. Farmers accepted that. They understood that it would be based on their 1981 through 1985 yields, dropping the high and the low years.

But a strange thing happened, Mr. President, on the way to the county and State ASCS offices. A few of those superlawyers down in the bowels of the Department of Agriculture decided that they could uninterpret and reinterpret language. So instead of just freezing to a 5-year base period, they not only froze to the 5-year base period which we all understood, but they changed the rules for figuring the yields in that 5-year period. They read farm program payment yields not to be the yield for the farm in 1981, 1982, 1983, 1984, and 1985 on which your payment was figured, but to be the composite yield that was given in each one of those years. And instead of continuing as we have in the past with an understandable program which we thought this language spelled out, they have come up with a new one that, by duplicity and refiguring and a number of other things, changed the rules totally out in the field.

So now, Mr. President, when the farmer comes into the county ASCS office and says, "My farm produced 40 bushels of wheat in 1983 and I can prove it by receipts," somebody behind the desk is forced, because of this lawyer's ruling, to say, "No way, we say it is 27 and that is what you are stuck with."

I appreciate the support of the majority leader in rectifying this. I think the present occupant of the chair is agreeable to this, that tying down the 5-year period is indeed what was meant but not to rejigger and refigure this thing around so a farmer who knows his yield best and can prove that yield is disallowed from proving that yield.

I appreciate the offer of support from the majority leader. We hope we can rectify this as another technical correction within a few days.

Mr. DOLE. I thank the distinguished Senator from North Dakota. He has discussed this with me and I have discussed it with the Secretary of Agriculture. They have a little different view but I think there are a number of Senators on both sides of the aisle who will be heard on this in the next few days.

I think at this point, we should take care of as much as we can. We know this is a technical error.

I yield to the Senator from South Dakota. Mr. President, the Senator from South Dakota was the first one to call this to my attention. I have discussed with him how it applies to particular farmers in the State of South Dakota. It has a rather drastic impact. From the figures I just saw, one farmer could lose as much as $23,000.

Mr. ABDNOR. Mr. President, let me say that is not a particularly large farmer. That is the kind of impact this could have if allowed to stand. I commend the Senator from Kansas, the majority leader, for the technical amendment that he has just offered. That, too, is very necessary.

As the Senator from North Dakota stated—and I associate myself with his entire statement—interpretations I guess can be placed particularly once it leaves the floor of the House and the Senate and gets down into the agency that is administering the program. Sometimes they like to put an entirely different interpretation to a matter, and that is obviously what happened here. It caught me completely by surprise. My understanding was such that I had enough confidence in this bill—and I supported it—I was under the impression that we were interpreting this the same as in the past. Had I any idea this was intended on the part of the legal staff or whoever interpreted that down at the Department of Agriculture, I can assure the majority leader he would have heard strong remarks on my part. And if we had not cleared it up, I could have never supported this measure. So if ever there was a need for a technical amendment in addition to the majority leader's, to straighten this out, it is on this matter of establishing yields. Hopefully in the next few days we can clear this matter up. I thank the Senator very much for the opportunity to set the record straight.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, let me indicate again I have discussed this with the Secretary. I have also discussed it with the Senator from Minnesota, who is now on the floor. It was a 13-pound piece of legislation. We had the staff working night and day trying to put it all together. I think they did a remarkable job, and I have certainly no criticism of the staff on either side. But we need to correct some of the things that have been misinterpreted, or at least clarified, and I think the fact we have made a little history on the floor will be helpful to the USDA officials who somehow interpret what we may have had a different view on.

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, I would like to ask the leader, this is an amendment, I heard on the squawk box, that he is presenting which deals with cross-compliance; is that correct?

Mr. DOLE. That is correct. I also indicated that we had one view expressed in the report which made it discretionary, as it is for rice and cotton, and as it was to have been for wheat and feed grains, but in the statute it was inadvertently drafted and it made it mandatory. This simply comports with the committee report. And also the other half of the technical amendment is one that the distinguished Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ZORINSKY] raised with reference to establishing ASCS community committees. Again, this is another drafting error. I know there are other policy errors that we have not discussed.

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. There are some other drafting errors as well, and we had been flirting with the idea of brining them to the attention of the Senate but, on the other hand, we did not want to open up the entire farm bill. The one that the Senators from South Dakota have brought to my attention is certainly a significant one. As the majority leader knows, I was quite active in seeking not only to freeze yields but also to freeze bases. It was my understanding of the matter that we would freeze, but we would not retroactively penalize. It seems that the farm bill has done that to the disadvantage particularly of our regions where the yields have been bountiful in the last couple years. So that it is my understanding then that yet another technical correction bill will be considered with respect to that in 1986?

Mr. DOLE. That is correct, and I will be very pleased to include the Senator from Minnesota as a cosponsor on this correction.

I may already have done that.

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. No; the Senator from Minnesota was not on the list that the majority leader read, which I heard on the squawk box; but as he got halfway down the list, I realized that this was an agricultural matter. I am pleased to join the majority leader.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the name of the Senator from Minnesota be added as a cosponsor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. And we will revisit this.

Mr. DOLE. That is correct.

Mr. President, I wish to indicate that this matter was cleared with the distinguished chairman of the committee, Senator HELMS, because it was technical in nature.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, the legislation being considered will correct two strictly technical flaws in Public Law 99-198, the Food Security Act of 1985.

The legislation provides that there may be more than one ASCS community committee in each administrative area established in the Food Security Act of 1985 and thereby corrects this section of the act to reflect what the conference committee adopted. ASCS community committees are involved in the election of ASCS county committees which help USDA administer Federal farm subsidy programs.

The other technical error involves what is known as cross-compliance. The term cross-compliance is typically used to describe the requirement that producers who participate in one Federal farm subsidy program, such as the cotton program, would not be allowed to plant other program crops, such as wheat, feed grains, or rice, in excess of the farm acreage base for those crops.

The conferees wanted to include Secretarial authority to impose this form of cross-compliance because of our concern about the ever expanding farm subsidy acreage base. The conferees were concerned about the practice of "base building" and the existence of "phantom acres" in the Federal farm subsidy programs. Two Government Accounting Office reports confirm that there has been significant abuse in this regard.

The recent growth of farm acreage bases when production reduction programs are in effect contribute to "slippage" in the programs which costs taxpayers billions of dollars and works at cross purposes with the farm programs themselves.

Clearly Congress intended that steps be taken to eliminate the abuses involving base building and phantom acres. These abuses are legal because of loopholes. A minority of farmers use these loopholes. They work to the disadvantage of the majority of farmers, however, because they make the acreage limitation programs ineffective. This is contrary to the intent of the Congress, which has very clearly determined that it wants effective programs. The abuses create overproduction which drives prices lower, to the disadvantage of all farmers. And, of course, the taxpayers pay the costs of these abuses to the tune of billions of dollars.

The conferees agreed that the Secretary of Agriculture should have the discretion to require cross-compliance as a condition for eligibility for loans, purchases, or payments. Secretarial discretion was thought more desirable because it will allow for greater flexibility in working out details, and, very frankly, because Congress wanted the administration to "take the heat" that might come from those who would have their abusive practices curtailed.

However, in the grueling process of drafting this massive piece of legislation before Christmas adjournment, the wheat and feed grain cross-compliance provision was drafted in terms that are mandatory instead of discretionary.

On Wednesday, January 29, 1986, Secretary Block announced that he intends to require cross-compliance for wheat, feed grain, cotton, and rice. However, the Secretary also announced that the administration would accept a technical amendment to the Food Security Act of 1985 making cross-compliance discretionary for all crops. If this legislation is approved, the Secretary has said that he would not require cross-compliance for any crops in 1986.

The committee staff and others are continuing to review the bill for additional errors. However, farmers urgently need to know the details of the 1986 farm programs and, therefore, I have agreed to attempt to correct this error as quickly as possible.

I am aware of the fact that several Senators would like to address other issues they consider to be technical in nature. I am also aware of the fact that some Senators would like to make substantive changes in the farm bill, many of which would cost millions, and even billions of dollars.

If we are to deal effectively with the cross-compliance error, it is necessary that Senators withhold asking for consideration of other nontechnical and policy issues so that farmers will be given the opportunity to plan their operations in a timely fashion without confusion and delay.

Mr. ZORINSKY. Mr. President, I am pleased to join the distinguished majority leader in supporting legislation that would make cross-compliance under the wheat, feed grain, upland cotton, and rice programs discretionary with the Secretary of Agriculture.

This was the agreement reached by the committee of conference on the Food Security Act of 1985—the 1985 farm bill. The statement of managers relating to wheat provides, and I quote: "The Conference substitute provides the Secretary with authority to require compliance on a farm with the terms and conditions of any other commodity program as a condition of eligibility for loans, purchases, or payments under the wheat program if an acreage limitation program or set-aside is established, but only to the extent that producers who participate in any acreage limitation program or set-aside may not expand acreage of another crop for which there is an acreage limitation or set-aside in effect."

Similar language is contained in the portions of the statement of managers relating to feed grains, upland cotton, and rice.

The language of the 1985 act itself relating to upland cotton and rice reflects the conferees' agreement. However, the language of the act relating to wheat and feed grains does not reflect the agreement reached by the conferees. The legislation before the Senate would correct that error.

Yesterday, the Secretary of Agriculture, in announcing additional provisions of the 1986 wheat and feed grain programs, stated that it is the Department's intention to require cross compliance for the 1986 crops of wheat, feed grains, cotton, and rice. However, the Department's press release stated that the administration would accept an amendment to the 1985 act making cross compliance discretionary. According to the Department's press release, if cross compliance is made discretionary for all 1986 crops, it will not be required for that crop year.

In my judgment, such a determination by the Secretary would be eminently correct. The farm bill was not approved by the President until December 23, 1985. Many farmers had planted commodities prior to the enactment of the bill. It is only fair that producers know the rules of the programs prior to their making production decisions. Due to the delay in the enactment of the 1985 farm bill, this was not possible in the case of the 1986 crops.

With the enactment of the legislation before us, the 1985 bill will be corrected to conform with the agreement of the conferees, and the Secretary of Agriculture will be abie to make a determination that is fair and equitable.

In addition to the cross compliance provision, the legislation makes an important correction in the section of the 1985 farm bill relating to Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Committees. The agreement of the committee of conference was to adopt a provision of the House bill that would permit more than one community committee per area in counties that, on the date of the enactment of the 1985 bill, have more than three community committees. Through error, the bill as enacted did not reflect the agreement.

Local ASC Committees play an important role in the administration of farm programs, and the bill before the Senate would make the necessary correction. I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting the legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to amendment. If there be no amendment, the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed, as follows:

(2) by striking out the fourth and fifth sentences and inserting in lieu thereof the following new sentences: "Each local administrative area shall have one local committee consisting of at least three members elected to 3-year terms in a local election to be held every third year, except that there may be more than one local committee per administrative area in counties that, as of the date of enactment of the Food Security Act of 1985, have more than three local committees. Only one local administrative area shall hold an election in any given year in each county. Only farmers within a local administrative area who are producers who participate or cooperate in programs administered within their area shall be eligible for nomination and election to the local committee for that area. STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. WEICKER (for himself and Mr. DODD):

S. 2027. A bill to amend title 28, United States Code, to provide for the appointment of one additional district judge for the district of Connecticut; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ADDITIONAL DISTRICT JUDGE FOR THE DISTRICT OF CONNECTICUT

● Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce legislation to create an additional Federal district judgeship for the district of Connecticut. Accepting this much-needed position would bring the total number of district judges in Connecticut to seven; a number supported by the Administrative Office of the United States Courts' Subcommittee on Judicial Statistics in its 1984 biennial survey of judgeship needs. I am joined in this legislative endeavor by my colleague from Connecticut, Senator DODD, and by the entire Connecticut congressional delegation, which has cosponsored similiar legislation introduced today by Representative STEWART MCKINNEY.

I recently had the opportunity to address many of our State's judicial and legal community in Bridgeport, CT. At that time I commented on the great pride the citizens of Connecticut take in the integrity and experience of the State's Federal judges. The men and women fulfilling the awesome responsibilities of the bench in Connecticut apply not only their substantial legal scholarship to the task, but also long hours of hard work; hours that increase each year.

Despite this dedication, Connecticut is faced with a dilemma as illustrated by the 1985 U.S. district court judicial workload profile compiled by the Administrative Office of the United States Courts. The district of Connecticut's overall workload has increased by 40 percent since 1980. In formulating its recommendations for new judgeships, the Subcommittee on Judicial Statistics considered the level of new case filings, the case mix, the level of weighted filings, pending cases, and the length of trials. The subcommittee employed 400 weighted filings per judgeship as the level at which a court deserved consideration for additional judgeships.

Weighted filings are those deemed to involve unusual complexity, requiring substantial court time. In Connecticut, weighted filings per judge were 512 in 1985; 633 in 1984; 569 in 1983; and 560 in 1982. So the district of Connecticut has well exceeded the level of 400 for all of the past several years. Trials have risen correspondingly as have the number of triable defendants in pending criminal felony cases. Therefore, at all levels considered by the subcommittee, the conclusion reached was that the district of Connecticut fully deserves an additional judgeship.

I urge the Committee on the Judiciary to expeditiously consider this legislation. I am confident the committee and later the full Senate, will grant Connecticut's district judges and our fine courts the additional judgeship they need to sustain the outstanding record of administering justice that we have come to expect.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of this legislation be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2027

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) there shall be appointed, pursuant to section 133 of Title 28, United States Code, an additional district judge for the District of Connecticut.

(b) To reflect the change made by this section in the table of judges for each of the judicial districts, section 133 of title 28, United States Code, is amended by striking the following:

"Connecticut ..... 6"

and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"Connecticut ..... 7".●

By Mr. STEVENS:

S. 2028. A bill for the relief of Victoria Bacarisas; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

RELIEF OF VICTORIA BACARISAS

● Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce private legislation on behalf of a young girl, Victoria Bacarisas. Victoria's case struck a chord with me. She has been in the country since the age of 14. She is now 20, and lives with her sister and brother-in-law. Up to this point, she is not that different from many Filipinos who have found their way into this country. However, there is a special humanitarian need in her case.

She contacted me late last year, and asked for help in staying in this country. Although unmarried, she was pregnant, and would in all likelihood be just a few weeks short of delivery at the time of her deportation hearing. Discussions with immigration officals disclosed that she could get a continuance until after she had her child, and she would be given time to recover. I felt that this would be sufficient to take care of her immediate problems.

I have discovered now that Vicotoria gave birth prematurely, and that her young son was in intensive care. He will have to stay there for most of the next 2 months, and could need careful medical supervision in the future. Considering the needs of her newborn child, I feel compelled to do what I can to assist these two. The care he needs is clearly more readily available here than in the Philippines. However, his chances of receiving the care he will need during the early years of his life would be severely threatened by deportation of this mother.

Victoria has been here long enough to become well established in the United States. Considering the equities of her case, I feel justified in asking that she be granted permanent resident status.●

By Mr. CHILES:

S. 2029. A bill to establish the Big Cypress National Preserve Addition in the State of Florida, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

BIG CYPRUS NATIONAL PRESERVE ADDITION ACT

● Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, today I am pleased to introduce legislation to authorize the expansion of the Big Cypress National Preserve in south Florida. This bill calls for putting into public ownership some 128,000 acres bordering the northeast boundary of the existing preserve. The Acquisition Program contemplated would be in conjunction with the planned construction of Interstate 75, providing a unique opportunity to utilize Federal dollars allocated for the construction of an interstate highway to accomplish equally important goals of environmental restoration and endangered species protection. It is in the public interest to have these particular lands in Federal ownership, and it is practicable and incumbent on us to move on this land acquisition program as soon as possible.

WHY THESE LANDS SHOULD BE ACQUIRED

First, let me point out specifically how acquiring these particular lands will complement and, in fact, enhance ongoing activities aimed at protecting Everglades National Park and preserving the endangered Florida panther. As an original sponsor of the Federal legislation establishing the Big Cyprus National Preserve, I am keenly aware of the critical role water quality and quantity plays in ensuring the livelihood of Everglades National Park.

The unique international treasure of Everglades National Park covers some 1,337,000 acres of land and water containing a diverse representation of vegetation and wildlife. The sawgrass wilderness areas, cypress swamps, mangrove forest, and shallow estuarine bays that compose the park area support a wide variety of fish, bird, and other wildlife populations, including many endangered species. Though large in acreage, this ecosystem is fragile and totally dependent on the complex hydrology of the entire region. Located at the end of a watershed, the park's livelihood is dependent on the quality and quantity of water that flows into it. Studies have indicated how impeded water flow has adversely affected species and their habitats.

It was the strong concern for protecting the watershed area so critical to Everglades National Park that prompted consideration of purchasing lands which now encompass the Big Cypress National Preserve. The 574,000 acre preserve was established by Congress in 1974 to make sure this important watershed area was not further developed or disrupted. Additionally, the purchase of this area has provided significant recreational opportunities which will become increasingly important as south Florida continues to experience growth and development. To date nearly $180 million in Federal funds has been appropriated to purchase these important lands. This past year $2 million was appropriated to help complete the Acquisition Program.

In addition to establishing the Big Cypress National Preserve, Congress has acted on another front to address the hydrological problems affecting the Everglades National Park. In the spring of 1983 the National Park Service staff recommended a broad based program to restore the natural water flows that the park once received, but no longer experiences. The hydrologic imbalances over recent decades have resulted in severe damage to the fish and wildlife populations of the park. In the fall of 1983 Congress approved legislation as part of a funding bill for the Army Corps of Engineers to allow for a 2-year experiment to determine adequate water delivery schedules for the park. I am pleased that this past December, at my request, the Senate Appropriations Committee approved extension of this experiment. This extended timetable will hopefully allow for the determination of a water delivery schedule to accomplish the restoration of the hydrology and reestablishment of the historic flow water through Northeast Shark River Slough and Taylor Slough into the park.

Alligator Alley, the cross-State highway going from Andytown in Broward County to Naples, has disrupted the natural water flow in the Big Cypress Preserve area and has posed a major threat to Florida panthers and other wildlife of the region. The road functions as a dam in some areas, causing unnatural pooling of water while at the same time interrupting the important sheet flow so essential to Everglades National Park. The construction of I-75 along Alligator Alley provides an important opportunity to correct these hydrological problems and, in fact, plans are underway to ensure that this is done. Public ownership of the lands bordering the I-75 corridor will expand the watershed protection offered to Everglades National Park, prevent future development of these lands, and increase recreational opportunities for the general public.

In addition, it is important to point out how public ownership of these identified lands will foster efforts currently underway to protect the habitat of the Florida panther and other endangered species. There are currently estimated to be 20 to 30 Florida panthers in existence, making it among the most endangered species on Earth. All known Florida panthers in existence live in Everglades National Park, the Big Cypress National Preserve, and Fakahatchee Strand. The U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service has proposed the establishment of a 32,000-acre national wildlife refugee in the Fakahatchee Strand area for the primary purpose of protecting the critical habitat of the panther, the State animal of Florida. As a member of the Senate Appropriations Committee, I have worked over the past few years to secure funding for this important land acquisition project. Congress provided $4 million in fiscal year 1985 and, just recently, approved $3 million in the fiscal year 1986 bill. The 128,000 acre area proposed for purchase under this bill contains land critical to the continuing survival of the endangered Florida panther. Panther fatalities have occurred as a result of automobile traffic on Alligator Alley. Provisions for wildlife crossings in the design for I-75 to allow panthers and other species to cross under the interstate show the commitment of the State in the continued protection of endangered species. The State of Florida Department of Transportation supports the construction of 23 new wildlife crossings and 13 bridge extensions, estimated to cost $12.9 million. The State has agreed to finance that portion of the total cost which is determined to be nonparticipating by the Federal Highway Administration, approximately $10 million. Public acquisition and management of these lands by the National Park Service as envisioned in this bill will complement the efforts of the Fish and Wildlife Service National Wildlife Refuge and will ensure that everything possible is done to guarantee the protection of panther and other endangered species habitat.

WHY THESE LANDS SHOULD BE ACQUIRED NOW

The conversion of Alligator Alley to I-75 will sever existing access to private property north and south of the highway, requiring the payment of damages to the property owners by the Department of Transportation. Estimates are that severance damage funds, which must in any event be expended, will equal 47 percent of the value of the affected lands. The proposed legislation contemplates using the severance damage moneys to pay a portion of the cost of acquiring approximately 128,000 acres of privately owned land located immediately north of the existing Big Cypress National Preserve. The balance of the purchase price would be paid by the Department of the Interior and the State of Florida in the same cost-sharing arrangement—80/20—found in the original Big Cypress legislation. Significantly reduced Federal expenditures are possible if land exchanges with affected property owners can be accomplished by the Department of the Interior.

If we act quickly to enact this legislation enabling the utilization of the DOT severance damage funds, we will make it possible for the public to acquire environmentally significant lands for substantially less cost than would otherwise be possible. It may be as early as this fall when Florida DOT will be able to begin to make offers of severance damages to landowners along I-75. The other matching funds as well as the necessary legislative authority need to be available to complete full acquisition of the lands. For this reason, it is critical we secure approval of legislation to enable the State Department of Transportation to work with DOI and the State of Florida to accomplish the acquisition of these lands in conjunction with purchasing rights-of-way and paying severance damages associated with the construction of I-75.

The opportunity afforded by the construction of I-75 is too remarkable not to purchase these environmentally significant lands and expand the boundaries of Big Cypress National Preserve. The challenge to protect the important values of Everglades National Park and the critical habitat of the Florida panther is too great for Congress not to move forward and implement this plan.

In closing, I want to point out the extent to which the State of Florida has demonstrated its commitment to a partnership with the Federal Government to achieve the goals I have outlined. As I mentioned previously, the State is willing to go above and beyond its necessary role in financing the construction of I-75 to enhance environmental restoration and endangered species protection. The 1985 Florida Legislature enacted legislation designating the 128,000 acre area as an "area of critical State concern." This designation gives the State eminent domain power over this land and thus will facilitate the joint Federal-State Acquisition program for this property. This designation will also help protect the area against development until acquisition is complete. Additionally, the State has just recently committed some $22 million in State funds for land acquisition in the Everglades area. The recent actions by the State of Florida coupled with the accelerated schedule for the construction of this portion of I-75 point to the need for expedient and positive action by Congress to approve this Land acquisition Program. I hope my colleagues will join me in this effort to protect and preserve the national treasures associated with Everglades National Park and Big Cypress National Preserve.

I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the bill be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2029

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

(a) SHORT TITLE.—This Act may be cited as the "Big Cypress National Preserve Addition Act".

(b) AMENDMENT OF BIG CYPRESS NATIONAL PRESERVE ACT.—Whenever in this Act an amendment is expressed in terms of an amendment to the Act of October 11, 1974, such amendment shall be considered to be made to the Act entitled "An Act to establish the Big Cypress National Preserve in the State of Florida, and for other purposes", approved October 11, 1974 (Public Law 93-440; 88 Stat. 1257).

SEC. 2. FINDINGS AND PURPOSE.

(a) FINDINGS—The Congress finds that—

(1) the planned construction of Interstate 75 is presently being designed in such a way as to improve the natural water flow to the Everglades National Park, which has been disrupted by State Road 84 (commonly known as "Alligator Alley");

(2) the planned construction of Interstate 75 provides an opportunity to enhance protection of the Everglades National Park, to promote protection of the endangered Florida panther, and to provide for public recreational use and enjoyment of public lands by expanding the Big Cypress National Preserve to include those lands adjacent to Interstate 75 in Collier County north and east of the Big Cypress National Preserve, west of the Broward County line, and south of the Hendry County line;

(3) the Federal acquisition of lands bordering the Big Cypress National Preserve in conjunction with the construction of Interstate 75 would provide significant public benefits by limiting development pressure on lands which are important both in terms of fish and wildlife habitat supporting endangered species and of wetlands which are the headwaters of the Big Cypress National Preserve; and

(4) public ownership of lands adjacent to the Big Cypress National Preserve would enhance the protection of the Everglades National Park while providing recreational opportunities and other public uses currently offered by the Big Cypress National Preserve.

(b) PURPOSE.—It is the purpose of this Act to establish the Big Cypress National Preserve Addition.

SEC. 3. ESTABLISHMENT OF ADDITION.

The Act of October 11, 1974, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"SEC. 9. (a) In order to—

"(1) achieve the purposes of the first section of this Act;

"(2) complete the preserve in conjunction with the planned construction of Interstate Highway 75; and

"(3) insure appropriately managed use and access to the Big Cypress Watershed in the State of Florida, the Big Cypress National Preserve Addition is established.

"(b) The Big Cypress National Preserve Addition (referred to in this Act as the 'Addition') shall comprise approximately 128,000 acres as generally depicted on the map entitled 'Big Cypress National Preserve Addition', dated January, 1986 which shall be on file and available for public inspection in the Office of the National Park Service, Department of the Interior, Washington, D.C., and shall be filed with appropriate offices of Collier County in the State of Florida. The Secretary shall, as soon as practicable, publish a detailed description of the boundaries of the Addition in the Federal Register.

"(c) The area within the boundaries depicted on the map referred to in subsection (h) shall be known as the Big Cypress National Preserve Addition.".

SEC. 4. ADMINISTRATION OF ADDITION.

(a) UNIT OF THE NATIONAL PARK SYSTEM.—The Act of October 11, 1974, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"SEC. 10. (a) The Secretary shall administer the Addition in accordance with this Act and the provisions of law generally applicable to units of the national park system, including the act entitled 'An Act to establish a National Park System, and for other services', approved August 25, 1916 (39 Stat. 535; 16 U.S.C. 1-4).

"(b) In administering the Addition, the Secretary shall develop and publish in the Federal Register such rules and regulations as the Secretary deems necessary and appropriate to manage and control the use of Federal lands and waters with respect to—

"(1) motorized vehicles;

"(2) exploration for and extraction of oil, gas, and other minerals;

"(3) grazing and agriculture;

"(4) draining or contructing of works or structures which alter the natural water courses;

"(5) recreational uses, including hunting, fishing, and trapping, which shall be promoted and encouraged;

"(6) new construction of any kind; and

"(7) such other uses as the Secretary determines must be limited or controlled in order to carry out the purposes of this Act.

"(c) For purposes of administering the Addition and notwithstanding section 2(c), it is the express intent of the Congress that the Secretary should substantially complete the land acquisition program contemplated with respect to the Addition in not more than five years after the date of the enactment of this paragraph.".

(b) HUNTING, FISHING, AND TRAPPING.—Section 5 of the Act of October 11, 1974, is amended by inserting "and the Addition" after "preserve" each place it appears.

(c) SUITABILITY AS WILDERNESS.—Section 7 of the Act of October 11, 1974, is amended—

(1) by inserting "with respect to the preserve and five years from the date of the enactment of the Big Cypress National Preserve Addition Act with respect to the Addition" after "date of the enactment of this Act" in the first sentence; and

(2) by inserting "or the area within the Addition (as the case may be)" after "preserve" each place it appears.

SEC. 5. ACQUISITION OF LAND WITHIN ADDITION.

(a) UNITED STATES SHARE OF ACQUISITION COSTS.—The first section of the Act of October 11, 1974, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(d)(1) The aggregate cost to the United States of acquiring lands within the Addition may not exceed 80 percent of the total cost of such lands.

"(2) Except as provided in paragraph (3), if the State of Florida transfers to the Secretary lands within the Addition, the Secretary shall pay to or reimburse the State of Florida (out of funds appropriated for such purpose) an amount equal to 80 percent of the total costs to the State of Florida of acquiring such lands.

"(3) The amount described in paragraph (1) shall be reduced by an amount equal to 20 percent of the amount of the total cost incurred by the Secretary in acquiring lands in the Addition other than from the State of Florida.

"(4) For purposes of this subsection, the term 'total cost' means that amount of the total acquisition costs (including the value of exchanged or donated lands) less the amount of the costs incurred by the Federal Highway Administration and the Florida Department of Transportation, including severance damages paid to private property owners as a result of the construction of Interstate 75.".

(b) METHODS OF LAND ACQUISITION IN THE ADDITION.—The first sentence of subsection (c) of the first section of the Act of October 11, 1974, is amended—

(1) by inserting "or the Addition" after "preserve" the first place it appears; and

(2) in the first proviso—

(A) by inserting "in the preserve" after "subdivisions,"; and

(B) by striking out the colon and inserting in lieu thereof "and, any land acquired by the State of Florida, or any of its subdivisions, in the Addition shall be acquired in accordance with subsection (d):".

(c) VALUATION AND APPRAISAL.—The fourth sentence of subsection (c) of such section is amended by inserting "or the Addition" after "preserve" each place it appears.

(d) ACQUISITION OF PROPERTY RIGHTS BY THE STATE OF FLORIDA.—Subsection (c) of such section is amended by adding at the end thereof the following: "Nothing in this Act shall be construed to interfere with the right of the State of Florida to acquire such property rights as may be necessary for Interstate 75.".

(e) EXCLUSION OF SUBSURFACE ESTATE.—The third sentence of subsection (c) of such section is amended by inserting "and the Addition" after "preserve" each place it appears.

(f) IMPROVED PROPERTY IN ADDITION.—Section 3(b) of the Act of October 11, 1974, is amended—

(1) in paragraph (i) by inserting "with respect to the preserve and January 1, 1986, with respect to the Addition" after "November 23, 1971,"; and

(2) in paragraph (ii)—

(A) by inserting "with respect to the preserve and January 1, 1986, with respect to the Addition" after "November 23, 1971," the first place it appears; and

(B) by inserting "or January 1, 1986, as the case may be," after "November 23, 1971," the second and third places it appears.

SEC. 6. COOPERATION AMONG AGENCIES.

The Act of October 11, 1974, is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"SEC. 11. The Secretary and other involved Federal agencies shall cooperate with the State of Florida to establish recreational and oil, gas, and mineral access points and roads, rest and recreation areas, appropriate wildlife protection, and, where appropriate, hunting, fishing, frogging, and other recreational opportunities in conjunction with the creation of the Addition and in the construction of Interstate Highway 75.".

"SEC. 12. Not later than one year after the date of the enactment of this section, the Secretary shall submit to the Congress a detailed report on, and further plan for, the preserve and Addition including—

"(1) the status of the existing preserve, the effectiveness of past regulation and management of the preserve, and recommendations for future management of the preserve and the Addition;

"(2) a summary of the public's use of the preserve and the status of all access rights for public and private use;

Any recommendation for significant changes in the approved recreational access points, including any proposed additions, shall be accompanied by an assessment of the environmental impact of such changes.".

SEC. 8. AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS.

Section 8 of the Act of October 11, 1974, is amended—

(1) by striking out "There" in the first sentence and inserting in lieu therefore "(a) Except as provided in subsection (b), there"; and

By Mr. JOHNSTON:

S. 2031. A bill to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to release restrictions on certain property located in Calcasieu Parish, LA, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

REGARDING CERTAIN PROPERTY IN CALCASIEU PARISH

● Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, the legislation I am introducting today would remove restrictions on certain lands located in Calcasieu Parish, LA, comprising approximately 1,600 acres for the purpose of permitting the leasing of these lands for use as an industrial airpark. These restrictions were placed on the use of this property by the United States when the Chennault Air Force Base was disbanded and the property conveyed to the various public bodies. While these restrictions permit a number of diverse uses of the land, they prohibit the leasing of the property for development purposes.

Mr. President, all of the present owners of these properties agree that an air industrial park is in the best interests of Calcasieu Parish—an area currently plauged by double-digit unemployment. Reactivation of a portion of the airbase as an air industrial park could greatly expand the area's economic base and provide employment opportunities for hundreds or perhaps thousands of Louisiana citizens.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a letter to Congressman JOHN BREAUX from the affected public bodies regarding this project appear in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DECEMBER 4, 1985.

Re Proposed Development of Industrial Air Park at Chennault Air Force Base, Lake Charles, Louisiana.

Congressman JOHN BREAUX,
U.S. Congress,
Washington, DC.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN BREAUX: The City of Lake Charles, Calcasieu Parish Police Jury, Sowela Technical Institute and the Calcasieu Parish School Board are owners of various contiguous parcels of land acquired from various agencies of the United States of America which originally formed a part of Chennault Air Force Base in Lake Charles, Louisiana. As owners of these properties, these various governmental bodies have used these properties to suit their own individual needs. The economic decline in the petrochemical industry on which our area has been so dependent has brought home the need for a diversification of our economic base. For months now, the citizens have suffered through double-digit unemployment despite efforts and attempts to improve the economy which have been made by various public and private entities.

As owners of Chennault Air Force Base, the City of Lake Charles, Calcasieu Parish Police Jury, Sowela Technical Institute and the Calcasieu Parish School Board have come to realize that the reactivation of the air base as an industrial air park could greatly expand the area's economic base and provide employment opportunities for literally thousands of individuals.

The City of Lake Charles, Calcasieu Parish Police Jury, Sowela Technical Institute and the Calcasieu Parish School Board have all mutually agreed that it would be in the best interest of the citizens of Calcasieu Parish that certain portions of Chennault Air Force Base be consolidated for use as an industrial air park. The major obstacle which we all face in making this industrial air park a reality is the restrictions placed on the use of this property by the United States of America when various parcels of property were reconveyed by the United States to the various owners. A great deal of time and effort has gone into the planning for the establishment of this industrial air park.

The City of Lake Charles, Calcasieu Parish Police Jury, Sowela Technical Institute and the Calcasieu Parish School Board all sincerely believe that the exemption of these properties from these deed restrictions would inure to the benefit of all citizens. We are not asking that the property be relieved of all restrictions. We understand that our Federal Government may have need of this property in the future to serve the interest of our national defense. In this regard, we believe that the reactivation of Chennault as an industrial air park would result in a facility which could be used by the government on a moment's notice for any defense purposes whatsoever.

As representatives of the City of Lake Charles, Calcasieu Parish Police Jury, Sowela Technical Institute and the Calcasieu Parish School Board, we are authorized to advise you that these governmental bodies, as owners of property at Chennault, do wholeheartedly support the efforts of you and your staff in sponsoring the appropriate legislation needed in order to exempt these properties from these use restrictions.

Sincerely yours,

CITY OF LAKE CHARLES,

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I am hopeful that the Public Lands, Reserved Water, and Resource Conservation Subcommittee can conduct a hearing on this measure in the near future and that the Senate can move expeditiously.●

S. 2032. A bill to amend the Nuclear Waste Policy Act of 1982 to prohibit the development of a repository in proximity to a monitored retrievable storage facility; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

NUCLEAR WASTE POLICY IMPROVEMENT ACT

● Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce legislation to ensure that the legislative intent of the Nuclear Waste Policy Act [NWPA] of 1982 is fully implemented by the Department of Energy.

As required by law, the Department is moving forward to make final selection of a site (between Texas, Nevada, and Washington) for the first high-level radioactive waste repository.

On January 16, 1986, the Department of Energy selected 12 sites in seven States as possible locations for a second high-level radioactive waste disposal repository.

In conjunction with this effort to select sites for the permanent disposal of high-level radioactive waste and spent nuclear fuel, under NWPA the Department is also separately moving to select a site for a monitored, retrievable storage facility [MRS].

Pursuant to NWPA, the Department developed the Mission Plan for the Civilian Radioactive Waste Management Program.

Under these guidelines, the Department has integrated the purpose of MRS facilities into the overall waste-management system.

The Mission Plan identifies the role of the MRS facility to consolidate and package waste before being permanently disposed in a high-level radioactive waste repository.

I believe that the role of an MRS facility is equal in importance to a deep-mined geologic repository from waste management, environmental, and socioeconomic viewpoints.

The NWPA stresses the critical importance of establishing a regional balance of site selection for waste disposal to foster greater public confidence and Federal credibility in the program.

Recognizing these objectives, the law specifically prohibits DOE from constructing an MRS facility and a repository in one State.

This protection is necessary for many reasons.

For example, not to further burden a host State's transportation system since waste would be traveling to the MRS for interim storage and, after packaging, sent to the repository for permanent disposal.

My legislation today further clarifies the protections to the environment, public, health, and safety by directing DOE not to construct a repository within a radius of a monitored, retrievable storage facility.

Often the boundaries of a State will not provide the needed protection that a specific radius will, such as, perhaps, 400 miles.

Parts of several States may need protection.

Recognizing that a State boundary offers no protection to an area from these burdens, it seems clear to me that the intent of the Nuclear Waste Policy Act of 1982 was to not concentrate nuclear waste in any one region of the country.

Establishing a 400-mile protective radius from the site of a MRS facility would meet the objectives of the existing law.

I wholeheartedly support the need to develop a comprehensive policy for the disposal of radioactive waste that will have the support and trust of our citizens.

The Congress recognized that maintaining a close relationship with the States, and its citizens, where a disposal site was under consideration was essential in convincing a State to accept radioactive waste from across the Nation.

It was further recognized by the Senate Committees on Energy and Natural Resources and the Environment and Public Works that in the Committee Report to S. 1662 "no single State or region of the country will bear the full burden of civilian nuclear waste disposal."

Mr. President, nuclear energy continues to be a safe source of energy and promotes our Nation's energy independence.

To ensure the continued viability of nuclear energy, we must safely dispose of its waste.

At the same time, we must not lose sight of the need for regional balance and unquestioned fairness in developing nuclear waste disposal sites.

I believe my legislation ensures that this regional balance and fairness are maintained in the program as Congress intended when we passed the National Nuclear Waste Policy Act of 1982.●

● Mr. TRIBLE. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my colleague from Virginia in introducing the Nuclear Waste Policy Improvement Act of 1986, legislation that simply clarifies the intent of the Nuclear Waste Policy Act of 1982 to ensure greater protection of public health and safety.

The Nuclear Waste Policy Act of 1982 provides that no State shall have both a monitored, retrievable storage [MRS] facility and a high-level radioactive waste repository. This is intended to prevent large concentrations of nuclear waste in one region of the country. The distinct possibility exists, however, that an MRS site and a repository could be in close proximity to each other. In fact, one proposed site is separated from the MRS facility by only 76 miles.

If two waste sites can be located in such proximity, it is obvious that State boundaries are an inadequate guideline. Rather, a geographical area should be prescribed. This legislation clarifies this guideline by protecting an area within a 400-mile radius of any MRS facility.

The clear purpose of the Nuclear Waste Policy Act of 1982 is to establish reasonable balance among nuclear sites. This legislation will insure that balance by requiring that MRS and repository sites are a reasonable distance from one another. Hence no region's transportation system would be unduly burdened.

I support the effort to create a national policy for radioactive waste management. But any plan must have the support of our citizens. The bill introduced today will realize both goals.●

By Mr. PRYOR (for himself, Mr. ANDREWS, Mr. GRASSLEY, Mrs. KASSEBAUM, and Mr. PROXMIRE):

S. 2030. A bill to establish an alternative procedure for the review of bid protests under the Competition in Contracting Act, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

PROCUREMENT SAFEGUARD ACT

● Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, today I am introducing new legislation that I and several of my colleagues, in the House and the Senate, believe will go a long way to eliminate excessive cost and low quality in Federal procurement, not just Department of Defense procurement but all Federal procurement. In the Senate I am joined by Senators, ANDREWS, GRASSLEY, PROXMIRE, and KASSEBAUM as cosponsors. In the House identical legislation is being introduced by Congresswoman BARBARA BOXER, Congressman DENNY SMITH, and others. We continue to strongly believe that the road to cleaning up the painfully self-evident, and continuing, problems and high costs the Federal Government is experiencing in procurement can only be paved smoothly by competition. Several new statutes to increase competition in Federal contracting have resulted from the strong support that some in Congress have given to competition, but without enforcement these new laws will amount to little. The bill I am introducing today should go a long way in providing that needed enforcement.

For the last 10 years an important competition enforcement mechanism has existed in the Protest Division of the General Accounting Office, where private businessmen can watch over each other's Government business and register protests against contract proposals and contract awards that violate Federal procurement laws and regulations. This contract protest process allows business competitors to make available to the Government better products for lower prices. Unfortunately, this process has not worked well in the Protest Division of the GAO.

Unlike the investigatory divisions of the GAO, which many of us have come to rely on for an objective and independent point of view, the GAO's Protest Division does not have a good reputation for independence or for an effective decisionmaking process. This sentiment appears to be the consensus of those in the private sector and those in government who have observed the GAO Protest Division closely. These criticisms also seem to be substantiated by the GAO Protest Division's track record of the past few years: the vast majority of the time the GAO Protest Division rejects contract protests.

This unfortunate track record was acknowledged by the most comprehensive legislation enacted by Congress on the subject of competition, the Competition in Contracting Act of 1984. This statute attempted to strengthen the GAO Protest Division, but the results, so far, seem disappointing.

The Competition in Contracting Act also acknowledged inherent weaknesses in the GAO and its protest process by establishing an alternate forum for contract protesters: the Board of Contract Appeals of the General Service Administration. In contrast to the GAO Protest Division, the GSA Board had established a reputation for objectivity and independence—even of its parent organization, the GSA—and the Board already had in place a set of procedures much better geared toward giving contract protesters a fair hearing.

As a result, an experiment was started; the GSA Board was allowed to hear contract protests concerning automatic data processing equipment contracts. The experiment has been in effect for a year, and it appears to be working. A track record considerably different from that which continues in the GAO has been established.

There is an important reason for this substantial difference in performance and reputation. Without in any way denigrating the dedication and professionalism of the people in the GAO Protest Division, it is clear that they are hampered by legal and other restraints in the procedures they are allowed to follow. For example, the GAO must follow a rule of "presumption of agency correctness." This term means that on all arguments over the facts of a protest case, the Government agency's assertions of fact must be accepted by the GAO. In contrast, the GSA Board of Contract Appeals has a "preponderance of evidence" standard wherein each side must prove the facts it asserts. As another example, in the GSA Board testimony is taken under oath, and subpoenas can be issued; in the GAO neither is possible. Furthermore, the GAO protest process can take twice as long as that in the GSA Board. Finally, GAO's authority is subject to a constitutional challenge in the courts; the GSA Board's authority is not vulnerable to any such challenge.

There would seem little question but that the GSA Board of Contract Appeals is a far better forum to enforce competition in Government contracting than the GAO Protest Division. The GAO has had exclusive domain over the contract protest process for 60 years with little success to show for it: all of us read much too often of ridiculous Government contracting decisions which somehow managed to escape any dragnet in the GAO.

The Procurement Safeguard Act, which we are introducing today, takes an important step in stopping Government procurement horror stories. The bill would expand the experiment wisely set up by the Competition in Contracting Act by increasing the jurisdiction of the GSA Board of Contract Appeals beyond just automatic data processing protests to all Government contracting protests. Furthermore, the Procurement Safeguard Act would keep the GAO Protest Division in business, just the same as it is now. In effect, the bill would establish competition between the GAO and the GSA Board in the enforcement of competition itself. The GAO would be given every opportunity to use the resources available to it to improve its performance, and the GSA Board would operate in the knowledge that it could not just rest on the laurels of its past, effective performance.

Mr. President, this entire subject of contract protest, the GAO Protest Division and the GSA Board of Contract Appeals is a new subject to many of us, certainly to myself. For that reason, we intend to seek hearings in the Government Affairs Committee, where I understand this bill will be referred, so that the hypothesis of this legislation can be demonstrated and Senators familiarized with the issues. It is not my intention to try to rush this new legislation through the Senate. The subject matter is an important one which requires our study and our thorough deliberation.

Finally, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed at this point in the RECORD, the text of the bill, a more detailed analysis of the need for this legislation, and a brief summary of its provisions.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2030

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Procurement Safeguard Act of 1986".

SEC. 2. PURPOSE.

The purpose of this Act is to ensure enforcement of the laws of the United States that foster and require economy and efficiency and fair, full, and open competition in contracting. Therefore, this Act establishes an alternative, independent forum for protest actions of an administrative adjucative nature, with the power and duty to issue subpoenas, take testimony under oath, conduct factfinding, order discovery, and issue such orders, rulings, and decisions as are necessary to enforce the laws of the United States that foster and require economy and full and open competition in contracting.

SEC. 3. AMENDMENTS TO TITLE 31, UNITED STATES CODE.

(a) ESTABLISHMENT OF ALTERNATIVE PROCEDURE.—Chapter 35 of title 31, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new suchapter:

"SUBCHAPTER VI—ALTERNATIVE PROCUREMENT PROTEST SYSTEM

"§ 3561. Definitions.

"In this subchapter—

"(1) 'protest' means a written objection by an interested party to a solicitation by a Federal agency for bids or proposals for a proposed contract for the procurement of property or services or a written objection to a proposed award or the award of such a contract;

"(2) 'interested party' means, with respect to a contract or proposed contract for the procurement of property or services, an actual or prospective bidder, offeror, subcontractor, supplier, or other party whose economic interest would be affected, directly or indirectly, by the award of the contract or by failure to award the contract;

"(3) 'board' means the board of contract appeals of the General Services Administration; and

"(4) 'Federal agency' has the meaning given such term by section 3 of the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949 (40 U.S.C. 472).

"§ 3562. Protests by interested parties concerning procurement actions.

"Upon request of an interested party in connection with any procurement conducted by a Federal agency (including procurements conducted under delegations of procurement authority) filed in accordance with this subchapter, the board of contract appeals of the General Services Administrative shall review any decision by a contracting officer alleged to violate a statute, regulation, or other provision of law. An interested party who has filed a protest under subchapter V of this chapter with respect to a procurement or proposed procurement may not file a protest with respect to that procurement or proposed procurement under this subchapter. An interested party may not file a protest under this subchapter with respect to a procurement or proposed procurement conducted under the authority of section 111 of the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949 (40 U.S.C. 759).

"§ 3563. Protests filed before contract award.

"(a) When a protest under this subchapter is filed before the award of a contract in a protested procurement, the board, at the request of an interested party and within 10 days of the filing of the protest, shall hold a hearing to determine whether the board should suspend the procurement authority of the Federal agency for the protested procurement on an interim basis until the board can decide the protest.

"(b) The board shall suspend the procurement authority of the Federal agency unless the Federal agency concerned establishes that—

"(1) absent action by the board, contract award is likely to occur within 30 days of the hearing; and

"(2) urgent and compelling circumstances which significantly affect interests of the United States will not permit waiting for the decision of the board.

"§ 3564. Protests filed within 10 days of contract award.

"(a) If the board receives notice of a protest under this subchapter after the contract has been awarded but within 10 days after notice of the contract award is received by each bidder or offeror on the contract, the board shall, at the request of an interested party and within 10 days after the date of the filing of the protest, hold a hearing to determine whether the board should suspend the procurement authority of the Federal agency for the challenged procurement on an interim basis until the board can decide the protest.

"(b) The board shall suspend the procurement authority of the Federal agency to acquire any property or services under the contract which are not previously delivered and accepted unless the Federal agency concerned establishes that urgent and compelling circumstances which significantly affect interests of the United States will not permit waiting for the decision of the board.

"§ 3565. Procedures and standards in protest proceedings.

"(a) The board shall conduct such proceedings and allow such discovery as may be required for the expeditious, fair, and reasonable resolution of the protest. The board shall review de novo any decision by a contracting officer alleged to violate a statute, regulation, or other provision of law. Such review shall be conducted under the preponderance of evidence standard applicable to review of contracting officer decisions by boards of contract appeals.

"(b)(1) Subject to any deadlines imposed by section 9(a) of the Contract Disputes Act of 1978 (41 U.S.C. 608(a)), the board shall give priority to protests filed under this subchapter. Except as provided in paragraphs (2) through (4), the board shall issue its final decision within 45 working days after the date of the filing of the protest, unless the board's chairman determines that the specific and unique circumstances of the protest require a longer period, in which case the board shall issue such decision within the longer period determined by the chairman.

"(2) If the major portion, as determined by dollar volume, of the protested procurement is to be performed outside the continental United States, then the board is authorized to extend the 45 working-day deadline set forth in paragraph (1) of this subsection for a period not to exceed 15 working days. The board shall issue its final decision within such extended period, unless the board's chairman determines that the specific and unique circumstances of the protest require a longer period, in which case the board shall issue such decision within the longer period determined by the chairman.

"(3) If the award of a contract is suspended pursuant to section 3563, the procuring agency may, subject to the approval of the board, elect to extend the 45 working-day deadline set forth in paragraph (1) of this subsection for a period not to exceed 15 working days. The agency shall request such an extension within 2 working days from the date the suspension is ordered, and the board shall rule on such request within 4 working days thereafter. The suspension shall remain in effect during the extended period for deciding the bid protest.

"(4) If a procurement is not suspended pursuant to section 3562, an interested party may, subject to the approval of the board, elect to extend the 45 working-day deadline set forth in paragraph (1) of this subsection for a period not to exceed 15 working days. The interested party shall request such an extension within 2 working days after the protest is filed or within 2 days after a request for suspension is denied, whichever is later, and the board shall rule on such request within 4 working days thereafter. Due consideration shall be given to the views of the agency. If more than one interested party files a protest against the same procurement, then the board shall not order an extension unless the extension is agreed to by all interested parties.

"(c) The board may dismiss a protest the board determines is frivolous or which, on its face, does not state a valid basis for protest.

"§ 3566. Bases and consequences of decisions.

"(a) In making a decision on the merits of protests brought under this subchapter, the board shall accord full weight to the need for prompt and effective enforcement of Federal statutes, regulations, and policies furthering economic and efficient procurement and fair, full, and open competition.

"(b)(1) If the board determines that a challenged agency action violates a statute, regulation, or other provision of law, the board shall suspend, revoke, or revise the procurement authority of the Federal agency for the challenged procurement.

"(2) The board shall order the termination of awarded contracts or make such other orders and shall grant such other relief as may be necessary to ensure compliance with statutes and regulations, and to ensure full, open competition and economic, efficient contracting.

"(c) Whenever the board makes a determination described in subsection (b)(1), it may, in accordance with section 1304 of this title, further declare an appropriate interested party to be entitled to the costs of—

"(1) filing and pursuing the protest, including reasonable attorney's fees, and

"(2) bid and proposal preparation.

"§ 3567. Appeal of board decisions.

"(a) The final decisions of the board may be appealed by the head of the Federal agency concerned and by any interested party, including any interested party who intervenes in any protest filed under this subchapter, as set forth in the Contract Disputes Act of 1978 (41 U.S.C. 601 et seq.).

"(b) If the board revokes, suspends, or revises the procurement authority of the Federal agency after the contract award or orders the termination of such contract, the affected contract shall not be presumed void ab initio as to any goods or services delivered and accepted under the contract before the suspension, revocation, or revision of such procurement authority, unless the boad specifically rules that the contract was void ab initio.

"(c) Nothing contained in this subchapter shall affect the board's power to order any additional relief which it is authorized to provide under any statute or regulation.

"§ 3568. Authority to administer oaths and to issue subpoenas; court representation.

"(a) In connection with any protest action filed under the authority of this subchapter or any other action or proceeding before the board, any judge of the board or any hearing examiner duly designated by the chairman is empowered to administer oaths and affirmations and to issue subpoenas. Every subpoena shall be issued under the seal of the board and shall command each person to whom it is directed to attend and give testimony at a deposition or hearing and may command the person to whom it is directed to produce the books, papers, documents, or tangible things designated therein.

"(b) In case of contumacy or refusal to obey a subpoena or to answer questions of a judge or hearing examiner under oath, the board may invoke the aid of any district court of the United States within the jurisdiction of which the person quilty of such contumacy or refusal is found or resides, or transacts business, and such court shall have jurisdiction to order such person to appear before the board to produce evidence or give testimony or both. any failure to obey such an order of the court may be punished as a contempt thereof by the court.

"(c) Except as provided in section 518 of title 28, United States Code, relating to litigation before the Supreme Court, attorneys designated by the chairman of the board may appear for, and represent the board in, any civil action brought in connection with any function carried out by the board pursuant to this subchapter.

"§ 3569. Rules, procedures, and operations.

"(a) Not later than 90 days after the date of enactment of this subchapter, the board shall adopt and issue such rules and procedures as may be necessary to the disposition of protests filed under the authority of this subchapter.

"(b) The board shall adopt a seal which shall be required for authentication purposes. The board shall adopt such internal procedures and form of organization as may be necessary for its day-to-day operations. The chairman, or his designee, may authorize travel and enter into contracts and other arrangements necessary for the board's day-to-day operations, but only to the extent and in such amounts as may be provided in advance by appropriations Acts. The chairman is authorized to establish such positions and to select, appoint, and employ such officers and employees as may be necessary for carrying out the functions, powers, and duties of his office and of the board, subject to the provisions of title 5, United States Code, governing appointments in the competitive service, the provisions of chapter 51 and subchapter III of chapter 53 of such title relating to classification and general schedule pay rates, and the provisions of section 8(b) of the Contract Disputes Act of 1978 (41 U.S.C. 607(b)) relating to board members which are not subject to classification but whose rates of pay are set by statute.

"(c) The chairman of the board shall report to the Attorney General and to the appropriate committees of Congress any incident concerning a protest under this subchapter that may involve a violation of section 1505 of title 18.".

(b) CONFORMING AMENDMENT.—Section 3552 of title 31, United States Code, is amended by inserting "under subchapter VI of this chapter or" before "under section 111(h) of the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949".

(c) CLERICAL AMENDMENT.—The analysis for such chapter is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

WHAT IS THE PROCUREMENT SAFEGUARD ACT, AND WHY IS IT NEEDED?

WHY IS IT NEEDED?

Competition has been the subject of several new laws to reduce excessive costs, to improve quality and to expand the industrial base for the Defense Department and the rest of the federal government. However, these new laws will be meaningless without enforcement. In the private sector, firms that cannot compete effectively go out of business. No such automatic enforcement mechanism exists in government contracting. There, powerful forces combine to resist competition and to perpetuate what amounts to a non-market spending system.

One way to overcome bureaucratic and some industry resistance to competition is to bring the competitive pressures of the private sector into government contracting. How? By allowing businessmen to monitor the award of government business to their competitors and to step in and protest when violations of statutory and regulatory procurement rules are evident. For 60 years a forum for this process has existed inside the federal government in the Protest Division of the General Accounting Office. Here, government contractors are allowed to watch over each other and register protests against non-competitive government contract proposals and unjustified government awards of contracts.

Unfortunately, this mechanism in the GAO has not worked well. Although the GAO deserves its good reputation in its investigatory divisions, the GAO Protest Division—the one discussed here—does not have a reputation for independence and aggressiveness among many of those in business and government who observe it closely.

Weaknesses in the GAO Protest Division were recognized by Congress when it enacted the Competition in Contracting Act of 1984. Among many things, that legislation attempted to strengthen the GAO's Protest Division, but it also went further than that. It contained an additional provision that allowed businessmen wanting to protest certain types of government contract proposals and contract awards to do so in a second administrative forum: the General Services Administration's Board of Contract Appeals. An experiment was initiated; the GSA Board was given authority to rule on protests against any federal agency's procurement decisions pertaining to automated data processing equipment. This expansion of the GSA Board's jurisdiction was scheduled to terminate in 1987, unless subsequently extended by statute. Thus, for adp contract protests and until 1987, protesters were allowed to select between the GAO and the GSA Board for registering their complaints against government procurement decisions.

A major reason for the GSA Board's being selected for this experiment was the many differences between it and the GAO Protest Division. First, as pointed out by the Report of the House Government Operations Committee on the Competition in Contracting Act, the GAO Protest Division has a poor track record in the contract protest business. Of the 7,000 protests filed at the GAO between 1981 and 1983, decisions were made on 3,228: the rest were thrown out for one reason or another. Of these 3,228 decisions, the GAO Protest Division found in favor of the protest in 235 instances, 7.3% of the time. Only in 34 of these cases did the GAO back up its decision with a recommendation to cancel the protested bid proposal or contract. Basically, the same pattern appears to be recurring even after the enactment of the Competition in Contracting Act, which sought to improve the GAO's record.

There are reasons why the GAO has maintained what appears to be such a poor track record. As one witness testified to the House Government Operations Committee: ". . . GAO does not conduct investigations to establish the validity of a bid protester's claims * * * GAO's protest decisions must rely on the facts which the (government) agency chooses to disclose. * * * an agency need only deny that a protester's statement of facts is correct. In nine cases out of ten, the agency's denial will carry the day." Thus, there can be little, if any, dispute over the facts of a case in the GAO Protest Division; by definition the government almost always will win the factual argument, and, therefore, the case.

Furthermore, in the GAO there is no testimony under oath, and subpoenas against either the government or the protester cannot be issued. In short, a protester is at the mercy of his opponent's willingness to be complete and accurate in his assertions, which is a lot to ask of an interested party when billions of dollars are at stake.

There are additional problems. The GAO Protest Division process can take twice as long as that in the GSA Board. One key component of the GAO protest reforms implemented by the Competition in Contracting Act—the authority to suspend protested procurements—is under constitutional attack in the federal courts.

The GSA Board offers a sharp contrast to the GAO. Since the beginning of 1985 when the GSA Board was allowed to hear adp bid protests, its track record has borne out a vote of confidence. Of 101 bid protests filed in the first 10 months of the Board's new, expanded operations, 10 protests were decided for the protester, 27 were dismissed in the protester's favor; 9 protests were denied, and 16 were dismissed in favor of the procuring agency; the rest remain pending. This record of finding in favor of the protester more than half of the time is in sharp contrast to the GAO's record of finding almost always against the protester.

One reason for this better track record is that the GSA Board replaces the GAO's procedural weaknesses with strengths. Most importantly, neither party has a lock on the facts. Rather than the GAO's "presumption of agency correctness", there is a discovery process, including testimony under oath and authority to issue subpoenas, to uncover the facts of the matter without prejudice and on the merits. Secondly, unlike the GAO, there is no dispute, constitutional or otherwise, over whether the GSA Board has the authority to enforce its opinions. All of its decisions are final and binding on the agency and can be reversed only by the United States Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit.

Whether it be actual performance, procedures designed to get to the bottom of a matter, or the unquestioned authority to make decisions stick, the GSA Board is clearly preferable to the GAO if you are a potential government contractor and want to have a fair chance at overturning improper government agency procurement decisions. The issue is an extremely important and fundamental one. If waste is to be stopped, it must be subjected to the same forces that naturally operate in the market place: if you can't build it best and cheapest, you don't get the business. Exploiting the benefits of the GSA Board of Contract Appeals will bring those needed forces into government contracting. 60 years of business at the GAO Protest Division has only allowed problems to continue.

The only remaining question is, why limit the GSA Board to hearing only automatic data processing protests, and why shut even that business down in 1987? Removing these limitations are the two basic objectives of the Procurement Safeguard Amendment.

WHAT IS THE PROCUREMENT SAFEGUARD ACT?

The proposal would expand the jurisdiction of the General Services Administration's Board of Contract Appeals to allow it to hear any and all bid protests, rather than just those concerning automated data processing. The bill would not eliminate the GAO Protest Division; the GSA Board would be established as a second forum. Protesters would have a choice of one or the other (but could not go to both). The Procurement Safeguard Act would apply the virtues of competition to the business of bid protest itself. The GAO Protest Division would have pressure applied to improve its questionable performance, and the GSA Board would not be able to rest on its past laurels. What better device is there to increase competition in government contracting than to create competition in the enforcement of that competition?

Furthermore, the Procurement Safeguard Act would further increase the GSA Board's independence of its parent agency, the GSA, and the bill would augment the already preferable procedures now in use in the Board.

A brief section by section analysis follows:

Section 3561 is a definitions section; these definitions are technical, except for the definition of "interested party" (those permitted to file protests). An important expansion from previous definitions of the term is used: any party with a direct or indirect economic interest would be allowed to file a protest; this would include not just subcontractors but also private citizens. With this admittedly controversial definition, the number of procurement "policemen" searching for fraud would be tremendously expanded.

Section 3562 would establish the GSA Board as a alternate forum to the GAO Protest Division to hear any protest actions concerning violations of statutes or regulations for procurement or sale by federal agencies. Any Protester who has a protest filed with the GAO may not also file with the GSA Board.

Section 3563 establishes rules for when a protested procurement shall be suspended in order to prevent an illegal procurement from becoming an accomplished fact by the time a Board ruling against it is made.

Section 3565 specifies the GSA Board's existing practice of being neutral with regard to either party's version of the facts of a case. The "preponderance of evidence" standard is applied to disputes over facts. The section also establishes rules for extending the Board's 45 working day deadline for coming to a decision in the event of special circumstances, and the section gives the Board authority to dismiss patently frivolous or incompetent protests.

Section 3566 states that the Board "shall", not "may", suspend, revoke or revise the authority for any procurement found to violate any statute, regulation or other provision of law.

Section 3567 allows the Board's decisions to be appealed by any federal agency or protester in federal court.

Section 3568 makes explicit the Board's authority to issue subpoenas and to take testimony under oath.

Section 3569 permits the Board to write its own rules and procedures to implement this Act and to appoint its own judges and staff under current Civil Service requirements. The section also requires the Chairman of the Board to report to the Attorney General and Congress any incident involving attempts to bribe or otherwise improperly influence the deliberations of the Board.●

S. 2033. A bill to promote economic growth and trade expansion to amend the Trade Act of 1974 to open foreign markets, to enhance the competitiveness of U.S. firms, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

TRADE EXPANSION ACT

● Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, for some years now, the United States has been at a disadvantage in international markets. In part, that's the result of insular trade policies set up by other nations which make American sales abroad much more difficult.

But that's neither the whole story, nor the sole explanation for the record trade deficit.

In many ways, we have not applied ourselves to the task of export promotion. We haven't been ambitious enough in welding together the advantages we have.

Individual States seek markets abroad, but they go it alone. Many small businesses search for foreign markets, but they have to penetrate a mixed bag of Government agencies involved with trade. And the agencies themselves either go in different directions or sometimes fail to take the initiative to help manufacturers find new markets abroad.

It seems to me this country has to make a decision to actively pursue foreign sales, and do it in a coordinated fashion. The tools we have are rusty, and we don't have all the ones we need. We are restless and willing to break new trails, but we really don't have a map to guide us.

I think we can do better. We can bring new energy to world markets, sharpen our competitive edge, and still put aside the antagonisms that have colored the world trade picture.

We need to revitalize our approach and make it clear that the way to gain an advantage is through the quality of goods and services we produce rather than by the size of the barriers put up.

And here at home, we need to move more closely together in the best interests of the American worker and American business, to promote our goods and services abroad.

Our immediate aim is American trade expansion. Our long-range goal is a more active world market where all nations can compete according to rules we each understand and all observe.

Today, we take the first step.

Today we are introducing a new trade bill.

This bill includes solid provisions from several other proposals currently before the Senate. We believe this bill refines and expands a reasonable approach to opening access to world markets for American goods. But it also goes farther, and has more immediate impact.

It makes clear to other nations that the United States is gearing up to compete fairly. It tells the American worker the country is serious about safeguarding their ability to produce. And it lets American businesses know the Government will help where it can to protect their right to sell overseas.

A section-by-section analysis describes the bill in detail, but let me briefly summarize some of its main features.

It begins here at home. The bill would require us to identify and remove our own barriers to trade to show good faith, and keep us from tying our own hands. We have many government policies in our own country that have proven to be barriers to our own producers in the search for foreign markets.

Next, it requires the U.S. Trade Representative to inventory the effects on American exports of lifting foreign trade barriers. It will serve as a reference point for setting access goals to foreign markets. If other nations are unwilling to open their markets in accordance with those goals, the United States will take the action necessary to make up the shortfall by limiting the amount of foreign imports into this country.

Third, the bill sets up a $300 million "war chest" to counter, if necessary, other nation's assistance to their own producers.

Fourth, it directs the Export-Import Bank to work with State agencies in the promotion of exports to coordinate a truly national effort.

Fifth, it directs the Secretary of Agriculture to conduct research to improve the potential of American agricultural exports.

Sixth, it would streamline procedures for American industries damaged by imports, and require the International Trade Commission to automatically implement their decisions unless overridden by the President.

The bill also instructs the Department of Commerce to monitor foreign industries which engage in predatory practices. It would protect the creativity of American intellects by prohibiting trade with foreign firms whose goods are manufactured as a result of the illegal use of U.S. patents. In that sense, it also protects America's investment in research and development.

Beyond these items, the President would be instructed to enter into negotiations to strengthen GATT with regard to services, agricultural trade, technology, and investments.

It would also involve the U.S. Treasury and the Federal Reserve Board in an effort to find ways to ease the international debt crisis.

And at the heart of the bill is the idea of promoting growth—not just through ever-expanding exports—but through serious work on the problems of deficits and consumption affecting the nations of the world.

We begin this work to invigorate world trade. And we start it because we value the benefits dynamic and competitive partnership can bring to this Nation and all others who join the effort.

For millions of people in the industrial West, the world is a market for the high-technology wonders we have produced. For millions more in nations around the globe, trade is the difference between a past of poverty and a future of advancement.

If we become partners, we can all gain. But if we remain at odds, protected by trade barriers, we could fall victim to a myth. And the myth is that in a crowded world, any nation can go it alone indefinitely. Even in a simpler world with far fewer people, that idea has been tried, and failed before. If we can't be partners immediately, at least we can work toward a community of competitors as the first step.

The United States has great power. It has the power to weld our economy into a productive force for the advancement of living standards around the world. We are, perhaps, one of the very few who can.

But we recognize there are benefits to be had from partnership—between business and government at home and among nations—to unleash ideas and productivity in all their diversity.

This bill alone will not reach all those goals at once. But it is time to begin, and I hope my colleagues in the Senate will join us in the effort.

I ask unanimous consent to insert a section-by-section analysis at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the section-by-section analysis was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE TRADE EXPANSION ACT OF 1985—SECTION-BY-SECTION SUMMARY

TITLE I—OPENING FOREIGN MARKETS

Requires the U.S. Trade Representative to calculate the potential increase in U.S. exports from lifting foreign trade barriers. These amounts form the basis for export goals and timelines for countries whose barriers are a significant impediment to U.S. exports.

Just as in S. 1404 (as amended), failure to meet the export goals would result in the foreign country being denied access to the U.S. market by the amount of the shortfall from the target.

In initiating Section 301 cases (unfair trade barriers), the USTR is instructed to focus not only on the most egregious practices, but to also consider the ability of smaller exporters to pursue their own remedies.

TITLE II—SUPPORTING U.S. EXPORT EFFORTS

Establishes a $300 million Export-Import bank "war chest" to counter mixed credits and other forms of subsidized financing.

Requires the Commerce Department to identify existing U.S. barriers to U.S. exports and reports to Congress on the increased value of exports that could be expected from their removal.

Revises Foreign Corrupt Practices Act by replacing the imprecise "reason to know" standard with a cleaner "knowledge standard". Strengthens enforcement of FCPA by doubling penalties. Requires Secretary of Commerce to review impact of FCPA on U.S. exports.

Mandates competitiveness impact statements for major legislative or regulatory initiatives by Federal agencies. In addition, the Congressional Budget Office will monitor committee-reported bills to identify those which would have a major impact on the international trade of the United States.

Instructs U.S. directors to multilateral development banks to aid procurement opportunities for U.S. firms.

Directs the Export-Import bank to work with state agencies that promote exports to establish procedures for consultation and coordination of efforts. Assures that these state agencies have ready access to the Commerce Department's trade data bank (see Title 9).

Requires diplomatic missions to facilitate U.S. export efforts.

TITLE III—ECONOMIC GROWTH AND TRADE EXPANSION

Instructs the President to negotiate with foreign countries:

To coordinate macroeconmic adjustment with reductions in the U.S. budget deficit matched by the expansion of foreign economies.

To base their economic growth on a balance of external and domestic demand, recognizing that exclusive reliance on export-led growth creates trade imbalances which increase protectionist pressures and undermine the world trading system.

To work with the United States and international organizations to pursue a pro-growth strategy to resolving the international debt crisis.

TITLE IV—AGRICULTURAL TRADE

Directs the Secretary of Agriculture to conduct research to enhance the competitiveness of U.S. agricultural commodities. Specific studies of U.S. comparative advantage, new developments in research conducted by foreign countries, and the level of export subsidization by foreign governments are mandated.

Authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to conduct an export quality incentive program using export PIK commodities. The government would provide commodities in exchange for each 1 percent improvement in grain quality above the standard contract.

Directs the Secretary of Agriculture to issue an annual report summarizing the impact of actions taken by the USTR on U.S. exports of agricultural commodities.

TITLE V—RELIEF FROM INJURY CAUSED BY IMPORTS

Adopts the language of S. 1860 which:

Streamlines section 201 procedures for industries damaged by imports.

Requires the International Trade Commission's recommendation to be automatically implemented unless overridden by the President.

Has Section 201 relief accompanied by adjustment measures aimed at restoring the competitiveness of the damaged industry.

Differs from S. 1860 by requiring that temporary relief under section 201 be in the form of tariffs or auctioned quotas, so that the "surplus" created by the protection flows to the Treasury rather than foreign producers.

TITLE VI—RESISTING PREDATORY TRADE PRACTICES

Instructs the Commerce Department to monitor for foreign industries which engage in predatory competition (such as protecting an industry while building a large export capacity).

The Commerce Department would monitor the flow of these industries' products to the U.S. and submit to Congress a report identifying cases of excessive increases in sales.

Adopts language of S. 1543 which strengthens the protection of intellectual property rights by prohibiting foreign firms from selling goods in the U.S. whose manufacturing involves the illegal use of U.S. process patents.

Calls for sufficient funding for personnel to vigorously enforce U.S. trade laws.

Amends countervailing duty law to establish that a subsidy exists when a government sells an input product or grants removal rights for an input product at a price below market value.

TITLE VII—INTERNATIONAL TRADE NEGOTIATIONS

Instructs the President to enter into international trade negotiations to create or strengthen the GATT articles with regard to trade in services, agricultural trade, technology and related processes, intellectual property rights, investments.

Calls for the strengthening of GATT as an institution through tougher enforcement mechanisms and streamlined procedures.

TITLE VIII—INTERNATIONAL DEBT CRISIS

Requires the U.S. Treasury and the Federal Reserve Board, in consultation with the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank, to report on the options for ameliorating the international debt crisis.

The report will consider the options for debt repayment flexibility conditioned on an increased role for the private sector in the indebted countries, appropriate monetary, fiscal and regulatory policies, movement toward membership in and adherence to the GATT articles.

Calls on industrialized countries which benefit from a U.S. defense presence to play a greater financial role in supporting the international institutions which aid the indebted countries.

Instructs the Administration to evaluate the feasibility of selling surplus agricultural and other commodities in exchange for local currency in indebted countries where hard currency supplies are low (Cooley Loan Program).

TITLE IX—TRADE INFORMATION

Mandates that the Commerce Department develops and maintains a centralized trade data bank with information on foreign economies and market opportunities, foreign business practices, laws and regulations, and information on specific industrial sectors.

Establishes a new service in the Commerce Department aimed at meeting the information needs of particular U.S. firms—with the companies sharing the cost.●

● Mr. EXON. Mr. President, I am pleased to cosponsor the Trade Expansion Act of 1986. I would like to focus on the key agricultural provisions of this comprehensive trade bill. International trade is of vital importance to our Nation's agriculture sector. Fully, one-third of our food production is devoted to export. Unfortunately, our agricultual export markets have deteriorated considerably in recent years.

The administration's solution to the growing crisis in rural America has been to embark on policies which reduce commodity prices below the cost of production, destroy asset equity and slash rural services. This has been done in the name of free market principles and increased exports.

Mr. President, you do not expand export markets by bankrupting the American farmer. Despite all of the problems in rural America, our farmers are the world's most efficient. On a fair playing field, American farmers would win every time. The fact is that there is no free world market in agriculture. Foreign governments subsidize their farmers, close their markets to American agricultural exports and lend great assistance and protection to their farmers. By contrast, in recent times, the U.S. Government has seemed to do everything possible to drive the American farmer from his land.

The Trade Expansion Act would pry open foreign markets, fight unfair trade practices, and add an element of reciprocity to our trade relationships. This approach would reduce the trade deficit through increasing exports rather than closing the American market.

Of key importance are the provisions which affect agriculture trade. The legislation authorizes the President to negotiate to bring foreign agricultural practices under the discipline of international trade law. Unfair foreign trade practices which would be clearly prohibited in the manufacturing sector run rampant in the agriculture sector. It is time that America demand not only free trade, but also fair trade.

The Trade Expansion Act includes an innovative incentive program to improve the quality export grain. PIK incentives would be given for improved grain quality. Experts have long recognized that the United States has had a problem with quality standards. This is the type of positive approach which is likely to work.

The legislation also requires the Secretary of Agriculture to research methods to improve and enhance our long-term competitiveness in world markets. In addition, the Secretary of Agriculture must report on the impact of U.S. trade actions on agricultural exports. Too often, protection is granted to one domestic industry with no consideration given to the retaliation such action provokes against U.S. agricultural exports.

Another innovative provision of the Trade Expansion Act provides for the sale of surplus commodities to debt ridden nations for their local currencies. In essence, this proposal is a modern day version of the Cooley Loan Program. Under such a system, the United States can develop future markets in the Third World while disposing of surplus commodities.

Certainly there is much to be done in the area of agricultural trade. The Trade Expansion Act is a significant step in the right direction. I strongly urge my colleagues to study and support this comprehensive trade legislation.●

● Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I am pleased to join in sponsoring the Trade Expansion Act of 1986.

This bill is an excellent piece of trade legislation.

But it is more than that.

It is also an expression of the views of the Democratic Leadership Conference, an organization that consistently has offered creative solutions to the problems we face today.

I am proud to be a member of that organization.

The bill I am cosponsoring today continues the DLC tradition of offering creative, forward-looking solutions to the vexing problems facing our Nation.

I would like to focus my remarks on one provision that I think is critical to America's future.

This legislation incorporates S. 1292, the natural subsidies legislation that I introduced in the Senate last year.

That legislation provides that natural resource subsidies should be subject to countervailing duties, like other subsidies proscribed by the GATT.

This has become a particularly big problem for the U.S. forest products, mining, chemicals, cement, and energy industries.

This legislation will tell foreign competitors that the playing field must truly be level.

This legislation will tell them that America truly believes in free, but fair, trade.

And this legislation would be consistent with the GATT.

The Trade Expansion Act of 1986 has many other fine provisions. I am pleased to be a cosponsor of this bill.●

By Mr. DIXON:

S. 2034. A bill to amend title 10, United States Code, to prescribe the organizational structure of unified and specified combatant commands, to prescribe the authority of unified and specified combatant commanders, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Armed Services.

UNIFIED AND SPECIFIED COMMAND ORGANIZATIONAL ACT

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation to address one of the key problems in the Department of Defense—the need to strengthen the authority and power of the unified commanders of our combined Armed Forces. I offer this legislation as a component to the broader efforts of the Committee on Armed Services, on which I serve, to reorganize and strengthen the Department of Defense. This effort was launched in a bipartisan spirit by Senators John Tower and the late Scoop Jackson, and has been guided in this Congress by the current chairman, BARRY GOLDWATER, and Senator SAM NUNN.

UNIFIED AND SPECIFIED COMMANDS

Mr. Chairman, one can look at the Department of Defense as consisting of two parallel components. The first is the policymaking component which is comprised primarily of the formal headquarters of the services and the civilian DOD leadership. The second is the operational component which exercises day-to-day control over our standing combat forces.

Prior to World War II, the War Department and the Navy Department operated independently, exercising both policymaking and operational functions. Activities that required coordination between the Army and the Navy were handled through joint coordination boards. "Mutual cooperation" was the phrase that characterized joint activity. Mutual cooperation unfortunately was the order of the day at the time of the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor in 1941.

The complexity of war during World War II demonstrated the need for more formal means for assuring effective joint operations of the services. When the Department of Defense was organized in 1947, bringing the Navy, the Army and the new formed Air Force together under a civilian Secretary of Defense, day-to-day operational control of combat forces in forward theaters was assigned to a unified commander. The world was divided into discrete regions. Command of forces in those regions would fall to one of the unified commanders in chief. Unified commands have forces assigned from two or more services. Specified commands consist of forces from a single service. Today there are six unified commands and three specified commands.

UNIFIED COMMANDERS BUT DIVIDED COMMANDS

The disastrous failure of interservice coordination at Pearl Harbor in 1941 dictated that in each theater the operational forces of two or more services be placed under the command of a single individual. Never again would American soldiers die needlessly because of divided commands.

That was the promise. Unfortunately, history presents a flawed record of meeting that promise. A detailed review of the facts reveals that we have unified commanders, but divided commands. The Armed Services Committee conducted an exhaustive review of our operational commands. The problem, in a nutshell, is our unified commanders don't really control the forces of the individual services assigned to their command.

The individual military services retain the responsibilities to train, equip, organize, and station their own service personnel. Therefore, the Army, for example, is responsible for organizing, training, equipping, and stationing all of the Army forces assigned to the U.S. Pacific Command. The commander in chief of the U.S. Pacific Command must fight with what the Army gives him and with where they have been put by the Army. The commander in chief has little role in determining what Army forces are assigned to him, how they are equipped, how they are organized, and where they are located.

In short, we have six unified commanders in chief who are responsible for the day-to-day defense of our country and our allies who cannot control the forces under their official command. All resources, promotions, awards, and penalties flow through the service chain of command, not the operational chain of command we set up to avoid future Pearl Harbors. This we have to change.

DIXON BILL TO STRENGTHEN UNIFIED COMMANDERS

The bill I am introducing today is designed to strengthen the unified commanders, the primary individuals responsible for defending the United States. My bill does this by: Giving the unified commander greater standing within the Department of Defense; providing the unified commander greater control over subordinates of the various service component organizations; delineating explicitly his operational control over subordinate forces; and inviting further study of ways to strengthen the unified commanders.

I have attempted to strike a balance. I am trying to strengthen the unified commanders without unduly weakening the services.

We Americans depend on these unified commanders to defend our homeland and our allies, and to protect the lives of the soldiers, sailors, airmen, and marines under their command. We cannot give them these awesome responsibilities without giving them appropriate authority. My bill will substantially redress these shortcomings. I ask my colleagues to study it seriously and join me in this important improvement in our Nation's defenses.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be included in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. DIXON:

S. 2035. A bill to amend title 10, United States Code, to establish within the Office of the Secretary of Defense an Office of Defense Procurement for the centralized procurement of all property and services for the Department of Defense, to provide for an Under Secretary of Defense for Procurement, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Armed Services.

DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE PROCUREMENT REORGANIZATION ACT

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I am today introducing a bill that would reorganize the way in which the Department of Defense is structured to purchase necessary goods and services. This bill would consolidate most of the procurement responsibilities within the Department of Defense under a new Under Secretary of Defense for Procurement.

Mr. President, I am honored to serve on the Senate Armed Services Committee, and its Defense Acquisition Policy Subcommittee. I also have the privilege of serving on the Senate Small Business Committee. Through these two committee assignments, I have had the opportunity to study the Federal acquisition system in some detail. I have tried to review the way we buy goods and services from the perspective of the Department of Defense and from the perspective of the largest defense contractors and the thousands of small businesses in my state.

During the past several years, we have been bombarded with an almost nonstop litany of problems with the Department of Defense's procurement system. In just the last few days alone we have had more reports of abuses in the Navy's supply system and the Air Force's spare parts purchases. As my colleagues know, for the past several years the Congress has been very actively involved in a number of procurement reform efforts. I am pleased to have been the original author of many of the provisions in the 1984 Small Business and Federal Procurement Competition Enhancement Act and the 1984 Department of Defense Procurement Reform Act. These efforts were focused primarily on ways to increase competition for and reduce barriers to greater participation in the $180 billion in goods and services that the Department purchases annually. We are just beginning to see the implementation of and some positive results from these amendments.

Last year, we in the Senate Armed Services Committee continued our review of the acquisition process and made a number of additional reforms in the way in which the Department purchased its goods and services and in the Department's relationships with defense contractors. Many of those reforms are yet to be implemented, however.

The changes we have made to the procedures for DOD purchases are not enough. In my view, if we are to realistically expect continuing successes in reducing the problems of defense procurement, we must address the organizational structure to carry out that mission. The legislation I am introducing today is the starting point for that initiative.

Under present law and practice, the procurement authority of the Department of Defense is highly decentralized. Hundreds of thousands of civilian and military employees in the military departments, defense agencies, and the Office of the Secretary of Defense are involved in procurement. In addition, an untold number of others serve in a variety of staff positions to monitor the actions of the buying components. Yet, in my view, the present organizational structure runs contrary to the goal of achieving an effective and efficient acquisition system.

Mr. President, there is no doubt that the current system is cumbersome and complex.

For example, the Senate Armed Services Committee's own staff study on defense organization highlighted four problem areas with the current acquisition organization. These were:

Insufficient assured connection between national military strategy and formulation of military requirements;

Failure to achieve feasible and desirable levels of military equipment commonality;

Weak management of, and general resistance to, joint programs; and Lack of effective departmental coordination of acquisition.

In addition, the recent white paper by Dr. James Wade, the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Acquisition and Logistics, seems to reach the same conclusion. As reported in the press, he has been quoted as saying that the:

Current DOD/Service acquisition organization is so ponderous, inflexible, and so layered as to make it virtually impossible to maintain accountability * * *. The time is right to look at other areas for improvements. The appropriate organizational structure for acquisitions can facilitate or hinder meaningful implementation of DOD policies.

These conclusions and my own study have led me to recommend that we consolidate the bulk of the acquisition system for the Department of Defense into a single, coordinated entity within the Department. This new organizational entity would be under the direction of a new Under Secretary of Defense for Procurement. I am proposing that this new Under Secretary be made the Acquisition Executive of the Department, and have all of the existing independent staff offices and procurement activities reporting to him. I am also suggesting that the various Competition Advocates, Small and Disadvantaged Business Utilization officials, the Defense Contract Audit Agency, and the Defense Logistics Agency, report to the new Under Secretary.

I have not proposed that the recently created Office of Operational Test and Evaluation be folded into this function, however. While I believe that a truly consolidated procurement organizational structure would include this office, I believe the current visibility of that office, and the work that it must be able to carry out, in the short term, require that it be left as an independent office, at least for the time being. I have proposed, however, that the charter of this Office be amended so that its test reports are provided to the Under Secretary.

Mr. President, one of the most important functions of government is ensuring the common defense. We are asked to, and do spend huge sums of money on a variety of offensive and defensive systems to preserve our national security. Regardless of what systems are purchased, however, we should insist that the purchasing process be carried out efficiently, effectively and at the least cost. We have already taken a number of important steps to change the procedures for making these purchases. But we will be able to fully meet our responsibility for preserving the national defense only if we are also prepared to radically alter the organizational structure of the Department of Defense along the lines I am proposing today.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be included in the RECORD.

There being no objection the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. DURENBERGER (for himself and Mr. EVANS):

S. 2037. A bill to create a fiscal safety net program for needy communities; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

TARGETED FISCAL ASSISTANCE ACT

● Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, today DAN EVANS and I are introducing a bill to establish a new program of "targeted fiscal assistance" for local governments. Representatives BOB MCEWEN, JOHN CONYERS, and PETER VISCLOSKY are introducing a companion bill in the House.

Over the years, our failure to use the Federal grant system effectively to address disparities in State and local fiscal capacities has been a basic failing in our intergovernmental partnership. This is a responsibility which central governments have long assumed in every other major Federal system. Today, as we stand on the verge of a fundamental restructuring of our budgetary priorities, the need to assure a minimum level of basic public services nationwide can no longer be ignored.

Over the next few years, State and local governments will confront a tremendous challenge: To provide basic and essential services to their citizens during a period marked by limited and declining resources. Deficit reduction has a price, and I'm afraid that price will include eliminating or drastically cutting many of the programs that have formed the basis of our intergovernmental partnership over the past decade.

These are programs that have enabled the national, State and local governments to work as partners in the delivery of important public services such as highways and bridges, schools and hospitals, health care for the poor and elderly, education and job training for the disadvantaged, cleaner air and water, and public housing—to name just a few. I'm afraid that many of these programs will receive deep reductions in the next few years.

And the fact of the matter is, these programs have already taken it on the chin. Since 1981, a "De Facto New Federalism" has been occurring as the national Government has struggled to get a hold on the deficit by reducing domestic spending. Federal aid as a percentage of State and local revenue has been declining since its highpoint in 1980. In that year, Federal aid equaled 31.7 percent of all State and local own-source revenue. By 1984, this figure had fallen to 23.7 percent and in 1986 it is expected to be around 20 percent—a decline of 38 percent since 1980.

Put another way, defense expenditures have increased 43 percent over the past 5 years, and entitlements have grown by 24 percent. Meanwhile, Federal aid to State and local governments has been cut more deeply than any other segment of the Federal budget: Down 25 percent in current outlays; down 25 percent in the number of programs; down 15 percent as a proportion of GNP; down 20 percent as a proportion of the Federal budget. And this is only the beginning. As the President has said, "you ain't seen nothin' yet."

Budget cuts are not the only challenge confronting State and local governments in the months and years ahead. They will continue to face more and more unfunded Federal mandates as we, in Congress, search for shortcuts to achieve what we are no longer willing to pay for.

This practice is hardly unprecedented. Since the 1960's, Congress has often found it easier and cheaper to rely on Federal mandates to achieve its goals, thereby directing the policies and allocating the resources of State and local governments. Although they seem like bargains in Washington, these mandates impose substantial costs. One study conducted in 1978 found that the total cost to local governments of six mandates averaged $25 per capita in seven jurisdictions—roughly comparable to the amount of funds received by local governments under general revenue sharing.

In short, State and local governments have had to shoulder new responsibilities and to pay for them out of their own pockets. Some can afford it. What they need is a smooth transition—time to adjust their spending and revenues to the new realities.

Yet some communities have no such options. In many rural areas, the property tax base is plummeting with falling land and market values, with the closure and declining profits of many farm-dependent businesses, and with increased rates of tax delinquencies. In many urban areas, the problems are equally severe. Nationwide, property tax rates averaged 37 percent higher in our central cities than in surrounding suburbs—before the cuts. Where are they to turn? The same is true of towns hit hard by closing mines or foreign competition. From Maine to Arizona, the issue is the same. Some communities lack the fiscal resources they will need to offer basic public services. Not for want of trying; it's a simple matter of arithmetic. Given the same level of tax effort, a low income community can only generate half the tax revenues of a high income community. For these communities, the loss of Federal aid means they will be forced to forgo or cut back on important and vital public services such as meals for the elderly, police and fire protection, and health care for the indigent.

Ironically, these developments come just when the President and Congress have agreed to terminate general revenue sharing. As one of the strongest supporters of GRS over the years, I have accepted that decision with great reluctance. In its time, GRS has been one of our best grant-in-aid programs. It has been virtually the only Federal program that seeks to lessen fiscal disparities among our local governments. It has been the most efficient program in the Federal arsenal; 99 percent of GRS funds go directly to recipients. Its "no-strings" grants to local governments allowed officials at the local level, the officials closest to the people, to determine the best use of the funds. For many local governments, it has been the single most important intergovernmental grant.

But the time for GRS has passed. The national Government no longer can afford to share revenues it doesn't have with wealthy cities and communities. Neither can it afford to neglect communities which are so crippled by Federal aid cuts, increased responsibilities and a declining local tax base that they can no longer meet the basic needs of their citizens. In this era of budget cutbacks, we have a responsibility to establish our priorities with the utmost care. But such national priorities include reducing fiscal disparities so severe that they prevent citizens from receiving basic public services. That need will be addressed by the program I am introducing here today called targeted fiscal assistance [TFA].

President Reagan has assured us all that he will never let solutions to the deficit erode our basic safety net for needy individuals. Programs providing food, shelter, and health services to our poorest citizens must be maintained.

Yet, a real safety net is more than direct cash and in-kind assistance to individuals. It also includes vital public services—police, fire, sanitation, public health and child protection—provided by local governments. And I firmly believe it is a responsibility of the Federal Government to help ensure that all citizens enjoy a minimum level of these public services. The Targeted Fiscal Assistance Program I am proposing will ensure just that.

TFA is a well-targeted program of general purpose grants to needy communities. Even with a moderate funding level of $2.3 billion, it will reduce the fiscal disparities between high-income and low-income governments by 20 to 25 percent. It will reduce the fiscal disparities that are responsible for the substantial differences in the level and quality of basic community services.

The formulas used in distributing these funds are based on need, tax effort, and fiscal capacity. They are designed so that the greatest proportion of a State's allocation will go to poor rural and urban communities, particularly those that have above average tax effort relative to resources.

While over 80 percent of the communities that received funds under general sharing will also receive funds under the Targeted Fiscal Assistance Program, the relative distribution of funds within a State will be altered dramatically. Wealthy communities, defined as those whose average per capita income 25 percent or more above the State average will not be eligible to receive funds. Communities with low-fiscal capacity but high tax-effort can receive up to twice the average State per capita grant. Finally, small "paper" governments which provide virtually no services will not receive funds.

Mr. President, the realities we face today are clear. Less money. Less Federal involvement. Tougher choices. Tougher competition.

To many, the future looks much less clear. There are those who find the old ways comfortable. The old intergovernmental relationships we had may not have been perfect, but all of us knew what was expected of us.

But if we are to act responsibly—if we are to shape the future—we cannot stand in the wings. We must go forth to meet the challenges we face.

Targeted fiscal assistance can help us in this quest.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the bill be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2037

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled.

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Targeted Fiscal Assistance Act of 1986".

SEC. 2. FINDINGS AND PURPOSES.

(a) FINDINGS.—The Congress finds and declares that—

(1) with the same level of tax effort, high fiscal capacity communities can generate twice the tax revenues of low fiscal capacity communities;

(2) such unevenness in revenue raising ability is responsible for substantial differences in the level and quality of basis community services such as public safety, emergency services, assistance to the homeless, indigent and elderly public health, and transportation;

(3) low-income communities generally have higher concentrations of poor individuals who have above average needs for public services and place additional burdens on local governments;

(4) these communities are further burdened by the numerous, unfunded Federal mandates with which they must comply;

(5) it is a responsibility of the Federal government to help ensure that all citizens enjoy a minimum level on basic public services;

(6) it is in the national interest to strengthen the weaker partners in the Federal system by lessening the fiscal disparties that exist among communities;

(7) overall, the current system of Federal aid is only mildy targeted to needy communities and does little to lessen fiscal disparities; and

(8) a well-targeted program of general purpose local fiscal assistance, with a moderate funding level, could reduce fiscal disparities between high-income and low-income local governments by 20 to 25 percent.

(b) PURPOSE.—It is the purpose of this Act to establish a program that will—

(1) reduce fiscal disparities among local governments, and

(2) ensure that all communities can provide their citizens with a safety net of basic public services, by providing general purpose fiscal assistance to needy communities.

By Mr. WALLOP (for himself, Mr. DURENBERGER, and Mr. ZORINSKY):

S.J. Res. 262. Joint resolution to authorize and request the President to issue a proclamation designating June 2 through June 8, 1986, as "National Fishing Week"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL FISHING WEEK

● Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, today I am introducing a Senate joint resolution requesting and authorizing the President to proclaim June 2 through June 8, 1986, as "National Fishing Week."

Current leisure activity studies show that the second most popular form of recreation among American adults is fishing. In my family it is the most popular recreation. We rejoice in it. We rejuvenate by it. We anticipate it. This finding is not surprising in light of the wealth of personal and family-oriented benefits associated with fishing. An outdoor activity available to all ages, physical abilities, and income levels, fishing rewards the spirit as well as the body. In addition to providing a readily available source of relaxation and healthful protein-rich food, sport fishing also supports a large and complex commodities and service industry. Current industry figures show that demands for goods and services by sport fishing enthusiasts, estimated at 54 million participants in 1980, generate $25 billion in economic activity and employment for an estimated 600,000 individuals. Fishermen have traditionally shouldered the major portion of the cost of fishery resource development through license fees and specialty taxes. This private sector willingness to accept major funding responsibility for their recreational activities is to be applauded.

The Nation's fishing fraternity also includes the cadre of professionals that harvest the sea's bounties for public consumption. This fishing industry provides employment for an additional 300,000 individuals and supplies seafood worth more than $2.4 billion in direct sales.

The careful husbandry and diligent protection of our Nation's fisheries resources and the marine, freshwater, and estuaries habitats upon which they depend is a common concern shared by members of the fishing fraternity.

The fishing-related contributions to mental and physical health, family oriented recreational activity for all Americans, and heightened environmental conscience should be recognized and promoted through a special week of celebration and activity. As coauthor of the Wallop-Breaux Sport Fish Restoration Trust Fund Act, I'm proud to introduce this legislation. I urge my colleagues to honor the fishing public and the fishing industry of the United States by joining me as a sponsor of this resolution calling for the President to proclaim June 2 through June 8, 1986, as "National Fishing Week."●

● Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, I am proud to join my good friend and colleague, Senator WALLOP, in introducing this resolution to establish June 2 through 8 as "National Fishing Week."

We in this country can be thankful and proud of our outstanding natural resources, particularly our water resources which offer us a wide variety of recreational opportunities. Of all the water sports available to us, I can't think of one I enjoy more than fishing.

I know this is true of the people of Minnesota as well. Many of us grew up with a fishing pole in our hands. We have over 15,000 lakes, and tens of thousands of miles of rivers and streams in which to fish. And weather is no impediment to this pastime—as soon as the lakes are frozen, fish house communities appear overnight.

Over 2 million Minnesotans of all ages, nearly half our population, enjoy fishing each year. Minnesotans don't take their fishery resources for granted, they have made a substantial commitment and investment in managing their resources for the use and enjoyment of present and future generations. It is in our best interest to manage our lakes, rivers, and streams and keep them well stocked, for fishing activities generate nearly $700 million a year in economic activity.

I believe it is more than appropriate to set aside a week as National Fishing Week. Minnesota has already established a Kids Fishing Weekend, where any parent can fish free if they are with kids under 16 years of age. I hope that many States and local governments, as well as private organizations, will engage in activities to not only celebrate this great American pastime, but to renew and reaffirm our commitment to conservation so that future generations will know the pleasure we get from casting a line on a cool summer morning.

Mr. President, it has been said that fishing is an art worthy the knowledge and patience of a wise man. As an avid fisherman, I would have to say that is true. I urge my colleagues to join us in sponsoring this resolution and hope it will see early Senate action.●

(2) changes in the laws within their jurisdiction to provide for the payment of amounts withheld pursuant to section 252(a)(6)(C)(1) of the Balanced Budget and Emergency Deficit Control Act of 1985.

● Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, in a few days President Reagan will promulgate an order that cuts funding for many Government programs in order to reduce spending for this fiscal year by $11.7 billion. Under other circumstances, we would applaud such a reduction in our deficit as a step in the right direction—toward fiscal responsibility. Unfortunately, no such praise is in order. Instead, the mandatory cuts represent a failure to legislate. They epitomize the abdication of congressional responsibility represented by the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings, budget amendment. But Gramm-Rudman-Hollings also gives Congress the chance to regain its authority over Federal spending. Today, I join with the senior Senators from Vermont [Mr. STAFFORD] and Connecticut [Mr. WEICKER] in offering an alternative to the impending sequestration order.

Halfway through this Congress, many Members are just beginning to appreciate what we have done. It brings to mind another halfway point that Dante described at the beginning of "The Inferno."

> Midway in our life's journey, I went astray from the straight road and woke to find myself alone in a dark wood. How shall I say

What wood that was! I never saw so drear, so rank, so arduous a wilderness! Its very memory gives a shape to fear.

It is not so much memory that gives shape to our fears as what is yet to come. Enacted in frustration and desperation over the rising tide of Federal debt, Gramm-Rudman-Hollings locks in specific deficit targets enforced by automatic across-the-board cuts. This year the mechanized cuts are small compared to the devastating slashing necessary to meet next year's statutory deficit cap. We have gone astray, not in our goals, but in the method we are willing to use to carry them out.

Mr. President, today colleagues and I offer a resolution that allows the Congress to regain its footing and control over budget decisions. Our resolution activates the process laid out in Gramm-Rudman-Hollings for a legislative alternative to automatic cuts. It would substitute the deficit reduction compromises that we worked out in the reconciliation bill for the nondefense portion of the sequester order. I would leave the defense portion of the sequester unchanged.

Reconciliation represents a rational alternative to the sequestering process. While I do not agree with all of the provisions contained in the reconciliation bill, it has proven its mettle in the legislative process. The reconciliation bill emerged as a product of congressional committee deliberations. The full Senate spent 9 days debating the measure, adopting 31 of the more than 50 amendments considered. It passed the Senate by a margin of 93–6, and was approved by the other body as well. A conference committee reached agreement on every item referred to in our resolution. In short, reconciliation reflects the collective judgment of Congress budget priorities. By contrast, the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings sequestering inferno arbitrarily singes every activity within reach of the automatic torch. The virtuous and the less deserving are punished alike.

Under Gramm-Rudman-Hollings, reductions must come from defense as well as nondefense accounts. For this year, unlike future years, the law gives the President some flexibility to shape the defense reductions. He has protected from sequestration those defense activities he considers more vital and has assigned the reductions to other lower priorities.

Our resolution also restores the cost-of-living adjustment for retired civil servants and military personnel. This returns all Federal retirement programs to an equal footing.

Finally, our resolution exceeds the necessary deficit reduction requirements for this year. The entire proposal would reduce the deficit by over $13 billion, surpassing the President's $11.7 billion sequester order.

Good government is about making responsible choices. We must reduce the deficit but not at the expense of all else, including our ability to legislate responsibly. Adoption of this resolution will reaffirm congressional control over the Nation's purse strings, and will set a good precedent for the next fiscal year. Then, we will need all the ingenuity and foresight we can muster, to avoid truly draconian automatic cuts. We must not lose this opportunity to give the American people confidence that, when that day comes, we will be up to the task. Failing to do so, moves us closer to the gates of the inferno, where, according to Dante, the greeting reads, "Abandon all hope ye who enter here."●

● Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. President, the Balanced Budget and Emergency Deficit Control Act—the so-called Gramm-Rudman-Hollings bill—that the Congress passed last year includes a provision that allows the Senate and House a limited opportunity to substitute careful judgment for the automatic cuts that are otherwise mandated by the act.

Under the provisions of the statute, between the time that the President makes a sequestration order and that order becomes final a month later, the Congress can act to suspend the across-the-board cuts by passing a resolution that substitutes targeted reductions or revenue increases of a like or greater amount. I am here on the floor of the Senate this afternoon with my colleagues to sponsor such a resolution.

What we propose is that the Congress substitute the reconciliation savings that were developed last year for the across-the-board reductions that the President will order in the domestic budget next week. Our resolution does not touch the sequestration on the defense side. Those cuts would go into effect just as ordered by Gramm-Rudman and certified by the General Accounting Office.

But on the domestic side, the $4.9 billion in sequestrations that the President is about to order would be replaced by a reconciliation instruction similar to that adopted by the Congress in the first budget resolution for 1986.

Making this substitution is the most sensible thing to do, Mr. President. Although it was not ultimately enacted because of a dispute on the Superfund Program, Congress, worked long and hard to carefully craft the budget reductions included in the reconciliation package. Some of the savings that had been projected for 1986 have been eroded because time has passed, but completing reconciliation now would still achieve more in domestic savings than would be realized by going ahead with sequestration of domestic programs under Gramm-Rudman.

Mr. President, the projected deficit for 1986 is according to latest estimates $220 billion. And even though we get optimistic about economic performance every year as the President's new budget comes up to Congress, every year we seem to end up back at the $200 billion figure. By the requirements of Gramm-Rudman the deficit has to be down to $0 in 1991. And roughly half the savings will have to come from the domestic side of the budget. So if we take Gramm-Rudman straight up over the next 5 years, we will have to save about $100 billion in domestic spending.

But many domestic programs are protected from the Gramm-Rudman cuts. Or they are favored with special rules. When one examines the actual numbers, one finds that there is only about $106 billion available on the domestic side to bear the $100 billion in reductions. Everything else gets protected.

Mr. President, there is in reality no way that the Congress can just step back and put the budget of the U.S. Government on the automatic pilot that is contained in Gramm-Rudman. It would mean the virtual abolition of much of the Federal Government—the Department of Education is not protected. The Environmental Protection has no special rule. Superfund and highways and the Interior Department and the Congress itself are all subject to the cuts of Gramm-Rudman. To successfully resolve the budget problems that we face will require that we step in and make difficult choices. Yes, there will be cuts. But all programs should be subject to scrutiny. And there may also be revenue increases to fund the programs that the American public demands of government. Raising taxes is a tough step to take.

But we are going to have to take those steps because without Congress making some choices, Gramm-Rudman will sequester a vast array of necessary activities on the domestic side of the budget. We begin the process of reasserting the congressional role in the budget process with this resolution today.●

● Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I rise today to join Senator MATHIAS and Senator STAFFORD in offering an alternative to the February 1 automatic sequester order for fiscal 1986 Federal spending. This resolution differs from the sequester order by substituting the reconciliation bill for domestic across-the-board cuts. The defense portion of the sequester order would remain unchanged. The reconciliation bill has great support in both the Senate and the House despite differences on a few provisions.

Mr. President, I support this resolution because it shows that the Congress can cut the deficit in a responsible way. The most troubling provision of the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings legislation is the automatic across-the-board reduction that would begin if Congress did not meet either the law's deadline or deficit target. This across-the-board mentality is an abrogation of our legislative responsibility to set priorities for the Nation.

By replacing the 1986 sequester order with the reconciliation bill, we accomplish reductions in Federal outlays, but we do so in a manner that reflects priorities decided by Congress. Unfortunately, this is not the way a sequester order works. It reflects no priorities. It demands no choice. It simply and wrongly treats all Federal programs as equal.

Now I know, Mr. President, and we all know that this first scheduled sequester under Gramm-Rudman-Hollings is minor surgery compared to the amputations that have been predicted for September when the Congress and the President are at a standoff on a budget resolution. A second sequester order will kick in with cuts on the defense side somewhere around 18 percent and on the domestic side 25 percent. But, as my colleagues well know, there will not be blind acceptance of these cuts at either end of Pennsylvania Avenue. Tough choices, like the ones in the reconciliation bill, will be forced upon us.

As chairman of the Labor/Health and Human Services/Education Subcommittee, I will soon begin hearings on the fiscal 1987 budget. Without even the benefit of those formal hearings, I can tell you that the fiscal 1986 sequester order is already causing hemorrhaging in the programs that service the elderly, the retarded, and the disabled. Mr. President, these programs are vital, and I believe that they are supported by a majority of Americans.

Given this framework, why must they be treated the same as energy programs? Why must they be cut while Social Security remains untouched?

I believe the American people are willing to pay for those programs that are important to them. If my colleagues will remember the day, October 10, when the Senate originally passed the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings amendment, there was a series of votes concerning specific ways to reduce the deficit. Not one of those passed. There has been some speculation in the press that the vote of this body to cut spending automatically will come back to haunt the Congress. I disagree. What could come back to haunt Congress and the Nation is the inability to pick and choose among specific programs.

Mr. President, our work cannot be done by default. We must be innovative and courageous. We need to set certain priorities as we have for fiscal 1986 in the reconciliation bill and stick to them. Then we will once again be fulfilling the responsibilities of the legislative branch of government and the American people will applaud our efforts. ●

SENATE RESOLUTION 318—URGING THE INTERNATIONAL ASTRONOMICAL UNION TO NAME SEVEN OF THE MOONS OF URANUS IN HONOR OF THE SEVEN CREW MEMBERS OF THE "CHALLENGER" SPACE SHUTTLE

Mr. BAUCUS submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation:

S. RES. 318

Whereas the Voyager 2 spacecraft recently discovered ten additional moons orbiting the seventh planet in the solar system, Uranus;

Whereas this discovery resulted from over twenty-five years of manned and unmanned space exploration, whereby many Americans have dedicated their skills and risked their lives to benefit all mankind;

Whereas on January 28, 1986 the mission of the space shuttle, Challenger, was tragically terminated, ending the lives of the seven astronauts aboard: Christa McAuliffe, Francis Scobee, Michael Smith, Judith Resnick, Ronald McNair, Ellison Onizuka, and Gregory Jarvis;

Whereas the Nation remains shocked and stunned at the loss of these seven brave astronauts;

Whereas the memory of the seven heroes should be memorialized in a way that remainds us of their courage and their quest to explore space to benefit all mankind; and

Whereas it has been the respected international tradition that newly discovered moons, planets and comets be named by the International Astronomical Union; Now, therefore be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the Nomenclature Committee of the International Astronomical Union take such action as is necessary to name seven of the ten moons discovered by the Voyager 2 spacecraft, which are currently designated as 1985 U1 and 1986 U1 through 1986 U9, in honor of the following seven crew members of the Challenger space shuttle who died so tragically on January 28, 1986:

(1) Francis R. Scobee,
(2) Michael J. Smith,
(3) Gregory B. Jarvis,
(4) Ellison S. Onizuka,
(5) Christa McAuliffe,
(6) Ronald E. McNair, and
(7) Judith A. Resnick.

And be it further Resolved, that the Secretary of the Senate shall convey this Resolution to the American Astronomical Union and ask their assistance in carrying out this memorial.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, on January 28, 1986, our entire Nation was brought together by a tragedy that still seems incomprehensible 2 days later.

The space shuttle Challenger, embarking on its 10th mission into the heavens, exploded—ending the lives of seven courageous astronauts.

The shock and sadness that we all felt on Tuesday has not lessened.

We grieve the loss of those seven lives.

Our hearts go out to the families of the astronauts, who have suffered through a private event in a very public way.

The pain that we feel for them extends to the school children throughout the Nation who witnessed the tragedy on television.

There is so much we want to say, and yet words fail us.

Mr. President, today I am proposing a resolution to memorialize the seven heroes whose lives were taken 2 days ago.

My resolution calls for the naming of seven of the newly discovered moons of the planet Uranus for the seven men and women who died aboard the space shuttle Challenger.

I believe this is a fitting reminder of their courage and their quest to explore space for the benefit of all mankind.

I would like to point out that it has been the respected international tradition that newly discovered moons, planets, and comets be named by the International Astronomical Union.

But the naming of celestial bodies is a lengthy procedure. My resolution recommends to the International Astronomical Union that seven of the newly discovered moons of Uranus be named in the interim period as follows: McAuliffe, Scobee, Smith, Resnick, McNair, Onizuka, and Jarvis.

My resolution proposes that these will be temporary names until the permanent names are chosen by the IAU. It is also the intention that these names be permanent.

I hope that my colleagues will join me in this resolution in memory of the brave men and women of the space shuttle Challenger.

On page 19, insert before line 1 the following new section:

SEC. 111. (a) The Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new title:

"TITLE VIII—PROTECTION OF AFFECTED REGIONS AFTER IMPLEMENTATION OF THE SECRETARY'S PLAN

"DEFINITIONS

"SEC. 801. (a) For purposes of this title—

"(1) the term 'affected region' means any State, county, port or port district in which any dominant railroad is the only railroad—

"(A) owning or controlling trackage rights into such region; or

"(B) carrying in excess of 80 percent of the total interstate rail freight in such region;

"(2) the term 'alternative railroad' means any railroad that desires and is capable of providing railroad transportation in an affected region, but lacks necessary trackage rights;

"(3) the term 'dominant railroad' means—

"(A) the Corporation or Norfolk Southern Corporation after the date of implementation of the Secretary's Plan pursuant to section 401(a)4) of this Act and the sale of the interest of the United States in the common stock of the Corporation to Norfolk Southern Corporation pursuant to section 401(a)(5) of this Act; or

"(B) any corporation created by Norfolk Southern Corporation as a result of such implementation and such sale, which, acting jointly or severally, operates as a railroad in an affected region, and owns or controls all trackage rights into such region or carries in excess of 80 percent of the total interstate rail freight in such region; and

"(4) the term 'governmental authority of any affected region' means any governmental authority authorized by appropriate State law, Federal law, or agreements between or among States to maintain legal actions on behalf of an affected State, county, port, or port district.

"PROTECTION OF AFFECTED REGIONS

"SEC. 802. (a)(1) The governmental authority of any affected region may file a complaint in the United States district court for any district in which such affected region is located, seeking an order granting trackage rights into such region for any specified alternative railroad. All relevant dominant railroads shall be named as defendants in such complaint.

"(2) The court may grant the relief sought by the complaint if the plaintiff governmental authority establishes, by a preponderance of the evidence that—

"(A) the specified alternative railroad sought in good faith to negotiate an agreement with the defendant dominant railroad pursuant to section 11343(a)(6) of title 49, United States Code;

"(B) such negotiations were not successful; and

"(C) granting of the trackage rights sought in the complaint is practical and will not unreasonably impair the operations of the defendant dominant railroad over the affected rail lines.

"(3) If the court determines that the plaintiff governmental authority has met its burden under subparagraphs (2) (A) and (B) of this subsection, but not with respect to subparagraph (2)(C), the court shall prescribe such lesser amount of trackage rights, if any, that plaintiff by prepondenance of the evidence establishes is practical and will not unreasonably impair the operations of the defendant dominant railroad over the affected rail lines.

"(b) The court shall establish the terms of any traffic rights ordered under subsection (a). The terms shall include such payment to the defendant dominant railroad by the specified alternative railroad that provides adequate compensation for the use of the affected rail lines. Adequate compensation shall include a fair contribution to the profits of the defendant dominant railroad.

"(c)(1) Operations by any specified alternative railroad pursuant to the grant of trackage rights under subsection (a) are contingent upon the execution of the defendant dominate railroad and any specified alternative railroad of an agreeement embodying all the terms established by the court under subsection (b). The court shall order the defendant dominant railroad to execute such agreement.

"(2) The agreement referred to in paragraph (1) of this subsection, upon execution by the dominant railroad and a specified alternative railroad, shall be exempt from the antitrust laws and from all other laws, including State and municipal law, as necessary to allow the parties to implement the agreement, in the same manner as an agreement made pursuant to section 11341 of title 49, United States Code.

"(3) The court which orders the grant of trackage rights shall have exclusion jurisdiction to resolve any disputes arising under the executed agreement referred to in paragraph (1) of this subsection.

"(d) The remedies provided for in this section shall not preclude any action or relief pursuant to the Sherman Act (15 U.S.C. 1 et seq.).".

METZENBAUM AMENDMENT NO. 1571

(Ordered to lie on the table.)

Mr. METZENBAUM submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to amendment No. 1437 proposed by Mr. DANFORTH to the bill S. 638, supra; as follows:

In lieu of the language proposed to be inserted, insert the following:

FINDINGS

SEC. 2. The Congress finds that—

(1) the Northeast Rail Service Act of 1981 (45 U.S.C. 1101 et seq.) provided for an orderly return of Conrail freight service to the private sector;

(2) the provisions of the Northeast Rail Service Act of 1981 were successful in removing Conrail's obligations beyond railroad freight service and in otherwise preparing Conrail for an orderly return to the private sector;

(3) acting under section 403 of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 (45 U.S.C. 763), the Board of Directors of the United States Railway Association twice found Conrail to be a profitable corporation;

(4) acting under section 401 of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 (45 U.S.C. 761), the Secretary engaged an investment banker and arranged, through open competitive bidding and negotiation, to sell the interest of the United States in the common stock of Conrail;

(5) the Secretary's Plan for the sale of Conrail provides for sale of the interest of the United States in the common stock of Conrail to Norfolk Southern Corporation;

(6) the Secretary found that sale of the interest of the United States in the common stock of Conrail to Norfolk Southern Corporation best meets the sale criteria of (A) leaving Conrail in the strongest financial position after the sale, (B) preserving patterns of service to shippers and communities in the region Conrail serves, and (C) maximizing return to the Federal Government consistent with the criteria specified in clauses (A) and (B);

(7) amendments to the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 (45 U.S.C. 701 et seq.) and related laws are needed to permit the sale of the interest of the United States in the common stock of Conrail to Norfolk Southern Corporation and to permit cancellation of the interest of the United States in Conrail debt and preferred stock; and

(8) the Secretary's Plan satisfies the requirements of the Northeast Rail Service Act of 1981, including the intent, goals, and objectives relating to the sale of the interest of the United States in the common stock of Conrail and the requirements of section 401(e) of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 (45 U.S.C. 761(e)).

PURPOSE

SEC. 3. It is therefore declared to be the purpose of the Congress in this Act to return Conrail to the private sector by directing and facilitating implementation of the Secretary's Plan for the sale of the interest of the United States in the common stock of Conrail.

(b) Section 102 of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 (45 U.S.C. 702) is amended—

(1) by redesignating paragraphs (6) through (18) as paragraphs (7) through (19), and paragraphs (19) through (21) as paragraphs (21) through (23), respectively;

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

THE CHILEAN HUMAN RIGHTS COMMISSION

● Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, the Chilean Human Rights Commission was founded in 1978 by Dr. Jaime Castillo and other prominent Chileans from various fields seeking a secular human rights organization to monitor violations of human rights and to work to restore the rights guaranteed in the international human rights treaties that Chile has signed.

Since its founding, and despite the many obstacles placed in its path by Chile's military government, the Commission's accomplishments have been impressive. The Commission has established a network of human rights organizations throughout Chile. With the support of these regional groups, the Commission monitors the status of human rights and publishes monthly informational bulletins. The Commission is one of the most highly respected organizations in Chile and has been accepted as an affiliate of several leading international human rights organizations, such as: the International Commission of Jurists, Geneva; the International Federation of Human Rights, Paris; and the International League for Human Rights, New York.

The Commission's President, Dr. Castillo, served as Minister of Justice in the Christian Democratic government of President Eduardo Frei in the late 1960's and early 1970's. Maximo Pacheco Gomez, the Commission's Vice President since 1978, was the Minister of Education in President Frei's government and served as the dean of the faculty of law at the University of Chile in Santiago.

Since last August, it appears that the government of President Augusto Pinochet has intensified its pressure against the Commission and its affiliates. In August, Chilean police temporarily detained Dr. Castillo for reading a proclamation that reminded Chileans of their obligation and right to uphold basic human rights. More than 20 others associated with the Commission were arrested at the same time.

On November 29, the Commission's national offices in Santiago were raided, ransacked, and its documents were confiscated by armed plainclothesmen. One Commission employee was beaten so severely that she required hospitalization. This attack preceded by one week the visit to Chile by the United Nations Special Rapporteur on Chile, Prof. Fernando Volio of Costa Rica. This attack was just one of more than a dozen similar incidents in 1985 of plainclothemen attacking Chilean human rights defenders and ransacking their offices.

On January 15, Senator KENNEDY visited Chile to meet with representatives of the democratic opposition and Chilean human rights organizations. Upon his arrival at Santiago, he was confronted by a violent demonstration by members of the Independent Democratic Union, a pro-Pinochet group. Chilean police did not act to restrain the demonstrators and Senator KENNEDY was forced to leave the airport by helicopter. At the same time, three of the Commission's leaders were approaching the airport and were themselves attacked by UDI demonstrators. Their car was damaged and Dr. Castillo was injured. Once again, Chilean police stood aside and did nothing while the attack was underway. It now appears that high-ranking officials of the Chilean Government were actively engaged in the planning and the implementation of this demonstration. If this is true, President Pinochet's government owes Senator KENNEDY an apology and should conduct a thorough investigation into this incident.

Most recently, Dr. Pacheco and his family have again been the targets of harassment. At noon on January 18, Dr. Pacheco's maid, Rosa Espinoza Baeza, was abducted by plainclothesmen and driven to a remote location on the outskirts of Santiago. She was held and interrogated by her kidnappers for 14 hours, when she was returned to the center of Santiago on the morning of January 19. During Ms. Espinoza's interrogation, her kidnappers' questioning focused on Dr. Pacheco's contacts in the United States and on the January 15 visit of Senator KENNEDY to Chile. It is my hope that the Pinochet government will cease its attacks against the Chilean Human Rights Commission and that it will allow the Commission to conduct its important humanitarian efforts.

Mr. President, I ask that two articles on the Chilean Human Rights Commission as well as two summaries of attacks on the Commission be printed in the RECORD.

The material follows:

PROTEST HINDERS KENNEDY IN CHILE

(By Lydia Chavez)

SANTIAGO, CHILE, Jan. 15.—Senator Edward M. Kennedy, arriving here today on a tour of South America, was forced to leave the airport by police helicopter after dozens of pro-Government demonstrators blocked a highway.

Some of the protesters wore life preservers and carried photographs of Mary Jo Kopechne, who died in the Senator's 1969 automobile accident at Chappaquiddick. The demonstration was organized by the Independent Democratic Union, a party that supports the military Government.

The police, generally fierce with crowds, did little to hinder the protest.

The airport protesters were greatly outnumbered elsewhere by people who warmly welcomed Mr. Kennedy.

In a second incident later in the day, the Massachusetts Democrat's car was struck by a stone and eggs as he left a rehabilitation center after a tour. Jamie Castillo, the president of the Chilean Human Rights Commission, was injured slightly when a stone smashed the window of his car.

President Augusto Pinochet has refused to meet with the Senator, calling him a "enemy" of the people because of his sponsorship of a 1976 amendment banning military assistance to Chile and his strong criticism of the military Government.

"I am told that there are some people who regard me as an enemy of Chile," Mr. Kennedy said. "I am not an enemy of Chileans, I am an enemy of kidnapping, murder and arbitrary arrests."

The Senator, flanked by his sisters Jean Smith and Patricia Lawford, came here for a 24-hour visit.

In the last week, the Senator has met with the Presidents of Brazil, Uruguay and Argentina to talk about the foreign debt crisis that has thrown their fledgling democracies into recessions. In Argentina, he also met with political exiles from Paraguay.

Mr. Kennedy in his airport statement said he would be the first to support renewed aid if "Chile were once again to respect basic human rights." He added that Congress at one time or another has banned aid to Cuba, Guatemala, Nicaragua, Uruguay and Argentina because of present or past abuse of human rights.

The Senator met today with political leaders who recently signed a United States-supported agreement, rejected by the Government, that calls for a return to full democracy here.

Juan Francisco Cardinal Fresno Larrain, who supported the pact, declined to meet with Mr. Kennedy, saying his visit was political, but church sources said he supported the visit. But other church officials, including Raúl Silva Cardinal Henriquez, met with the Senator.

ACCOUNT OF INCIDENT AT SANTIAGO AIRPORT ON JANUARY 15 INVOLVING OFFICIALS OF THE CHILEAN HUMAN RIGHTS COMMISSION

(Source: International Friends of the Chilean Human Rights Commission)

On Wednesday, January 15, 1986, at approximately 10:00 am, three principal officers of the Chilean Human Rights Commission were assaulted by a mob. Jaime Castillo Velasco, President, Maximo Pacheco Gomez, Vice-President, and Gonzalo Taborga Molina, Director for International Relations were driving from the Santiago airport towards the city. They had gone to the airport to greet Senator Edward Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts, who has been a consistent and prominent critic of human rights abuses in Chile during the last decade. The purpose of Senator Kennedy's visit was to meet with Commission members and other human rights groups, church groups, and influential political and social figures, hear testimony of victims of human rights abuse and discuss, in general, the situation of human rights in Chile. Due to the hostile reception that the Senator received at the airport by nearly 500 student protesters of the Independent Democratic Union (UDI), the Senator had to leave the airport by police helicopter for security purposes.

Dr. Pacheco and Dr. Castillo in the front seats and Gonzalo Taborga in the rear, were driving together with a long line of existing vehicles slowly along the road from the airport. A crowd of highly charged protesters was chanting "Ted go home." One kilometer from the airport itself, and not quite 10 meters from a Carabinero station, one of the protesters spotted Dr. Pacheco's car and shouted, "Here comes Castillo and Pacheco." Within moments the Commission members found themselves surrounded by approximately 100 armed individuals, some reportedly students of the UDI, others belonging to different youth groups. The protesters, who were well organized, began to throw rocks, sticks and eggs at the vehicle, thus breaking all the windows. One rock struck Dr. Castillo in the back of the neck and bits of shattered glass cut his head, face and back.

During this entire incident civilian police officers of the Carabineros, standing close by, did nothing; they neither moved to protect the Commission members, nor attempted to break up the menacing crowd. In fact, according to the testimony of Maximo Pacheco, the protesters acted while the Carabineros were "absolutely passive." Dr. Pacheco believes that if he had been hit and did not advance the car, the crowd would have killed them.

However, the Commission members succeeded in escaping from the mob, and Dr. Castillo was quickly taken for medical treatment. The vehicle they drove is estimated to have sustained substantial damage.

The Chilean Human Rights Commission fears that similar incidents may happen again. On November 29, 1985, the national offices of the Commission were ransacked by armed intruders who beat an employee so severely she had to be hospitalized. In Chilean newspapers, the UDI's organizers stated that their actions of January 15 "met with great success" and that they were very satisfied with the results of the day.

Dr. Pacheco commented on the latest incident: "it is a sad state of affairs when we cannot even greet an American Senator without risking our lives."

GUNMEN IN CHILE SAID TO STEAL RIGHTS DOCUMENTS

(By Robert O. Boorstin)

Armed gunmen in the Chilean capital of Santiago stormed into the office of the nation's leading human rights group and removed documents that had been compiled for a United Nations investigation, members of the group said this week.

The commission members said the assailants beat the wife of an employee of the Chilean Commission on Human Rights and ransacked the offices in central Santiago during the attack last week.

Human rights commission members and officials of the New York-based International League for Human Rights said that although they could not identify the gunmen, recent patterns of human rights abuses in Chile suggested that they might have been operating with the knowledge of the Government of President Augusto Pinochet.

"This is a special kind of harassment," German Molina, national secretary of the commission, said Wednesday in a telephone interview from Santiago.

GROUP LOGS RIGHTS ABUSES

The commission, established in 1978, is made up of prominent Chileans attempting to catalogue human rights abuses and seek judicial remedies.

Juan Prado, press attaché of the Chilean Embassy in Washington, said charges of intimidation by groups connected to the Government were "silly" and "stupid."

"I find absurd and completely devoid of logic," he said, "that anybody in his right sense of mind would commit such an assault in Santiago on the eve of the visit by a representative of the United Nations."

The visit by the investigator, Prof. Fernando Volio, would mark the first time in the six-year history of the special investigator's position that the Pinochet Government had agreed to permit a United Nations investigator to go to Chile to collect information on human rights. Mr. Volio is a former Foreign Minister of Costa Rica.

In a telegram to General Pinochet on Wednesday night, the New York-based International Friends of the Chilean Human Rights Commission urged appropriate authorities to "undertake a full investigation and prosecute the perpetrators."

The recently formed group of former and current public officials includes the chairman of the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, Dave Durenberger, Republican of Minnesota, and is headed by former Secretary of State Cyrus R. Vance.

In a related development, the Reagan Administration urged the Pinochet Government on Thursday to accept the recommendations of the United Nations report by Mr. Volio. The report calls for increased protection for church and human rights activists, an end to the practice of internal banishment of anti-Government activists and the strengthening of judicial procedures.

ACCOUNT OF RANSACKING OF CHILEAN HUMAN RIGHTS COMMISSION OFFICE ON NOVEMBER 29

On Friday morning, November 29, 1985, at approximately 8:45 a.m. two men armed with revolvers rang the doorbell of the Chilean Commission for Human Rights. Marina Rodriquez, the 42-year-old caretaker (cuidadora) answered and was told that they had a letter to deliver to the secretary of the Commission, Bessi Saavedra. Sra. Rodriguez, who lives on the premises with her family, advised them that the Commission would not open to the public until 10:00 a.m.

The men then pushed her aside violently. One beat her with his fists and revolver causing a concussion. The other intruder went straight to the secretary's office. He broke down the door and destroyed the furniture within the room. He was allegedly searching for some "special document."

The caretaker's two daughters, 20 and 22 years old, respectively, tried to help their mother and carry her to the apartment in the same building. The men threatened them with death.

The two attackers then entered other Commission offices "searching for an employee" and proceeded to destroy archives and correspondence of the Commission. When they left, 25 minutes later, they took with them two private, confidential address-telephone books and three documents which the Commission planned to publish: "The Rights to the Physical and Moral Integrity of Individuals Under the 1980 Political Constitution"; "The Organic Law Regarding States of Exception"; and, "Terrorism, Antiterrorism and Human Rights".

Marina Rodriguez testified that while being beaten her attackers shouted "Now you will know the hand of the CNI." [The CNI, (Central Nacional de Informaciones, or the National Intelligence Agency) is the Chilean secret security police force identified by international organizations as the agency linked to torture and other human rights abuse.] To date, the police investigation of the attack on the Commission reported that this was a common crime, although nothing of material value was taken. Sra. Rodriguez is still hospitalized in the Costa Central Hospital in Santiago.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE 1985

● Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, this morning the Department of Commerce announced preliminary U.S. trade results for December 1985 and all of 1985. The news is not very positive. In December the U.S. trade deficit was $17.4 billion and for the year the trade deficit was $149 billion. This represents 116 and 20-percent increases over the comparable period of 1984, respectively. The deficit with Japan in 1985 was $50 billion, a 35-percent increase over 1984.

In the face of such a hemorrhage it is fair to ask if we are managing our trade correctly and how we can gain improvements.

Ambassador Yeutter has recently declared that the administration's trade policy rests on four pillars—free trade, fair trade, GATT enhancement, and monetary reform. In general this is a policy which I have supported and continue to support.

President Reagan and his administration are to be commended for their courage in keeping to a policy of open markets in the face of severe political pressure. Refusal to grant protection to the U.S. textile, shoe, and copper industries, in my view, was the correct approach.

On fair trade, again the administration is moving in the right direction. The announcement this fall by Ambassador Yeutter to self-initiate section 301 cases is an appropriate use of administration discretion. Secretary Baldrige's strike force actions on semiconductors shows that the administration is not going to wait until an American industry is destroyed before it begins to look at causation. I am especially heartened by the announcement that the administration will begin to hold negotiations on the Japanese aluminum cartel, a subject of hearings before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

I also give cautious support for an enhancement of the GATT, particularly a new round of trade negotiations. However, we must first assess the results of the 1979 Tokyo Round to determine how to proceed. A new round which does not address the problems of agricultural subsidies, services, and countries with persistent balance-of-payments surpluses would not be a step forward.

There is probably most support for the administration's final pillar, monetary reform, meaning the inflated value of the dollar. In the long run, reducing the value of the dollar will probably do the most to help American exporters. Already the G-5 decision of last fall is showing results. The dollar this week hit a 7-year low against the yen, closing below 200 to the dollar.

Perhaps the best trade news to come out of 1985 was the announcement by President Reagan and P.M. Mulroney of Canada that they expect to begin serious negotiations aimed at reducing trade barriers between our two nations. If the negotiations are successful, U.S. exporters will see a fall in Canadian tariffs, now among the highest in the industrialized world, and Canadian exporters would gain a more secure access to the U.S. market.

The most troubling aspect of our trade policy has been our inability to understand the nature of the Japanese trading system. On the bilateral front, 1985 was not a banner year. In spite of a year's worth of Moss talks and a decrease of 20 percent in the dollar, U.S. exports to Japan actually declined.

The situation is worse on the multilateral front, partially the effects of a closed Japanese market for the LDC's. In 1983 the United States ran a $27 billion deficit with the nonoil producing LDC's; Japan ran a $13 billion surplus. By 1985, that accumulation of Japanese surplus was over $20 billion and accelerating. The effects of this on the high debt LDC's are self-evident.

Of particular importance is the need to develop a policy on the Japanese trading system in the GATT context. The results of the Tokyo Round of trade negotiations showed that Japan improved its term of trade, exports as a percent of total, with all its trading partners—the United States, Canada, the EC, OECD, LDC's, even the world. A repeat of this pattern in the new round of trade negotiations is unacceptable.

Turning to our legislative agenda on trade, we made an important first step in the passage of the farm bill in December. While this bill contains some controversial parts, on balance it should go far toward regaining foreign markets for U.S. agricultural exports.

President Reagan is expected to propose changes to American antitrust laws which will make American firms more competitive in the international arena. I look forward to examining this important proposal.

Making American firms more efficient is an important theme we must address. How the tax burden falls can make a big difference on competitiveness or whether it makes sense to move production overseas. The ITC is currently considering the effects of the House passed tax bill on these issues.

Finally, the major trade legislation to be considered by this Congress will be the bipartisan trade bill, S. 1860, introduced in November. The results of hours of work by Senators from both parties, I was pleased to see that the majority leader has pledged to assign it a high priority for floor action.

We have a problem on trade and it is getting worse. The administration has come a long way to meeting its responsibilities. It is time for the Congress to meet its responsibilities in 1986.●

SOUTH AFRICA: IMPRISONMENT UNDER THE PASS LAWS

● Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, in another one of its unusally well-documented and well-written reports, Amnesty International brings the sad reality of South African pass laws to the attention of the American people. The Amnesty International report, entitled

"South Africa: Imprisonment Under the Pass Laws," exposes South Africa's longstanding pass laws as the fundamental mechanism with which the unpalatable and discriminatory principles of apartheid are implemented.

South Africa is plagued by the disease of apartheid. An explosive tension mounts daily, threatening the Pretoria government and its apartheid system.

A constructive alternative must be found for the oppressive and destabilizing apartheid system in South Africa. Criticism is not enough. By understanding the mechanisms with which apartheid is enforced, we can better undertake the task of crafting a United States policy which places more direct pressure on the South African Government to abolish apartheid.

"South Africa: Imprisonment Under the Pass Laws" is an important contribution to the case against pass laws specifically and apartheid generally. I ask that the full text of the report be inserted into the RECORD, and suggest that my colleagues take the time to read "South Africa: Imprisonment Under the Pass Laws."

The material follows:

SOUTH AFRICA: IMPRISONMENT UNDER THE PASS LAWS

CHAPTER ONE: IMPRISONMENT UNDER THE PASS LAWS: INTRODUCTION

Each year in South Africa many thousands of black people are imprisoned under the so-called pass laws, which are discriminatory on grounds of race, existing only to control the residence and movement of the black population. In 1984, for example, some 238,000 people were reported to have been arrested under the pass laws or related legislation by police or by officials with similar arrest powers employed by the government department mainly responsible for black affairs, the Ministry of Co-operation and Development. Some were released after a short time without being brought to court but the vast majority were prosecuted in special courts for blacks known as "commissioners' courts", convicted, fined or imprisoned. Thereafter, in many cases, those concerned were "endorsed out"—sent to the African "homelands" which, though together they comprise only 13 per cent of South Africa, are the only areas in which blacks possess permanent residence rights, freedom of movement and rights as citizens. Under the South African Government's policy of apartheid, or "separate development", the remainder, some 87 per cent of South Africa's land area, is preserved for exclusive occupation by whites and the other minority population groups. Blacks, officially, are permitted in this larger area only as temporary so-journers and on licence while they meet the requirements of the largely white-run economy.

"Influx control" is the official description given to this long-established policy of the South African Government whereby the residence and movement of black people in "white" South Africa is regulated and controlled. The pass laws are its cutting edge. All Africans, from the time they reach their sixteenth birthday, are issued with a pass—it is officially termed a "reference book"—which they must carry on their person at all times. The primary statutory provision creating the obligation to have a pass or reference book amply demonstrates their discriminatory character:

"(a) being a Black who has attained the age of sixteen years, who

"(b) after the fixed date applicable to him is not in possession of a reference book issued to him . . . shall be guilty of an offense and liable to conviction . . ."

(Blacks (Abolition of Passes and Co-Ordination of Documents) Act, 1952). (Emphasis added)

The pass book contains, in addition to particulars identifying the person to whom it is issued, various "endorsements" which specify where the person may reside and is employed. The pass must be produced on demand to the police or relevant officials of the Ministry of Co-operation and Development, who daily carry out spot-checks on the streets of the main cities and towns. Failure to produce the pass on demand leads to immediate arrest. Similarly, it is an offence for any African who lacks the requisite qualifications to be there and so does not have the relevant endorsement in his pass to remain for more than 72 hours in areas prescribed for whites. This too results in immediate arrest. The penalty for both offences—the most common but by no means the only offences defined by the pass laws—is up to three months' imprisonment.

Those imprisoned under the pass laws are prisoners of conscience under Amnesty International's mandate—that is, "persons who in violation of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights are imprisoned, detained or otherwise physically restricted by reason of . . . their ethnic origin, sex, colour or language, provided they have not used or advocated violence."

In 1983, the International Council, Amnesty International's highest decision-making body, declared its total opposition to, and condemned, those laws and practices of apartheid which result in human rights violations within the organization's mandate. It called for a special program of action to be developed by the organization against such laws and practices. This report is a direct consequence of that call. The pass laws, judged by any standards, are flagrantly discriminatory in their nature and application and, more than any other laws and practices of apartheid, provide the context for systematic and extensive violations of fundamental human rights.

This report into imprisonment under the pass laws has been prepared over a period of two years during which Amnesty International sent two missions to South Africa to inquire into the use of the pass laws and related legislation. During these missions, which took place in April 1984 and May 1985, Amnesty International's delegates visited several urban centres and observed trial proceedings in respect of alleged pass law offences in various commissioners' and magistrates' courts. Amnesty International's legal delegate interviewed a wide range of informants in many parts of South Africa, including particularly officials and human rights activists, members of the Black Sash, a women's organization which has many years monitored the pass law system and assisted its victims, and, not least, individual pass law prisoners themselves. What emerged, as the report details, is that the pass laws do not only lead to the imprisonment of vast numbers of prisoners of conscience but do so by denying to the great majority the right to a fair trial and result in many being subjected during their imprisonment to cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment or else made available as cheap labour to white farmers under what is officially described as parole but in essence is closer to a system of forced labour.

Both Amnesty International missions to South Africa were undertaken by Kevin Boyle, Professor of Law at University College, Galway, in Ireland. He was accompanied on the first mission by a staff member of Amnesty International's Research Department. His report to Amnesty International follows this introduction.

In the months following the first Amnesty International mission in April 1984, the South African Government made certain changes with respect to the pass law courts at the recommendation of an important Commission of Inquiry into the Structure and Functioning of the Courts, under the chairmanship of Mr. Justice G. G. Hoexter. In particular, the judicial functions of commissioners with respect to pass law offences were transferred to magistrates, and magistrates' courts replaced commissioners' courts as the venue for trials of pass law prisoners. It was a primary objective of the second Amnesty International mission in May 1985 to evaluate the impact and significance of this change.

In his report to Amnesty International, Professor Boyle describes in detail the various legal enactments which have come to be known as the pass laws and the particular offences these define relating to the residence and movement of black people in South Africa. These laws, as the report shows, weigh heavily upon the whole of South Africa's black population, estimated in 1983 at more than 22 million people, and play havoc with their daily lives. They entrench the apartheid system and are designed to treat people as criminals for exercising their right to freedom of movement and residence in their own country. It considers also how the pass laws are viewed and administered by the authorities, and how they are enforced by the police, officials of the Ministry of Co-operation and Development and the courts. In many cases, the report suggests, the enforcement process is not only conducted arbitrarily but is based on an arrest process which, though extensively used, is unlawful and in conflict with the requirements of South Africa's Criminal Procedure Act.

The report devotes considerable attention to the trial process in the commissioners' courts as they functioned in 1984 and reviews the changes consequent upon the transfer of pass law trials to magistrates' courts later that year. With respect to the commissioners' courts, it notes that they processed very large numbers of cases of alleged pass law offenders and did so at startling speed. For example, the six commissioners' courts which sat in Johannesburg were disposing of, on average, some 350 to 400 pass law cases and 100 under trespass and curfew legislation on Mondays and some 200 cases per day for the rest of the week when observed by Amnesty International's delegate in April 1984. With few exceptions, defendants were not legally represented, were tried in a language which was not their mother-tongue and before court officials who, far from being independent, were employed by the government department responsible for black affairs. The trials were not, therefore, fair and conducted in accordance with internationally accepted legal standards. By May 1985, some improvements in the trial process had occurred as a result of the transfer or responsibility to magistrates' courts but these too, like the commissioners' courts before them, are deficient in several respects and are responsible for imprisoning black people on grounds of race.

The report is concerned also with the treatment of pass law prisoners once they have been convicted and fined or imprisoned by the courts. It has been estimated that some 30 to 40 per cent of those fined are imprisoned, at least for a period, because they are not able to produce immediately the money to pay the fine. The provisions of the South African Prisons Act make it particularly difficult to inquire into conditions of imprisonment and treatment of prisioners in South Africa's penal institutions. However, as this report shows, there is ample evidence to suggest that pass law prisoners are exposed to cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment while in custody. Many, however, are released under the parole system into the custody of white farmers for use as farm labour. In these circumstances too, cases of serious abuse have come to light over a long period.

The report concludes by describing the work of certain non-governmental bodies in South Africa concerned with the pass laws and by reviewing current developments on an official level on the future of influx control. It looks briefly at developments in Namibia, which remains under South African control and where a system of uniform identity documents has been introduced for all races in such a way that race classification and racially-discriminatory system of enforcement has been maintained.

In some respects, the attached report is broader in content and provides more background information than ordinarily appears in reports published by Amnesty International as it was prepared for the organization by an independent legal expert. It is being reproduced in its entirety because of the complex nature of the pass law system and its administration and because of the relevance of the information it contains to Amnesty International's mandate concerns.

Amnesty International has noted improvements in the judicial process with respect to pass law prisoners since late 1984 but considers that these are not sufficient to remedy the system of human rights abuse which derives from the nature and application of the pass laws and has become institutionalized under the South African Government's policy of apartheid. Consequently, while the organization welcomes such improvements as have been made, or may yet be introduced, to ameliorate the nature, scale and extent of human rights violations under the pass laws, it considers that such violations will continue because of the nature of the pass laws. To this end, Amnesty International advocates the early and total abolition of the pass laws as a necessary step to ending the imprisonment of black people on account of their race.

CHAPTER TWO: PASS LAWS AND APARTHEID

The origins of the pass laws

The exercise of control over African people through badges, documents, permits and permissions is neither a product of apartheid nor was it historically confined to South Africa.[1] The use of passes in South Africa can be traced to the mid-eighteenth century and to the control of imported slaves. A pass authorising travel was required in the Cape by slaves travelling within the settlement. In 1797 and 1809 new measures were introduced extending to Africans the requirement that they carry permits. All servant contracts had to be registered and it was a criminal offence to leave or desert service. The pass was the means chosen to enforce this servitude.[2]

Beginning with the Bantu Pass Law of 1867 in the Cape of Good Hope, different laws and ordinances in the various provinces laid the basis of the modern system of control of African lives through documents and the criminal law. From the discovery of diamonds in 1867, and later the discovery of gold, the use of pass laws with respect to black labour was associated with the mining industry as the industrial revolution in South Africa developed. One of the earliest of these proclamations was Number 14 of 1872, made for the diamond fields in Kimberley. It provided, with reference to Africans:

"Any person who shall be found wandering or loitering about within the precincts of any camp without a pass signed by his master or by a magistrate or justice of the peace, and without being able to give a good and satisfactory account of himself, may be arrested by any police officer or constable without a warrant and taken before the magistrate of the district, and shall be liable to be punished by fine not exceeding five pounds, by imprisonment with or without hard labour and with or without spare diet for any period not exceeding three months, or by corporal punishment in any number of lashes not exceeding twenty-five."

A historian has commented on this ordinance: [3]

"In this way was introduced the pass law system which endures in South Africa to this day. Under its authority masses of people were raided, rather than arrested, the largest number taken at one time being 286. Under it mass trials lasting an average of a few minutes have been held, with as many as fifty-six persons sentenced in one bloc, and in which the accused were seldom allowed even to record their pleas. The law governing passes was so involved that it was considered difficult for educated whites to understand. The 'raw' black from the country, who often arrived at the fields sick and emaciated after a difficult journey, was easily caught in its meshes."

The same author also notes, "[G]overnment as well as diggers profited from the new legislation as pass-law victims provided a source of income and a source of labour. They were put to work collecting night soil and digging graves at times without a doubt for their comrades who had died as a result of the arduous journey from the country. Blacks not only suffered under the constraints, they paid for maintaining them".[4] A similar observation seems appropriate today. A major source of revenue for the Development Boards which administer the pass laws comes from the fines paid by Africans for breach of those laws, an annual amount of over 1 million rands. Those unable to pay fines provide free labour to farms or clean government buildings, much it seems as it was in the 1870's.[5]

Following the Union of South African states in 1910 several official commissions of enquiry were to examine the operation of the pass law requirements which had developed in the different provinces.[6] These commissions conceded that passes were strongly resented by Africans, were highly complicated and were discriminatory. None however proposed that they should be abolished. All sought rationalisation and simplification of the system while arguing that its essentials—control of movement—should be retained. More recent commissions have equally failed to advise the abolition of passes and have sought similar rationalisation.[7] The basic principle justifying pass laws was articulated by one such enquiry, the Stallard Commission (1922),

"The native should only be allowed to enter the urban areas, which are essentially the white man's creation, when he is willing to enter and minister to the needs of the white man and should depart therefrom when he ceases to so minister".

For over sixty years this principle has dictated the influx control policies of successive South African governments. It has only been in the very recent past, following official acknowledgement of the inevitability of some permanent black urbanisation, that the principle has come to be modified.

With the coming to power of the Nationalist government in 1948 and the implementation of apartheid, the reference book became the major instrument of central government control of the African population. This was achieved with the passing in 1952 of the Black Abolition of Passes and Co-ordination of Documents) Act. This act did not, as its title might suggest, abolish passes but, according to the Minister introducing the measure, replaced the existing system of multiple local passes, with a single centrally issued, strongly bound 'reference book', which would be easy to carry and would enable the police to perform their duties more easily. The requirement to take out a reference book was extended to all Africans, men and women, over sixteen years of age. The final date after which it was an offence for Africans to be in possession of a reference book was determined as 1 February 1958 for males and 1 February 1963 for females. The act ordained that every African had to appear before a commissioner to be issued with a reference book. Fingerprints and, if thought necessary, palmprints, were to be taken by the commissioner and forwarded to a Central Reference Bureau. Certain categories, including black clergymen, lawyers and teachers, were exempted from fingerprinting and were to be issued with a reference book bound in a different colour to the book issued to others.

The imposition of this system of passes was strongly resisted at the time by the African population. Strikes, civil disobedience including the burning of reference books, marches and demonstrations against passes were vigorously suppressed by the state, culminating in the Sharpeville killings in 1960 when 69 Africans were shot dead by the police.[8] Protest about the resistance to the "dompas" ("stupid pass") has endured. Nevertheless, the same system of control based on the pass continues today as it has for almost two hundred years. Daily in the 1980s hundreds of African people are arrested, detained, prosecuted and punished in South African courts, often by imprisonment, for "failure to produce" their reference books when demanded to do so by a police officer or Development Board official.

Race classification and citizenship

A core feature of apartheid in South Africa is race classification. Under the Population Registration Act of 1950 every person on birth has to be classified in one of four racial groups, White, Indian, Coloured or Black. This classification determines all rights that may be exercised within South Africa and is basic to the theory of "separate development".

Footnotes at end of chapter 2.

The black population however is subject to further classification, which has crucial implications for the functioning of the pass law system. Under the Promotion of Bantu Self-Government Act 1959, and subsequent legislation, Africans were classified into ten separate "Bantu" peoples linked to native reserves, or "homelands", which were gradually given certain self-governing functions. The purpose of this step was to lay the basis for the policy of constitutional separation of the African population. The Bantu Homelands Citizenship Act 1970 marked a second stage in this process whereby every black person in South Africa was declared to be a citizen of one of the homelands, a designation incorporated in the pass book. The final stage of the process began when "self-governing" homelands became "independent" states. In 1976, under the Status of Transkei Act, Transkei became "independent" and all its citizens ceased to be citizens of South Africa. Similar developments occurred in Bophuthatswana, Venda and Ciskei in 1977, 1979, and 1981 respectively. As a result, all Tswana-speaking, Xhosa-speaking and Venda-speaking people are now foreigners within South Africa and possess passports rather than passes.[9] It remains the policy of the South African government that all of the remaining "self-governing" homelands should move towards "independence". The utlimate consequence of this policy as foreseen by the government is that there will be no Africans who are citizens of the Republic of South Africa.[10] Under South African law all will be aliens. The immediate consequences relevant to an account of the pass laws may be briefly summarised.

Three categories of Africans may now be distinguished: those who remain citizens of South Africa (while also citizens of "self-governing" states, for example, KwaZulu), those who have been denationalized and who are citizens of the "independent" states formerly part of South Africa (for example, Transkei), and foreign workers from the neighbouring states (for example, Mozambique). Each category has a different legal status within South Africa.

The category who remain citizens of South Africa have, or will continue to have, the possibility of acquiring "urban residence" rights (discussed below), and thereafter, under certain conditions, may bring family to the urban areas, may lease property and have certain employment freedoms. As the remaining homelands take "independence" this category will gradually reduce. The citizens of the "independent" states born before the date of "independence" are in a transitional category and for the moment have the same privileges as the first category. However, their children born after the date of "independence" of the relevant homeland are assimilated to the position of "foreign blacks". This third category, foreign African nationals, have no rights as such. A temporary permit issued to work in South Africa may be withdrawn without notice and without reasons given. Once the permit is withdrawn the worker can be deported at any time. They have no residence rights and are not entitled to bring family with them when in South Africa under an employment contract. All three categories are subject to the pass laws, without which this elaborate system of division and control would be impossible to police. But, in addition, the foreign African nationals and the "new" African foreigners are subject to the laws governing aliens, which include sweeping powers of detention without trial and of deportation or repatriation which are not reviewable by South African courts.

Group apartheid—Urban areas

A further central feature of apartheid is its physicial dimensions in terms of land and residence. As noted in Chapter 1, by virtue of Lands Act in 1913 and 1927, the territory of South Africa was allocated 87 per cent to whites and 13 per cent to blacks. The notion which was basic to this apportionment was that the black population had no rights by law to own land or to reside or to be in the declared white areas. Their place was in the reserves or homelands, now "Black States", except when requisitioned for employment. Strict residential segregation was and is enforced on Africans permitted into the white urban areas for employment. Different practices exist in the rural areas, but the theory remains that blacks are 'temporary sojourners' in the entire 'white' territory, rural or urban. The flow and the control of black labour from the homelands and from neighbouring states is administered through the reference book, permit or passport.

Under the Black (Urban Areas) Consolidation Act 1945,[11] as amended most recently by the Black Development Act 1984, and under the Group Areas Act 1966, urban areas are segregated according to racial group as are occupational activities within them. In particular, the 1945 and 1984 acts establish control over the residence of Africans as well as control of their movement and their behaviour within the cities. Under power in these acts are urban areas of South Africa are "prescribed"—that is, they are in effect "white" areas. Development Boards (formerly Administration Boards) are empowered to erect and fence off towns or townships, villages, and hostels for the black population, segregated from the white residential areas. Increasingly, new African residential areas are physically located at considerable distances from white areas (for example, Khayelitsha, some 30 kms. from Cape Town) or are located within the adjacent borders of the homelands (for example Bronkhorstpruit in KwaNdbele). Existing townships have likewise been incorporated into the homelands by the expedient of redrawing homeland boundaries (as proposed for Lamontville and Hambanati, Durban, both of which are scheduled for incorporation into KwaZulu). The freehold ownership and control of all residences erected within the segregated locations have been vested in the Development Boards but management of townships will be increasingly transferred to the new local authority councils. Since 1978, Africans with "urban rights" may enter into 99-year leases. By March 1982, however, only 1,831 such leases had been registered.[12] For the vast bulk of Africans rented accommodation is the sole source of housing that they can afford. Regulations of 1968 control in detail the lives of Africans in townships or locations.[13] A permit is required for residence in the black township which specifies who may reside there and if unauthorised lodgers are found on inspection, they may be summarily "endorsed out" or expelled from the city to the homeland. Single workers are required for the most part to reside in hostel accommodation, at least some of which is characterised by servere overcrowding and primitive living conditions.[14] Powers also existed under the 1945 act to expel "idle or undesirable blacks", "redundant blacks" (defined as "blacks in excess of the reasonable labour requirements" of the area), a power however which was never used; and blacks whose presence was "detrimental to the maintance of peace and order". These powers, other than those concerned with "idle or undesirable blacks", have now been abolished by the Black Community Development Act of 1984.

In the prescribed or white urban areas, prior permission to enter is only in law required for "foreign blacks". Other categories have permission to be in the city for up to 72 hours. Thereafter, their presence is unlawful unless they have express authority to be there endorsed in their passes or have earned a qualification for presence in that urban area. A much prized asset among the black population is a pass endorsed with a qualification allowing urban residence. Such a qualification is known as "section 10" rights, following the section of the 1945 Black (Urban Areas) Act allowing for this possibility, although it is a "right" which is more properly decribed as a privilege or concession, under South African law.[15] This section, which is introduced by the heading, Restriction of right of Blacks to remain in certain areas, provided as follows:

s.10 (1) No Black shall remain for more than seventy-two hours in a prescribed area unless he produces proof in the manner prescribed that—

(a) he has, since birth, resided continuously in such area; or

(b) he has worked continuously in such area for one employer for a period of not less than ten years or has lawfully resided continuously in such area for a period of not less than fifteen years, and has thereafter continued to reside in such area and is not employed outside such area and has not during either period or thereafter been sentenced to a fine not exceeding five hundred rand or to imprisonment for a period exceeding six months; or

(c) such Black is the wife, the unmarried daughter, or the son under the age of eighteen years, of any Black mentioned in paragraph (a) or (b) of this sub-section and, after lawful entry into such prescribed area, orginarily resides with the Black in such area; or

(d) in the case of any other Black, permission so to remain has been granted by an officer appointed to manage a labour bureau . . . due regard being had to the availability of accommodation in a Black residential area.

At 31 December 1984, some 3,888,187 Africans had "section 10" rights, either in terms of 10(1)(b), having been born in the cities or, in terms of 10(a)(b), having worked continuously there for either ten or fifteen years as provided, or having qualified under 10(1)(c) being the wife or dependent of a worker who had earned a 10(1)(b) qualification.[16] Such qualifications, until recently, could be forfeited if the person left the urban area where the qualification has been claimed and may still be forfeited if he or she is sentenced to a fine exceeding R1,000 or a term of imprisonment exceeding 6 months. "Section 10" rights are also lost if the person is deemed "idle or undesirable" under the commissioner's enquiry pursuant to section 29 of the 1945 act. A woman qualifying under section 10(1)(c), by virtue of marriage, loses that status on divorce, separation or death of her husband, and can be ordered out of the city. In May 1985, an amendment of section 10 was legislated, the first of many amendments since 1945 which enlarged rather than reduced the scope of that section. This amendment, which came into effect in June 1985 and was designed to increase the mobility of urban Africans, is discussed in the final section of this chapter.

Apart from those who have "section 10" rights, permission to remain in a prescribed area in excess of 72 hours can be granted by a labour officer for a particular purpose, for example, to seek work or to visit relatives (section 10(1)(d) permissions). As noted, nationals of neighbouring states (foreign blacks) have no right whatsoever to be in a prescribed area at any time (section 12 of the Urban Area Act 1945). However, written permission may be given by the authorities to enter. The act, in section 13, exempts certain classes of foreign workers from these restrictions, principally those lawfully in transit to the mines.

It is primarily through a combination of control of accommodation, including its availability, and control of employment under the Black Labour Act (discussed below) that the administrative system of influx control in urban South Africa is designed to work in theory. The coercive face of influx control—arrests, prosecution and trial for pass law offences—is directed primarily at distinguishing Africans "illegally" in white areas from those possessing the necessary qualifications. Many of these "illegals" are Africans from the homelands who, as the Hoexter Commission noted, feel compelled through poverty to flock to the cities despite lack of permission and accommodation.[17] The very large number of prosecutions of those illegally in towns and cities, which have increased rather than decreased in the 1980s, demonstrates both the human cost of influx control policies and that they do not work very well.[18]

Group apartheid—Rural areas

The presence, movement and residence of Africans in the rural areas of 'white' South Africa is subject to control by the state to the same, if not a greater, extent than in the urban areas. By operation of law, virtually all independent rights to tenure or occupation of farm land by Africans have been destroyed.[19] Africans can only lawfully be present in the rural areas as farm labourers or their dependents.[20] This situation has been progressively achieved through the impact of the Development Trust and Land Act 1936. This act establishes control over the numbers of Africans in the countryside by means of 188 Labour Control Boards and through labour liaison officers. An owner of a farm is prohibited from allowing Africans "to congregate or reside thereon" without the written permission of the Secretary of the Department of Co-operation and Development. Africans equally are prohibited from so doing or from occupying any dwelling. The Labour Control Board may institute certain enquiries to determine whether the number of black employees "is unduly large" taking into account "the nature and extent of the farming operations carried on by the owner . . . including the availability of non-black labour".[21]

Should an enquiry determine that there is an excess of Africans over labour requirements, it may order the farmer to eject them on pain of conviction and the Africans become in law squatters who may also be ejected summarily by the state. The mechanisation of agriculture and the consolidation of farms has led to a rapid fall in the demand for agricultural workers.[22] The Labour Control Boards provide a means for removing not only surplus labour from white farms to the homelands but also the retired, the elderly and the sick in the rural labour force. None would be thereafter permitted to move to the urban areas. It has been calculated that since the 1960s over one million people have been forced off white farms through these procedures.[23]

The Black Labour Act 1964 and the black labour regulations

This act, with its accompanying regulations of 1965 and 1968, established the means of control over the employment of black people in all areas.[24] The pass is central to its functioning. A complex system of labour bureaus exists across the country through which Africans seeking work are channelled. Black persons who have "section 10" rights may take up employment within the urban area in which they are qualified, subject only to the contract of employment being registered with the Labour Bureau. But for the bulk of Africans without a right to be in the urban area, the procedure is very different.[25] In the first instance, all black males over 15 years are required to register for employment in the homelands, at labour bureaus established there. Females who wish to work may also register. The labour officer classifies each for a particular category of employment stamped in the pass. One of the features of this system is that once categorised, for example, "farm labourer" in the reference book, a young person may be required to remain as a farm labourer. He cannot change that designation without the concurrence of the labour officer. Efforts to take up employment in the city would be futile because the pass is already stamped "farm labourer" and he could not be registered for urban employment. A farm labourer will not in practice be allowed to change to urban employment without the consent of both the farmer who employs him and the agricultural union for the area.[26]

To obtain lawful employment in an urban area, an employee must be requisitioned through a municipal labour bureau, by an employer, or recruited by a labour agent. A contract has to be entered into, attested and registered at the labour bureau for the area in which the recruitment took place. Ordinarily, the contract of employment may be for no longer than 12 months at which point the employee is required to return to the homeland to renew it. By and large, women are blocked from employment in the prescribed areas or cities by the Labour Regulations. The system established, therefore, is a migrant labour system of males who are directed and controlled in their employment through the Labour Bureaus.

The municipal labour officer has power to require a black worker to be medically examined at any time, and may refuse to sanction employment if the worker is not "passed health and vaccinated" by a medical officer, or if there is not available suitable accommodation. He may also refuse to sanction the contract if a suitable unemployed African with "section 10" rights is available. The lawful basis of entry by the African employee into the prescribed area is section 10(d) of the Urban Areas Act 1945, discussed above. A worker lawfully permitted under section 10(d) to be in an urban area may ultimately qualify for "section 10" rights, for example, after 10 years' continued employment with the same employer. The requirement that the contract of employment be not longer than 12 months, and that to renew it a worker had to return to the homeland labour bureau, had been introduced in 1978 to prevent a migrant worker acquiring the necessary uninterrupted 10 years' continuous residence. This policy emerged in a recent case, where the Appellate Division, the highest court in South Africa, ruled that the intermittent absence from an urban area by a migrant worker to renew a contract of employment did not interrupt residence, and that after 10 years a migrant worker would be entitled to permanent residence rights.[27] This decision resulted in a large number of migrant workers becoming formally entitled to urban residence rights under section 10 of the 1945 act. However, as a result of legislative amendments in 1983, their consequential right to bring families to the cities is contingent on purchasing suitable accommodation.[26]

"Insiders" and "outsiders": Influx control reform proposals—Black commuter labour

A further aspect of the use of housing to control movement was the decision in the 1970s to freeze the growth of black townships in 'white' areas, and the forced location of further growth within the borders of the homelands. With this has been coupled a decentralization strategy of industrial development with efforts to site new industry in or at the borders of these homelands.[29] In this way, Africans can work in South Africa and travel home to their own "country" at night.

These policies have given rise to the phenomenon of commuter labour, a present day complement to the migrant labour system. In 1984, over 600,000 commuters had to travel and return daily from the homelands, "independent" and "self governing", to work in South African cities.[30] The "border" commuters from KwaZulu travel to work in the Durban-Pinetown-Pietermaritzburg area, commuters from Bophuthatswana travel to the Pretoria-Witwatersrand-Vereeniging area and workers from Ciskei commute to the East London-Kingwilliamstown region.[31] Speaking of Ciskei and KwaZulu, a government planner said:

"[The commuting policy] has been planned like that. Now [the people] live in their fatherland under their own country's laws and governed by their own traditions and language and they want to stay there because they can live together with their people, they can participate in their government. And outside their country they can't have that".[32]

For a very large percentage of these people, the homeland policies introduced under the Government's apartheid system impose enormous burdens of travelling time. Currently, 400,000 of these "border" commuters travel more than 30 kilometres per day; twenty per cent travel between 3.5 and 7 hours per day or an average 4.5 hours per day which is equivalent to more than half of an average working day.[33] A study of KwaNdebele residents discovered that:

"[M]any spend between five and eight hours daily commuting between their homes and their workplaces around Pretoria and Brits. Buses leave their depots some 130 kms. east of Pretoria to pick up their first passengers at around 2.30 am. by 3am the buses are often full and by 4.00 am most of the standing passengers sit on the floor in quest of a place to snooze."[34]

Official attitudes remain complacent. A senior administrator of influx control, Mr. Louis Kok, has been quoted, for example, by one researcher as saying:

"If someone wants to make use of work opportunities and commute to Johannesburg then he can commute, then he can ride on the buses but no-one forced him to do it."[35]

What this official failed to mention, however, is that people did not choose to live in scattered and isolated settlements in homelands, far from employment. They are in most cases legally compelled to reside in such areas.[36]

Influx control reform

The last decade in South Africa has been characterised by the coincidence of the most vigorous period in the implementation of traditional apartheid policies alongside an equally unprecedented questioning of them, not only at the popular level but in official and business circles.[37] In the result, there has been a confusing mixture of reform, repression and resistance culminating in the imposition of a state of emergency in many areas in the second half of 1985.

It is not possible here to account for these developments, only to focus on their effects on the future of so-called influx control. After a protracted period of public and private argument, it now appears that at governmental level there is new thinking. It has been accepted that the long-established policies of demographic manipulation, represented in the homeland and denationalisation policy, and in forced removals, pass laws and deportations, are no longer effective in preventing black urbanisation and require modification. The economic strategies of decentralisation, homeland development and border industries have equally failed to prevent African movement and African numbers rising in "white" South Africa. The migrant and commuter labour systems and the pass laws as the means for the maintenance of apartheid have increasingly come to be challenged, culminating in an official report published in 1985 which argues for their abandonment.

The Wiehahn and Riekert Commissions

It is generally accepted that revision in thinking on influx control dates from the publication in 1979 of these two official enquiries into labour legislation. Both had a common conclusion: the permanent residence of some of the African population in "white" South Africa had to be accepted and the theory that the black was a "temporary sojourner" required modification. In both reports, the emphasis was on the economic imperatives for a changed approach. There was a need to recognise the industrial demand for a stable and increasingly skilled section of the black working workforce and in turn to come to terms with the personal and social needs of that population if it were to be peaceful, content and productive.

The Wiehahn Commission recommended that the prohibition on black workers forming trade unions (a prohibition achieved by their being omitted from the definition of employee in the relevant labour legislation) should be removed. This, and a further recommendation that an industrial court be established, were gradually implemented by government.[38]

The Riekert Commission was established to study the manpower requirements of industry, which inevitably led to the study of the pass laws and the black labour legislation. In his report, Riekert first concluded that the reality of permanent urbanisation of black people had not only to be accepted as inevitable but a necessity for the future economic development of South Africa. In effect, this report repeated the similar arguments which had been made by the Fagan Commission in 1946, proposals that the Nationalist Party on coming to power in South Africa had specifically rejected.[39]

However, Riekert did not propose that controls on African mobility should be ended. Instead, his proposals were for a more efficient system less wasteful to industry in manpower hours than the existing one. It should also be possible to 'deracialise' influx control. The existing Urban Areas Act was:

"of a discriminatory nature because certain of its provisions, do not appear in legislation applying to other population groups." (para 6.14)

New legislation "would regulate the movement of all workers (White, Coloured and Black) from rural areas to urban areas and from independent states to the Republic of South Africa" (para. 3.600)

Riekert proposed that these "non-discriminatory" controls should be exercised through employment and housing rather than through mere presence and enforcement on the streets. Lawful residence in the urban areas would be linked to having registered employment and housing. In this way:

"It will be possible . . . to apply influx control more effectively than at present so that much of the bitterness and frustration caused by it can be eliminated . . ." (para. 3.600–3.601)

What the report failed to dwell on was the fact that there is no significant process of urbanisation of other populations since it is virtually complete in their cases, and effectively there is only migration from black rural areas. In addition, linking access to urban areas to approved housing was hardly non-discriminatory when, as Riekert's own statistics established, there was no shortage of white housing and only surmountable problems with other racial groups, whereas there exists a massive shortage for black people because of the deliberate policies of freezing the expansion of black townships.[39]

The report's other main recommendations related to the need for 'positive development of the urban and rural Black communities outside the Black states', including in housing, infrastructure and through encouraging local participation of the now acknowledged permanent black population. The basic thesis underlying the Riekert Commission's proposals, that a distinction should be drawn between the urban 'insider' black population and the rural 'outsider' population in the homelands, with strict policing through employment and housing of the movement from one category to the other, was accepted by the government, along with much of the other thinking in the report. Various features of these policies have been implemented in the last four years. A Black Local Authorities Act 1982, granted in principle local franchise to black urban residents and equal status to those authorities as white local government. A Black Community Development Act 1984 established Development Boards to "promote the viability, development and autonomy of Black communities . . . and to promote the welfare of the Black person." The introduction of the 99-year leasehold scheme for black homes, and the Co-operation and Development Amendment Act 1985, were equally reforms based on Riekert proposals.

The latter act allows greater mobility of African urban workers: the "section 10" qualification for residence may now be earned by lawful residence and employment in more than one prescribed area. The act also reduced the qualifying period for an African employed by more than one employer from 15 to 10 years.

The 'outsider' part of the policy has also seen implementation. Under the Alien and Immigration Law Amendment Act 1984, for example, penalties for employing illegal 'alien' labour were massively increased to R5,000 or two years' imprisonment, or both. 'Alien' labour included workers from the "independent" states, the denationalised eight million Africans who are deemed citizens of these states and who are no longer South African citizens.

The most contentious aspect of the government's efforts to implement Riekert has been, however, over the mechanisms of influx control. In accepting the report the government, in a White Paper, noted:

" . . . the Government fully identifies itself with the Commission's conclusion that serious social problems would arise in the urban areas of South Africa affecting both the established urban population (White, Coloured, Asian and Black) and the new entrants, if a large scale influx of Black workers should take place uncontrolled. In this connection, therefore, the question to which both the Commission and the Government had to find an answer was not whether there should be influx control, but what the right mechanism for influx control would be in South African circumstances."[40]

The search for "the right mechanism" led first to one proposed legislative measure, The Orderly Movement and Settlement of Black Persons Bill, which was withdrawn while at Bill stage after a public outcry over its provisions. This bill sought effectively to impose a night time curfew during which blacks found in "white" areas would be liable to arrest, to end black people's rights to visit urban areas for up to 72 hours without permission and to make black residence in urban areas dependent upon the availability of accommodation. The latest legislative proposal is to introduce common documents of identity for all "population groups" by mid-1986.[41] Meanwhile, a Report of the President's Council Committee for Constitutional Affairs, while welcoming the proposed common identity document, has urged acceptance of "orderly" freedom of movement for the African population. The possible linkage between these initiatives was not clear at the time of completion of this study in late 1985. The President's Council's Report is, however, examined in more detail in a concluding chapter.

[28] Komani NO v. Bantu Affairs Administration Board 1980(4) SA 448(A), established the right of wives and children of section 10(1)(a) and 10(1)(b) people to remain with them. This right was cut down by an amendment of 27 August 1983 to section 10, which made it illegal for family of section 10(b) workers to bring their families to live with them in town unless they have approved accommodation. According to some analysts, the severe housing shortage throughout the state is the result of a deliberate policy over decades of not building new homes in the townships, which has only recently been reversed, and means that most qualified workers cannot find family accommodation or afford what is available.

[36] Apart from the costs in terms of health, well-being and family life which the burden of travelling imposes on African commuters, there is also its financial cost. Averaged out, each African commuter pays R1,000 per year on travelling to and from work. The total cost, 50% of which is subsidized by the state, has been estimated at $2,000 million in 1984. CHAPTER THREE: PASS LAWS AND PASS OFFENCES

The pass laws constitute an administrative regime which controls the movement and the employment within South Africa of all Africans, including citizens, foreign nationals and the new "aliens" from the homelands alike. In legal terms, the system is primarily one of administrative rule, which seeks to regulate every aspect of life for African people, and which necessitates entrusting wide discretionary powers to a very large number of officials, who in turn are subject by the legal order to a minimum or to no control over how they exercise such powers. The further distinctive feature of the pass laws is the almost countless number of offenses which have been created for failing to obey regulations or act as officials require. Only the most commonly prosecuted of these offenses can possibly be surveyed here. At the heart of the entire system, however, lies the personal identity document—the pass (or passport in the case of Africans from the nominally independent homelands)—which all Aficans, and only Africans, are compelled to have. Thousands daily are asked for these documents by the police or other officials, and hundreds daily are arrested, prosecuted, fined or imprisoned for not having them with them when demanded, or because they have lost them, or for not having them at all, or because the required qualifications, permissions or other entries are absent from the book. It is the nature of these common offences and the enactments in which they are to be found that are considered in this chapter.

This act was not, as noted in Chapter 2, a law to abolish passes, but rather was intended to introduce a countrywide uniform pass, and to take powers to extend the pass requirement to previously exempt categories, principally women. The act also introduced the term "reference book" instead of pass, but the usage "pass" and "pass book" has persisted and is pervasive in South Africa. The act provides that all Africans over the age of 16 years must be issued with a reference book, and it is a criminal offence not to possess one. Black children under 16 years of age also require identification documents issued by a commissioner if they are absent from home, or employed outside the home.

The contents of a reference book include: a photograph, identity number, address, ethnic group and homeland citizenship, particulars of employment required to be completed by the employer, drivers licence and tax details and endorsements such as "section 10" qualification, etc. The 1952 act also introduced the fingerprint as a means of checking the identity of black people of South Africa and from neighbouring countries. Fingerprinting is compulsory for Africans, but for no other group. Fingerprints which must be taken on the issue of a reference book are registered with the Central Reference Bureau in Pretoria, established under this act, and along with other particulars of identity from the reference book are stored in a computer.

Africans from the "independent" homelands have been progressively issued with (or have been forced to apply for in order to be registered as work seekers) identity or travel documents from these states. They are not entitled to reference books because they are not South African citizens (the 1952 Act, section 3 as amended). The identity documents acceptable include a passport or a permit to travel, as in the case of "foreign blacks". It is an offence to employ an African who is not in possession of a reference book or equivalent document (section 8 Bis).

An employer is required to record in the reference book particulars relating to the employment contact, and register it with the labour bureau. Until recently repealed, the employer had the duty to sign the reference book monthly. If 'such Black deserts from his service or if such contract is terminated' the employer must inform the labour bureau (the 1952 Act S.8). It is unlawful to employ an African if the reference book does not indicate termination of a previous contract (section 8(1)). These provisions are but a sample of the controls on Africans' employment freedoms maintained through the reference book.

Reference book offences

The Blacks (Abolition of Passes and Co-ordination of Documents) Act, 1952 ('the 1952') creates at least a score of offences connected with passes and identity documents, but the principal ones are the offences contained in section 15(1)(a)(i), (ii):

"(1) Any person—

(a) being a black who has attained the age of sixteen years, who—

(i) after the fixed date applicable to him, is not in possession of reference book issued to him;

(ii) after the fixed date applicable to him, fails or refuses to produce on demand of an authorised officer under section thirteen, a reference book issued to him;

. . . shall be guilty of an offence and liable on conviction . . . to a fine not exceeding fifty rand or to imprisonment for a period not exceeding three months;"

Under this provision, the most frequently prosecuted offence is failure to produce a reference book on demand of an 'authorised officer'. An authorised officer can be any one of a group of twelve different officials, but in practice is a member of the South African police, or a Development Board official. The use of the power to demand passes and its interpretation by officials has been a constant source of grievance for the black population since reference books were first introduced. What is in issue is the practice whereby the police require actual physical possession of the document at the time it is requested (usually on the street) and their practice of arresting a person who fails to produce it. This interpretation of the offence whereby it is converted into the offence of 'failing to carry' a pass, has been specifically rejected by the South African courts. In Ncube v. Zikalala 1975 (5) S.A., the Appellate Division stated that the offence does not require that "a black should always carry a reference book with him . . . it is clear that a black requested to produce his reference book should be given a reasonable opportunity of fetching his reference book somewhere if he does not have it on him at the moment".[1] An independent study of the pass laws (Monama 1983) confirms that this ruling has been ignored in the enforcement of section 15.[2] Amnesty International's delegate received numerous reports from concerned organisations during both missions in 1984 and 1985 that people continue to be denied opportunity to fetch passes, sometimes where the document was only a matter of yards away. Complaints of this nature were occasionally voiced in court in prosecutions observed by Amnesty International's delegate but were not commented upon by the commissioners.

The vulnerability of Africans to arrest for "failing to produce" is exacerbated by employers holding on to reference books when someone takes up employment, a practice which is depreciated by some commissioners, but with little apparent effect. One person interviewed by Amnesty International's delegate who was arrested and convicted under section 15 described being a victim of both these practices by police and employer:

"I was arrested on Tuesday 14 May at about 8.00 am. I was only a few yards from my place of work. What happened was that my employer took my reference book in order to register me in his employment. But he had it for weeks and did not do it. Europeans do that. They are not prepared to register black people immediately but want to see how you turn out as a good worker. My employer had again promised to register me the day I was arrested. I was asked for my reference book by a plain clothes policeman. I told him it was with my employer in the building just a few yards away. But he said that's no good, you have to come with me. I pleaded let me collect it and I will show I have one. But he just put me in the police truck. He didn't give me a chance to collect it. Later I pleaded guilty before the commissioner's court. The commissioner let me go but told me never to give my reference book to my employer. I lost three days work over this, and I can be arrested again in the street because I still haven't got the book."

Arrests for 'failure to produce' are discussed further in chapter 5, but it may be mentioned here that many of them are probably illegal arrests under South African law since they contravene the court ruling that opportunity should be given to fetch documents.

The offence created by section 15(1)(a)(ii) has a maximum penalty of R50 or three months' imprisonment in default of payment.

Offences connected with presence in a prescribed area

(a) Remaining in a prescribed area for more than 72 hours without permission:

Section 10 of the Black (Urban Areas) Consolidation Act 1945 (the 1945 Act as amended in 1952), which was considered in detail in chapter 2, makes it an offence for Africans, except those who have the requisite qualifications or otherwise have permission, to remain in a prescribed area longer than 72 hours. It provides:

"(4) Any person . . . who remains in any area for a purpose other than that for which permission so to remain has been granted to him, shall be guilty of an offence and liable on conviction to a fine not exceeding one hundred rand or in default of payment to imprisonment for a period not exceeding three months or to both such fine and such imprisonment or to such imprisonment without the option of a fine."

The equivalent offence for "foreign blacks", whom it will be recalled have no right at all to be in a prescribed area, is contained in section 12 of the 1945 Act. Additional offences are created connected with "introducing" blacks who are prohibited into prescribed areas (section 12) and employing blacks who are illegally in prescribed areas (section 11). These offences are aimed at the other races, and although contained in the 1945 Act, are prosecuted in the ordinary courts, and not the commissioner's courts, which deal exclusively with offences by Africans. In practice, as noted by the Riekert Commission employees and not employers are the most frequently prosecuted for illegal employment.[3] In line with the recommendations of that Commission, the penalties for offences connected with illegal employment were increased in 1979. The maximum penalty applicable to both employer and employee now is R500, or 3 months' imprisonment, or both, or to 3 months' imprisonment without the option of a fine.

A crucial feature of the offence under section 10(4) is the requirement (in section 10(5)) that the onus of proof with respect to disproving the principal elements of the offence is placed on the accused. It is to be presumed in any prosecution that the person was at the time of arrest longer than 72 hours in the prescribed area in question. If he or she claims to have been there for a shorter period or to be entitled to be there for longer—that is, to have permission under Section 10(d) or to have "urban rights" (10 (a), (b) or (c))—then the burden of proving such is on the accused person.

It should be noted that such requirements as to proof, which are characteristic of most pass law offences, deny the accused a central guarantee of a fair trial proclaimed in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights—the right to be presumed innocent until proved guilty according to law.[4] The consequences of reversing the onus of proof, as observed in the trials for such offences during the Amnesty International missions, were to coerce the normally unrepresented defendant to plead guilty and to relieve the prosecutor from the need to call any evidence in the case. In no trial observed on either mission in 1984 or 1985 did a prosecutor call a witness or prove anything through evidence. If, as exceptionally occurred, an accused pleaded "not guilty" to a section 15 or other offence, the case was either dismissed on the basis of the defendant's evidence or the accused was remanded, normally in custody, to enable police evidence to be called. Members of the Black Sash organization who regularly monitor these courts confirmed to Amnesty International's delegate that when an accused was again produced it was only in the rare case that prosecution evidence was called. The usual outcome, if an accused did not change the plea to "guilty", was a discharge.[5] These and other features of trial in commissioners' courts for pass offences are discussed further in chapter 6.

Just as there is a grievance over the enforcement of the law requiring production of a pass (section 15 of the 1952 Act above), equally, the practices of the police in arresting for alleged offences contrary to section 10(4) are a source of constant complaint. The Amnesty International mission in 1984 was informed that at least in Johannesburg the 72-hour period within which it is lawful to be in the prescribed area is largely ignored. The offence of "remaining" in a prescribed area has been converted into one of "entering" a prescribed area. It was reported, for example, that people with luggage are frequently arrested outside bus stations or outside the railway station having alighted from transport bringing them to Johannesburg. Numerous cases which Amnesty International's delegate observed in the Germiston commissioners' court in May 1985 were withdrawn in court by the prosecutor following the defendants' complaints that they were arrested within hours of arriving in the prescribed area. The prosecutor and the magistrate expressed concern about police behavior in these cases, and the prosecutor was detailed to complain to the local police commander. In contrast, in 1984, in cases observed at the commissioners' courts in Market Street, Johannesburg, similar accusations made by defendants produced no response from court officials. The use of this arrest power is considered further in chapter 5, but it is clear that arrests in the circumstances mentioned are illegal under the laws of South Africa.

(b) Trespass Offences:

In many legal systems, trespass—entering or remaining on property without the owner's consent—is a civil matter. In South Africa, however, it is a criminal offence and those arrested and prosecuted are overwhelmingly black. In 1984, for example, more than 90,000 Africans were arrested for alleged trespass.[6]

The principal legislation is the Trespass Act of 1959 and regulations promulgated in 1968 which make it an offence to be present without a permit or written authorisation by its superintendent in any of the black hostels administered under the aegis of the Department of Co-operation and Development and used to accommodate black migrant workers in white areas.[7] Arrests and prosecutions for breaching these regulations are believed to constitute a significant proportion of the total though no precise figures were available to Amnesty International's delegate. Other arrests occur in the context of visits by black friends or relatives to black domestic servants in their quarters in white residential suburbs, which may result in the prosecution both of the visitor and of the domestic servant or employer who permitted the unauthorised black person to be present.

Although this legislation relating to trespass is notionally non-discriminatory by race, it is applied, in practice, on a discriminatory basis and in such a way that it supplements the restrictions on freedom of movement and presence contained in the pass laws. One indication of this is the different treatment accorded to people of different race alleged to have breached the laws relating to trespass: as described below in chapter 5, black people are arrested and taken into custody while whites are simply summonsed.

Even blacks who are qualified (under section 10 of the Black (Urban Areas) Act) to remain in areas preserved for whites are not permitted freedom of movement in those areas. This is because section 9(9)(a) of the Black (Urban Areas) Act provides that "no Black shall without permission of the owner of any land or building within an urban area outside a location, Black village or Black hostel enter upon or into or remain . . . unless he does so in the course of his employment". This provision is clearly discriminatory.

It is not known to Amnesty International what proportion of those imprisoned for trespass are victims of discrimination on the basis of race—either because the provision under which they have been imprisoned is discriminatory in itself or because it has been applied in a discriminatory way—and thus may be considered prisoners of conscience.

(c) Squatting:

"In the South African sense the term squatting is used to connote occupation by [blacks]—no matter what the nature of tenure—of land owned by non-blacks".[8] The arrest of whole communities for squatting—that is, illegal presence and residence—has long been a feature of influx control in South Africa. The best known struggles involving squatters have occurred at Crossroads in Cape Town, but there are many other instances and locations.[9] A recent illustration occurred in November 1984 when hundreds of people were rounded up and accused of squatting on a farm near Grasmere, south of Johannesburg, in a joint police-army operation. The raid took place at midnight and many young children were left uncared for when their parents were taken and held in police cells over the weekend before being released on bail.[10] Squatting prosecutions are also frequently employed in rural areas, to force farm labourers and families whose services are no longer required off farmland. The principal legislation used is The Prohibition of Illegal Squatting Act of 1951, which contains an array of powers to arrest, powers of eviction and to pull down shanty dwellings. This act is not of general application but applies only to areas "proclaimed" by the government.

Again, the legislation relating to squatting is notionally non-discriminatory but appears, in practice, to be applied almost exclusively against blacks from a racial motivation. In cases where this racial aspect is primary, those imprisoned for alleged illegal squatting may be prisoners of conscience.

(d) Curfew:

Under the 1945 Act, section 31, the State President may, at the request of a local authority, proclaim a curfew for that area "and no black male or female, shall be in any public place within [that area] during such hours of the night as are specified unless such Black be in possession of a written permit signed by his employer or by a person authorised . . ." Many "white" urban areas are subject to such nightly curfews. In 1984, 11,688 Africans or over 30 per day were prosecuted under the curfew regulations.[11] The offence is explicitly discriminatory. Only Africans are subject to curfew laws. Any African abroad where a curfew is proclaimed must have a written authorisation, or a "night special" as it is called in the argot of the Johannesburg police. Complaints voiced in court by Africans that they were arrested before curfew hour, held in police vans until after 11 pm and then charged with breaking the curfew, were commonplace in the cases in the Johannesburg commissioners' courts observed by Amnesty International's delegate. Under the legislation, curfew is optional in municipalities. The Riekert Commission noted that in 1978 out of 309 areas where Africans were subject to curfew laws, only 49 then enforced them strictly. This had fallen to ten in 1984.[12] That Report recommended abolition of the curfew, but this has not occurred, although accepted in principle by the government. The drop in curfew regulation is evident from figures for 1971-72 when some 132,264 people were arrested for such offences.[13] Nevertheless, in the period 1975-1983, 200,000 Africans were prosecuted in South Africa for the crime of movement by night.[14] Some municipalities insist not only on a street curfew but a "white by night" policy. For example, in such towns in the Transvaal as White River and Barberton all domestic servants must reside in the black township or location and not in domestic quarters in the white area, between the hours of 9 pm and 4 am.

Administrative control under the pass laws

A characteristic of the pass laws is the array of administrative powers given to officials at all levels in the exercise of control over the lives of Africans. Some of these powers can be exercised only after court enquiry or an application to a court, but others have no such requirements. These powers are additional to the crucial discretion from the point of view of the African worker exercised by such as the labour bureau officials and authorities responsible for accommodation. Indeed, at every turn, African life where it is not regulated by the police and the commissioner is governed by the discretion of officials, with limited if any safeguards on arbitrary action. Only the major sources of administrative power are described in this Report.

"Section 29" enquiries into "idle or undesirable blacks"

The 1945 Act provides for an inquisitorial jurisdiction conducted by a commissioner known as "section 29 enquiries".[15] Arising from these investigations, Africans may be banished from the cities or sent to farm colonies or other places for terms as long as eighteen months. The procedures involved are administrative and an "idle or undesirable" finding is not a conviction for an offense. In practice, however, commissioners have thought otherwise and have used these arbitrary powers to punish people with terms of forced labour for what they conceive of as "the felony of idleness".[16]

The powers given to officials by section 29 of the 1945 Act have been condemned over the years by South African judges, who have variously described them as "constituting a 'drastic interference with human liberty', as giving 'extraordinary powers' that 'are unknown to any system of jurisprudence', as being very dangerous', and 'as not being in accordance with justice' ".[17] To these condemnations may be added the further one, not referred to by the courts, that the powers are racially discriminatory. Only Africans are subject to section 29 investigations and to banishment, detention and forced labour. The Riekert Commission in 1978 recommended its abolition.[18] The government has taken power to do so in the Black Community Development Act of 1984, but has not thus far done so.

Where any authorized officer has reason to believe "that any Black is an idle and undesirable person, he may notwithstanding the provisions of any other law without warrant arrest that Black . . . and take him . . . before a Commissioner" (section 29(1))

The maximum period that the person arrested may be held before being brought before the commissioner is 72 hours, whereas the maximum period for an alleged offence permitted by the Criminal Procedure Act of 1977 is 48 hours. While an investigation is underway the person may be remanded on bail, but normally he or she is in custody for such periods as are necessary pending the completion of an enquiry.

For the purposes of the section a "Black" excludes a bona fide black housewife, but includes any other females over 15 years and under 60, and males over 15 and under 65 years of age.

The section provides for arrest on an allegation of being "idle or undesirable" in a catalogue of circumstances remarkable for its scope. There are nine distinct sets of circumstances which justify arrest and an enquiry into "idleness" and at least eleven justifying enquiry as to "undesirability". The most common allegation of "idleness' examined before the commissioners' courts is where it is alleged that the person has been unemployed for a period of 122 days within the preceding twelve months. Other grounds include where he has refused on three consecutive occasions employment offered him by the labour bureau, or has lost his employment on more than two occasions within 6 months "due to his own misconduct, neglect, intemperance or laziness". "Idleness' also includes begging or failure to support dependents through gambling or addiction to drugs.

The categories of "undesirable" all relate to convictions for different offences, including any offence involving public violence, selling or possessing sorghum beer, malicious injury to property, or membership in unlawful organisations.

The commissioner undertakes an enquiry into the allegation that the person arrested is "idle or undesirable" and he "shall require such Black to give a good and satisfactory account of himself . . . and if [he] fails to do so, the commissioner shall declare such person to be an idle or an undesirable person according to the circumstances" (section 29, 6 (a), (b)).

The section further provides in relation to an allegation of idleness due to not having lawfully been employed for an aggregate of 122 days or more, "where there is any doubt as to whether a Black falls within the category . . . the burden of proof that he does not fall within such category shall be upon such Black". The process of enquiry, therefore, is one of compulsory inquisition. The African person is required to "give a good and satisfactory account of himself" on pain of being deemed "idle" or "undesirable".

The finding that a person is "undesirable" under the act might appear to operate automatically once conviction is established for one of the listed offences. But the courts have sought to prevent this interpretation of their powers by commissions. In the case of some offences the act requires the conviction to have been within the preceding three or five years, but in the case of others, for example, public violence or malicious damage, a conviction at any time may suffice. None of the listed offences are within the jurisdiction of the commissioners' courts. The section therefore contemplates the arrest of an offender after conviction and sentence in a court of law for purposes of an enquiry conducted by a government official. Should that enquiry lead to a finding by the commissioner that the person is "undesirable" or "idle", he is empowered to order the person's removal to a homeland or such other place as determined by him and he may further order that he may not return at any time without written permission. In practice, such persons are sent to work on farm colonies run by the Department of Prisons, for such period as the commissioner may determine.[19] The commissioner has power to suspend an order for removal, and as a condition of the suspension require the person to take up employment arranged by the labour bureau. From observation by Amnesty International's delegate of section 29 proceedings in the Johannesburg commissioners' courts in 1984, it is apparent that suspension of sentence is common. If the order does take effect, however, then should the African have 'urban rights' under section 10 of the 1945 act, or have permission to remain in the urban area under section 10(1)(d), he or she "shall forthwith forfeit any right which [he or she] may have acquired" (section 29(16)).

In Johannesburg, one commissioner dealt exclusively with section 29 cases in 1984. For the month of March 1984, the court had a case load of 357 cases. Orders under section 29 were made in 43 cases, 100 were withdrawn and 214 were remanded for further investigation.[20] The commissioner dealt with an average of about 20 cases per week. On average a person under investigation spent four to six weeks in custody before or during the investigation. The hearing functions through a combination of evidence led by an inspector and questioning from the commissioner. In no case observed was the person represented.[21] A principal source of evidence produced by the inspector consisted of what were termed admissions by the arrested person during interviews. A typical case was introduced by the inspector as follows:

"The respondent is a black male aged 27 years. I have reason to believe he is idle in terms of section 29. He appears to be an able bodied person who doesn't work. Identified from records in Pretoria [identification number read]. He is not registered as a work seeker or a worker. He has no proof that in the last twelve months he did any work at all. He has no permit to work in Johannesburg and on interview he made the following admissions: 'No fixed address. I have none in Johannesburg.' 'I have no private income to pay for my upkeep.' Alleges he arrived in Johannesburg in January 1984. He is so vague that he is not able to supply particulars before that. He cannot give any reason why he is not earning a living. I have further information I will divulge later to show he has been here more than twelve months and my submission is that he is idle."

The bulk of section 29 enquiries result from cases referred from the other commissioners' courts. If the aid centre interview (see chapter 4) indicates that the arrested person is someone who ought to be investigated further, the person is remanded in custody for a section 29 enquiry. A further source of cases is on complaint from wives or mothers about the domestic behaviour of husbands or sons. Thus, social problems and domestic disputes among African people can be dealt with through a coercive procedure rather than helping agencies or case work. The section 29 procedure is also used to enforce maintenance orders made in other courts. If a husband claims inability to pay an order the maintenance court will refer the case for investigation as to means by the section 29 court.

Orders made under section 29 are in practice treated as being subject to automatic review by the Supreme Court.[22] While there is some doubt as to whether this has proved to be an effective safeguard, many commissioners resent it and some have sought to have it abolished. The arbitrary and racially discriminatory powers and procedures described under section 29 are in gross violation of fundamental human rights and freedoms as prescribed by the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Those subjected to the administrative "findings" under section 29 enquiries and who, as a result, are required to undertake forced labour on farm colonies are equally prisoners of conscience as the victims who are convicted and sentenced for pass law offences by the same commissioners' courts.

Identification enquiries for the issuing of reference books

Independent of the powers under the 1952 Act to arrest and prosecute for the offence of not being in possession of a pass, which were described above, an authorised officer may, if he is satisfied that the person does not in fact have a reference book, identity document or passport, "bring such Black or cause him to be brought before a commissioner . . . in order that a reference book [etc.] may be issued to him, or in order that such enquiry may be made regarding the identification of such Black as such commissioner or officer may consider necessary". Pending enquiries, any "such commissioner or officer" may order the person's detention for a maximum of 30 days "in any reception depot, lock-up, police cell or gaol" (section 5). This power constitutes a form of administrative detention in direct contradiction to the terms of the South African Criminal Procedure Act of 1977, and underlines the extent to which the powers exercised over Africans of a regulatory and penal nature represent a parallel system of "black justice".[23]

Removal, repatriation and deportation orders

An array of powers exist to remove Africans in different circumstances and under different laws, with or without the intervention of a court.

(i) Under section 14 of the Urban Areas Act 1945, an African convicted of remaining in the prescribed area for more than 72 hours or a foreign national working there illegally, whether convicted or not, may be removed or deported together with his dependents under a warrant issued by the court that convicted him or by any commisioner. Due regard must be paid to the family ties of such person. Removal may be to the homeland, whether "independent" or "self-governing", or to a foreign state. In terms of an amending law passed in 1970, the convicted person may alternatively be sent to designated institutions or places to "be detained thereat for such period and perform such labour as may be prescribed" (section 14(1A)).

An effect of this extraordinary provision can be to impose a second punishment of a term of forced labour for an offence already dealth with by a fine or imprisonment. Statistics are not available on the use of this particular power, but in 1984 some 25,085 Africans were repatriated, either under section 14 of the 1945 Act or under the Admission of Persons to the Republic Regulation Act 1972, discussed below.[24]

(ii) Under the Blacks Resettlement Act 1954, Africans may be removed from the Johannesburg area and resettled elsewhere by a Black Resettlement Board, which is given extensive powers to require departure from the area. The board may seek a court order for compulsory removal and the demolition of buildings, structures or other property.

(iii) Under the Black Labour Act 1964, a district labour officer has summary powers to "endorse out" any African who he has refused permission to be employed in the prescribed area or whose contract of employment has been cancelled. The officers in any aid centre have concurrent powers to require the person to depart "within a period determined by the officer concerned" (secton 25).

(iv) Under the Black Communities Development Act 1984, a commissioner may issue a warrant for the removal of any person who is proved to have been in an altered or disestablished town or hostel and order the destruction of any residence or structure. Failure to leave is a criminal offence and the court may "in addition to imposing any penalty . . . order a member of the South African Police to remove such person and his personal effects" (section 38(1)). Section 40 of this act authorises a commissioner to remove "coloured persons" from "black towns."

(v) Under the Aliens Acts, 1937 and 1984, and the Admission of Persons to the Republic Regulation Act 1952, extensive powers exist to detain and to deport not only foreign African nationals, but the "new" foreigners from the "independent" homelands. In recent years, much concern has been expressed in South Africa over the use and abuse of these highly discretionary powers. As noted in chapter 2, the evidence is accumulating that citizenship laws are being substituted for the pass laws and it is believed that this represents the likely new direction of influx control policy as ever-increasing percentage of South Africans are by birth designated foreigners.

Most states exercise control of the movement of foreign citizens across their frontiers. South Africa, however, is distinctive for several reasons. First, it has, at least until recently, encouraged very large numbers of migrant males from surrounding states to enter South Africa to work in mining, agriculture and industry in general. This system of migrant labour, which dates from colonial times, brought in 1984 a total of 355,560 people from other African states into South Africa.[25] The second distinct feature is that South Africa links control of these foreign nationals or aliens to its pass laws and to its policies of racial discrimination.

Under the Aliens Act 1937, as amended, to obtain permanent residence in South Africa an applicant must be issued with a permit by an Immigration Selection Board. The board is authorized to issue such a permit, which is known as a "permanent residence permit", only in the case of an applicant who "is likely to be readily assimilated with the European inhabitants of South Africa" (section 4(3)). A "European inhabitant" is defined as being a person classified as white under the Population Registration Act 1950.[26]

Africans who are foreign nationals and who are given permission to enter South Africa are issued with a temporary permit only. As a result, they may be deported at any time and the temporary permit withdrawn. Even when they have lived all their lives in South Africa, such foreign nationals remain foreigners. Nor can their children become South African citizens, because their fathers lacked permanent residence rights. In contrast, children of white parents are automatically South African citizens, because their parents would have had permanent residence permits.

One population which has suffered considerably from these laws and from official policy changes on their presence in South Africa are citizens of Zimbabwe. Under current govenment directives, a Zimbabwean who cannot prove that he has worked in the same job since January 1959 or that he has been continuously employed in South Africa since January 1953 is not allowed to remain in South Africa even should an employer wish to renew a long-standing employment contract. Many hundreds have been prosecuted, convicted and imprisoned since that policy came into effect. These prosecutions take place in the commissioners' courts. Imprisonment for terms of 6 months, heavy fines following long periods of remand in custody and thereafter deportation is the standard experience of these foreign citizens. Between February 1983 and January 1984, a total of 2,412 people were deported to Zimbabwe, and 20,141, to Mozambique.[27]

It has been governent policy to reduce the number of all foreign nationals in South Africa and the laws have been strengthened and vigorously enforced. It is a serious offence to employ a foreign black national within South Africa who has no permit to be there. Under the Aliens and Immigration Laws Amendment Act 1984, penalties of up to two years' imprisonment or a fine of R5,000 can be imposed on anyone who gives employment or shelter to an alien. Under the act, employers are obliged to furnish returns of all employees who are aliens. Equally, under the pass laws (Urban Areas Act Section 12), it is an offence for a foreign black national to enter any urban area unless written permission from the Secretary of the Department of Co-operation and Development has been given.

The aliens legislation applies in virtually the same manner to the new foreigners from the "independent" homelands as it does to foreign black nationals.[28] This means that over 8 million former South African citizens are controlled in their movement by legislation governing aliens, as well as by the pass laws. In particular, they are vulnerable to expulsion or deportation from "white" South Africa if they do not have the requisite temporary permit to be there. It has been calculated that up to 40 per cent of the African population of Cape Town who were classified as "illegals" only in the sense that as South African citizens they had no permission to be in the Cape under Section 10 of the 1945 Act, are now also illegal aliens within South Africa since they have come from such homelands as Transkei.[29] Thus, since "independence" in 1976, over 4,000 Transkeians have been deported from South Africa under the Admission of Persons to the Republic Regulation Act 1972.[30] An unknown proportion of the 25,085 persons repatriated or deported in 1984 were returned to homelands, "independent" and "self governing", as well as to the surrounding independent states.

The control of illegal "aliens" or "prohibited persons", as they are defined, involves extensive and arbitrary powers of arrest and detention granted to police and immigration officials without any right of access to the courts by those who are their victims. In 1984, 1,891 persons were declared prohibited persons or prohibited immigrants, but a very much larger number of persons were arrested and detained without trial for long periods as suspected prohibited persons.[31] Those detained on this basis are believed to have included many black people who have South African birth certificates and reference books. Such South African citizens are reportedly held incommunicado for periods that can exceed 12 months in some cases while efforts are made by the police to force them to admit that their documentation is forged and that they are foreigners and not citizens. Allegations of assault and forced confessions have also been made.

In 1984, a government enquiry was established to look into specific allegations of this nature in Johannesburg. The Minister then responsible, Dr. P.G.J. Koornhof, told Parliament on 6 June 1984:

"The purpose of these allegations was that law-abiding black people with valid South African reference books and other documents are being detained without trial by the commissioner at Alexandra for up to 13 months to make them confess that they are aliens in order to deport them to Zimbabwe".[32]

One of the people involved, Mr. Albert Nkomo, aged 19, was reported to have said that he was detained for a period of three months as an illegal immigrant even though his reference book stated that he was born in Orlando township, Soweto. This was the second time he had been arrested within a year. He had been arrested in February 1984 on a charge of being in the area illegally and was discharged. Thereafter, he was rearrested on suspicion of being a prohibited immigrant and held until his lawyer had taken court proceedings to secure his release, satisfying the court that he was a South African citizen.[33]

Large numbers of other Africans have reported been arrested on a similar basis in diffferent parts of South Africa, including the towns and townships of the Witwatersrand and the region near to the Mozambique border. In Nelspruit, in Northern Transvaal, a squad of police officers who apparently double as immigration officials are reported in the last two years to have arrested thousands of Africans whom they allege to be prohibited immigrants but some of whom were citizens of South Africa. Access to relatives and families has been denied to those arrested who have not been charged with offences. There is no limit to their period of detention in law. The relevant legislation, the Admission of Persons to the Republic Regulation Act, permits an appeal by a detainee to a statutory board, but it is known that detainees have not been informed in time or at all of the right to appeal, which must be lodged within three days of arrests. Allegations of assault to force detainees to admit foreign citizenship have been reported. However, it is not known how widespread these assaults are. Amnesty International's delegate received information in May 1985 from lawyers who act for some of those arrested in the Nelspruit area. One of them was present in court when a detainee alleged before the Nelspruit Commissioners' Court that he had been beaten by the police to admit that he was a prohibited immigrant. His face was obviously bruised when he appeared in court, and his mother also alleged that he had been assaulted.

One such case that has been reported in the press and about which additional information has been provided to Amnesty International concerns Samuel Ngomane, a South African citizen.[34] He was arrested on 14 October 1983 on suspicion of being an illegal immigrant. He held a South African reference book, worked at a mine in Barberton and had his family and child in the vicinity. His pass was removed following arrest, at Barberton, where he was held until 28 November 1983. Without being charged or brought to court he was removed to a farm and required to work there for R15 per week. He earned R115 per week as a miner. For the following twelve months, he worked on different farms. One of the farms, it was discovered, was owned by the father of the Nelspruit commissioner, who is also the passport control officer for the area and was presiding officer in 1984 in the local commissioners' court, where he also at times acted as prosecutor. When a local legal firm was instructed to act for Samuel Ngomane, and newspapers publicised the case, he was in a matter of days sent across the Mozambique border without his lawyers being informed beforehand. According to his lawyer, Samuel Ngomane insisted that he was a South African citizen, held a reference book and wished to tell in court the story of his forced labour. However, under the legislation, there is no obligation to bring the person to court and an officer may deport the person, whether or not he has been convicted of being a prohibited person, to any country that officer considers he came from. The officer in this case claimed that Samuel Ngomane was being held on the farm as a police informer, and he had thereafter lawfully exercised his powers in sending him to Mozambique.

While control of aliens and their removal from a state where they are illegally present is a legitimate exercise of sovereign powers by a state, the exercise of such powers must conform to international law on the treatment of aliens and to those human rights standards which are applicable to citizens and non-citizens alike. Policies of denationalisation and consequent manufacturing of alien or stateless status for the homeland populations in South Africa have been pursued by the South African Government for racial motives and in violation of international law.[35] The use of the aliens control legislation over the categories of genuine African foreign nationals, the homeland population and now the category of South African citizens who, although possessing identity documents from South Africa, are alleged to be foreign nationals, gives rise to serious concern as constituting new directions in the violation of African rights of residence and movement and in permitting the imprisonment of individuals attempting to exercise such rights. Twenty thousand alleged citizens of Mozambique were deported from South Africa in 1983-84, in the case of many, following conviction, fines or imprisonment. On the available evidence, it is possible that a considerable number of these people were nationals of South Africa who were victims of arbitrary exile from their own country.

CHAPTER FOUR: ADMINISTRATION OF THE PASS LAWS

Study of the pass law system in South Africa confirms that Africans are not governed by the necessary foundation for the employment of human rights within a state, the rule of law. They are instead subject to a system colonial in its origins which has been described as one of "administrative rule."[1] At the centre of this system is the constitutional designation of the State President as Paramount Chief of all Africans in South Africa wielding total power over them.[2] This adaptation of an indigenous concept of customary authority into the law provides the ultimate justification in the South African legal order for the control exercised over black people. It also means that the African majority, who have no vote, are not in principle recognised before the law as persons having human rights on an equal basis with the rest of the population. Apartheid therefore functions at the core of the South African legal order as well as its visible administration and enforcement.[3]

Black people are the objects of a separate, largely unaccountable and hidden legal system, an elaborate code of administrative requirements and directives enforced by criminal sanctions which authorises central government intervention in African lives to a degree that would be considered intolerable by the white population. The mechanism which makes such governmental control possible is the documentation and information maintained on Africans through the reference book or pass that all possess. This chapter briefly outlines the range of departments, agencies and institutions responsible for directing and administering this system of control.

Government departments

At the level of government, the principal departments with such responsibility are Co-operation and Development. Home Affairs, Labour, Justice and Immigration. Responsibilities for "Black Affairs" are in the process of change and the exact picture has yet to emerge. The Department of Co-operation and Development (formerly Bantu Affairs, then Plural Development) appears to remain as the principal ministry. It, on behalf of the State President, determines policy over African people and has described itself as a "public service within a public service in respect of blacks". The department has responsibility for Africans both in the "common area" and the homelands. Its functions include black labour and residence, housing, the development boards, community councils and local government. Since November 1984, its functions in relation to population registration of Africans and the reference book system has been transferred to the Department of Home Affairs.[4]

Until September 1984, the Department of Co-operation and Development also had responsibility for the commissioner's courts in which pass law offences are prosecuted. However, following the recommendation of the Commission of Enquiry into the Structure and Functioning of the Courts, chaired by Mr. Justice Hoexter, which reported in April 1984, these judicial functions have been transferred to the Department of Justice.[5] The Hoexter Report documents the long internal struggle between the Department of Co-operation and Development and its predecessors and the Department of Justice over which should control the administration of justice relating to African people.

In 1957, the Department of Co-operation and Development had succeeded in having legislation passed which gave to its commissioners power to hold a court in respect of any offence committed by an African (Native Law Further Amendment Act 1957). However, outside the "homelands" this jurisdiction was never fully exercised. According to the Hoexter Commission, a compromise had then been arrived at between the departments whereby:

(a) civil cases between blacks only would be heard by the commissioners, and,

(b) the commissioners would try only "certain statutory offences which apply exclusively to the black population"—that is, pass offences.[6]

In evidence to the Commission, officials of the Department of Co-operation and Development not only defended its involvement in the administration of justice for Africans, but called for a complete separation of "white" and "black" courts with a separate hierarchy of magistrates, supreme court and appellate division. The Department of Justice argued for a single system of judicial administration for all races under its aegis.

The Hoexter Commission rejected the proposal to formalise apartheid in the judicial system through a dual hierarchy of courts, commenting:

"That inhabitants of the same country should purely on the ground of race be criminally prosecuted in separate courts for any offence whatever is . . . by any civilised standard unnecessary, humiliating and repugnant." (para 6.1)

Hoexter called for the abolition of the commissioners' courts, and recommended that in the interim the Department of Justice should be responsible for them. This latter recommendation was duly implemented in September 1984. In May 1985, draft legislation to abolish commissioners' courts was circulated.[7] This will apparently leave unaffected other special courts such as the Black Divorce Court, and commissioners' courts in the homelands.

Administration and development boards

Until mid-1984, administration boards, of which there were thirteen, were the executive arm of central government for African affairs. The new development boards which have now been substituted have similar functions but are intended to reflect a more positive image based on the new thinking that accepts at least some permanent black urbanisation.[8] The administration boards were charged with the day to day implementation of the Department of Co-operation and Development's powers to control the African population. Each board had functional divisions, and included inspectorates and officials who had policing powers. In some administration board areas—for example, the Eastern Cape—most pass law arrests were made by board officials whereas in others, such as the East Rand, arrests were mainly by the police. The boards were vested with rights, powers and functions of a local authority and took over all assets and liabilities of the existing local government bodies in respect of black townships. The boards' revenue derived from rentals to African residents, fees paid by employers of African labour, profits on liquor stores in African townships, and fines imposed for pass offences. Formerly, the boards did not make policy, that being determined centrally for all boards by the Department of Co-operation and Development. The new development boards appear to have taken over all the functions of the administration boards, but are also linked with new institutions of local government for urban black areas. In 1984, development board officials arrested 75,032 Africans under the pass laws.[9]

Aid centres

These centres, which are under the aegis of the Department of Co-operation and Development were provided for by the Black Labour Act 1964. The first such centres were established in 1971; in 1978 some 19 had been established. Each aid centre is run by a manager (who may also be the local commissioner) and has staff supplied by the local administration board. The centres cater for black people arrested under the legislation already outlined for pass offences. According to the Riekert Commission:

"the object of aid centres is to limit criminal proceedings against and the detention of persons contravening the control measures to the offender who is guilty of repeated offences, and to afford the circumstantial or so-called 'technical' offender the opportunity to get his affairs in order." (para 3.178)

What this means in practice is that the centres function between the arrest and apprearance in court of black people to distinguish which of them are "legals" and which are so-called "illegals"—that is, to distinguish between those who, though arrested for "failing to produce" documents, do have permission or a qualification to be in the urban area, and others who are without passes or such permission or qulification. Very large numbers of people are processed through the aid centres: in 1977, the figure was 176,787.[10] When, through interview, a person's identity and particulars are established, the aid centre may recommend to the court the withdrawal of a prosecution or a discharge. As a result, a large percentage of all pass arrests lead to a withdrawal of the prosecution or to a discharge at the court stage. The actual working of the centres as observed in Johannesburg and Cape Town is described in chapter 6.

The commissioners' courts

As noted above, it may now be the intention of the government to abolish these courts, their functions being taken over by magistrates' courts, at least in the so-called "common" or "white" area of South Africa. Commissioners' courts are inferior courts exercising a special jurisdiction relating exclusively to Africans. Commissioners have no jurisdiction over whites. Formerly known as Bantu Courts, they were the responsibility of the Department of Co-operation and Development. These courts exercise both civil and criminal jurisdiction and include commissioners' courts, divorce courts and appeal courts from commissioners' courts for civil cases. While their criminal jurisdiction was in practice limited to pass law offences, civil jurisdiction was unlimited. An African sueing another African could not issue proceedings in the ordinary courts; proceedings had to be taken before a commissioner. There was no limitation on the commissioners' civil jurisdiction, unlike the inferior courts in the ordinary legal system. The commissioners are not judges as such but civil servants, in the employment of the Department of Co-operation and Development. Further, their functions are a mixture of the administrative and the judicial. According to the Hoexter Report, the minimum qualification of the commission is the Diploma Juris. In rural areas, a magistrate may be appointed as a commissioner.

The concept which the Department of Co-operation and Development has both of the black population and the role of commissioner emerges from its evidence to the Hoexter Commission. Its officials opposed the separation of judicial and administrative functions of the office of the commissioner, as it would "speedily result in a loss of authority" for the commissioners:

"The judicial function helps by giving authority in the eyes of Blacks to the Commissioner and helps to execute Government policy and to bring home to Blacks the policy aspects as determined by the Department . . . Blacks are used to acknowledging one authority figure who controls and organizes their whole lives." (paras. 4.2.3., 4.2.4.). (emphasis added)

These comments confirm that the lack of independence of the commissioner, who acts as judge in pass law cases and who regularly commits people to prison, is not denied as such but justified as part of the control system for Africans: the courts are conceived of as having the function of executing government policy rather than of administering impartial justice. Consequently, the commissioners' courts, as the judicial extension of a government department, cannot be considered as independent courts of law in which the rights to fair trial can be upheld, although they have been responsible over many years for trying, fining or imprisoning several million Africans. The Hoexter Commission did not take the opportunity to condemn the philosophy that the courts' role should be to execute government policy. Nor, though it criticised the existence of separate courts for blacks prosecuted under the pass laws, did it call for the abolition of the separate criminal laws applicable to the African population. Nor did it comment on the continued control of justice and its administration by the Department of Co-operation and Development through commissioners' courts in the "homelands", a jurisdiction that would be apparently unaffected by its recommendations for a single court system in the "common area".

The typical career cycle of commissioners included employment as a clerk, translator, and prosecutor before promotion to a commissioner, although it was commonplace for someone to act as a prosecutor and a commissioner. In practice, however, commissioners were also recruited from law graduates, but they often had no experience of legal practice. In the largest city, Johannesburg, commissioners' courts in 1984 were presided over for the most part by officers in their late twenties. The "section 29" court which dealt with "idle and undesirable" enquiries, however, remained the responsibility of the most senior commissioner, in both 1984 and 1985.

The Hoexter Commission details the mixture of administrative and judicial functions which make up the duties of both commissioners and magistrates in South Africa. Neither group, it conceded, were independent in the exercise of judicial powers. The priority given to administrative duties by commissioners over judicial functions was also noted. One consequence, according to evidence before the Commission, was that court work was frequently relegated to the most junior and occasionally unqualified officers.[11] As a prelude to the abolition of commissioners' courts, the Commission recommended the separation of the judicial and administrative functions of the commissioners and ultimately the removal of all their judicial competence to magistrates, who in turn should be made independent of the Department of Justice. While these changes are being implemented, it remains the case that magistrates who now preside in the commissioners' courts are in formal terms no more independent than commissioners. While magistrates' involvement has, as will be seen, raised standards in some courts, the re-appointment of former commissioners as magistrates in other courts means that little change may be evident to the ordinary African prosecuted under the pass laws.[12]

CHAPTER FIVE: ENFORCING THE PASS LAWS: PRE-TRIAL ASPECTS

In Chapter 2 it was noted that the key points for checking by the authorities on the "illegal" movement of Africans from the homelands into the urban areas are the place of employment, housing and the streets. While the Riekert Commission recommended a shift from street enforcement to the other two points of control, the policing of the streets in search of "illegals" remains the dominant means of enforcing the pass laws. The majority of prosecutions still concern the alleged failure to produce a pass when demended or the producing of a pass which does not include the necessary permission to be in the urban area. This chapter examines the pre-trial aspects of the enforcement process, as found on both Amnesty International missions, and considers the practices of the police and development board officials in terms of the relevant international and national standards.

Provisions of South African criminal procedure

The Criminal Procedure Act 1977, section 39, provides for three methods of securing the attendance before a court of a person charged with an offence: by summons, written notice or arrest. An arrest may be with or without a judicial warrant. South African common law accepts the principle that the method to secure attendance least obtrusive on the person's liberty should be used. This normally entails that prosecutions for minor offences, in which category pass offences fall under South African law, are initiated by summons.

The use of arrest rather than summons in pass offences

In terms of the penalties applicable to them, most pass law offences are relatively non-serious offences. However, it is a characteristic of administration of the pass laws as they affect Africans that they are enforced entirely through arrests without warrants, either by the South African police or by development board inspectors, who have equal powers of arrest for these purposes as the police. In contrast, where the pass laws impinge on whites or others—for example, the offence of employing "illegal" African workers—the process of enforcement is invariably by summons. This is the case even through the most serious offences in terms of penalties, under the 1945 Black (Urban Areas) Act, are reserved for those committed by employers. It has been the practice for the normally white employer to use the "admission of guilt" procedure by means of which a guilty plea may be entered by post through a lawyer and court attendance avoided altogether.

It is known that, following an initial arrest of an African for trespass and curfew offences, fines paid by the admission of guilt procedure at the police station resulting in release can occur. It was not possible to determine the extent to whch this procedure is used. It is clear, however, that the bulk of those arrested are not given this option of paying a fine at a police station, but are detained and brought to court for prosecution. The differences and inequalities in the modes of initiation and administrative disposition of pass law offences as between the races were officially noted by the Riekert Commission in 1978 (para. 3.152). The Commission also commented on the relative rarity of prosecution of white employers for employing "illegals" and the low conviction rates, as compared with their employees. The Commission considered this arose in part because the employer and employee where prosecuted were tried in different courts, and generally from a reluctance to prosecute employers. It recommended more vigorous prosecution of employers and that they should be prosecuted before the same court. In 1983, 1,140 employers of illegal black workers were fined a total of R178,258.[1] It is not known what proportion of this number actually appeared in court, but it is known that all who did were summonsed. None were arrested or warned of arrest.[2] In the same year at least 150,000 Africans were arrested under the same legislation and none were summonsed.[3]

The legal basis of arrests under the pass laws

The exact legal basis of the arrests made under one of the principal acts which create pass offences is not clear. The law of arrest in South Africa is governed by Section 40 of the Criminal Procedure Act 1977. This provides inter alia that a lawful arrest may be made of any person "who commits or attempts to commit an offence in [an officer's] presence". It is doubtful if this power would cover the offence under section 10 of the 1945 Act ("being in a prescribed area in excess of 72 hours"). When arresting without warrant for such an alleged offence, the officer could at most only suspect in the ordinary case that the person was in the prescribed area longer than 72 hours. But the power to arrest on reasonable suspicion of an offence is not permitted under the 1977 Act for this or any other pass law offence (section 40(b) and Schedule III).

The Criminal Procedure Act contains a proviso (in section 40(2)) which enables an arrest without warrant to be lawfully made under conditions or circumstances different to those which it prescribes, if any other law provides the necessary legal basis. However, the Black (Urban Areas) Act 1945, at least, while it prohibits residence in the urban areas by unqualified blacks beyond 72 hours, does not make provision for such exceptional arrest powers. The formal legality of many pass law arrests under the terms of South African law itself must therefore be doubted.

Arbitrary practices on arrest

The reliance on arrest for the enforcement of the pass laws where, measured by the penalties, a summons or payment of a fine would be justified is striking. So too is the collective or group approach taken by the police and other relevant officials in their enforcement. Arrests rarely occur in individual cases, with an officer responding to specific conduct considered a criminal offence, but result from regular screening on the streets, and surprise "raids" on hostels, townships or factories, where documents are demanded and checked. The dress of those who appear in court following arrests the previous day—workers; women in shop coats, men in overalls, teenagers, people smartly dressed for the evening, others in the shabby clothes of the poor and jobless—offers eloquent testimony to the sweep of arrests through the black community. The police themselves describe the duty as being on the "Raiding Squad". An admittedly exceptional mass arrest in January 1982 illustrates the potentiality of the process. In that case, 766 African men were arrested at the Diepkloff men's hostel in Johannesburg for an alleged presence there without a permit. Ultimately 84 persons were charged in the Market Street commissioners' court, of whom 60 were convicted.[4]

Amnesty International's delegate witnessed and had described the street enforcement procedures. Police vans patrol on a continuous basis and plain clothes officers dressed often in casual wear mingle with the crowds on the streets, suddenly stopping an African at random and demanding "pass". If it is not produced or is "incorrect" (in the eyes of the officer), the person is arrested and bundled into a police wagon. Thereafter, the patrol recommences its surveillance. As discussed in Chapter 3, the law as interpreted by the courts requires that if someone challenged does not have a pass with him or her, a reasonable opportunity to fetch it should be given. However, in practice this is ignored. A failure to produce the reference book at the point it is demanded is cause for immediate arrest. It may be possible on arrest for others to remonstrate with the officer and secure the release of a friend or acquaintance who has been picked up while the van is parked in the street, provided someone can produce a reference book from nearby where the arrested person had left it. But the approach to enforcement equally creates ample occasion for arbitrary action by the police. Opportunity for bribery is also legion, and complaints were made during interview of those who had experienced arrests, of police officers demanding money in return for release before and after people were brought to police stations. A reportedly common context where money is demanded arises from abuse of arrest powers under curfew regulations. In Johannesburg, for example, the police often reportedly make arrests before the curfew hours (11 pm–4 am), hold those arrested in vans until after it has come into effect and then threaten to charge them with breach of curfew unless a bribe is paid. The following statement taken for the purposes of legal proceedings for false imprisonment from Mr. Jonas Molepo, while it does not allege bribery, amply portrays abuse of curfew arrest powers and the serious consequences that this may have for the victim:

"I am employed as a gardener. I have passed Standard 6 school. Born 12 December 1958. Unmarried. On Tuesday 17 April 1984 I went to visit a friend in Dunkeld. At about 9.30 pm when I was on the way home, I was stopped by two black policemen. This was in Oxford Road in the Parkwood area. The policemen were in plain clothes. One of them asked me for my pass. I gave it to him. He checked it and found that it was in order but he then asked me where my "night special" was. I said I hadn't got it. They then arrested me and put me in a truck. There was no-one else in the truck. We then drove around and more people were arrested, including in Orange Grove. From there we went to town, where more people were arrested; and from there to Hillbrow police station. There were many people arrested—I would say 30. I do not know the names of the policemen who arrested me. There were five altogether—the two who arrested me, another two who were also arresting people, and the driver. They were all black.

"At about 12.30 pm we reached Hillbrow police station. I was put in a cell with about 30 other people. There were no mattresses: I had to sleep on the floor on blankets. The next morning (Wednesday 18 April) we were taken to the court in a van. I appeared in the court. I still had my pass with me at this stage. The prosecutor said that the police said that they had found me in Oxford Road at 11.25 p.m. I said that was not correct—it was 9.30 pm. He asked whether I checked the time when the police asked for a night special and I said yes. He asked whether I had a watch, and I said yes. He then said the case would be remanded because I denied what the police said.

"The case was then remanded to Tuesday 1 May 1984. Nothing was said about bail. This was between 10.00 am and 11.00 am. I was then taken to Modderbee Prison where I was held until the day of my appearance. When I appeared in Court on 1 May the case was withdrawn. No reason was given: I was asked the same questions as before, and gave the same answers. The policeman was not in court."

The complainant, assisted by the Legal Resources Centre in Johannesburg, took proceedings in the magistrates' court and was awarded R1,000 damages in May 1985.

Sexual harassment and assault were also reported to Amnesty International's delegate in the day-to-day arrests of people on the streets. Similar allegations are occasionally reported by the press, but it was not possible to determine how systematic such ill-treatment was.[5]

The indignities and discomfort associated with such mass arrest procedures are, however, well attested. Africans, men and women, picked up on the streets of the largest city, Johannesburg, complained of having to spend inordinate hours sitting in the very over-crowded interior of a police van until it had secured its complement of people. Apart from overcrowding and denial of water and food, a common complaint was denial of access to toilet facilities. One man complained,

"I was arrested at 8 am and did not get to Hillbrow [police station] until 1:30 pm. I was over five hours in a crowded truck going around the streets, as they hunted for more people to arrest. We asked to be let out to get to the toilet, but they said they did not have time for that. I had to urinate in my trousers sitting down. One man couldn't help himself and he did it out the join between the back doors of the van. When we got to the police station they saw the wetness on the doors and they said who did that? But none of us said anything."

Organizations such as the Black Sash have evidence that these trawling operations through the streets of Johannesburg frequently focus at such places as the Railway Concourse, where people congregate and where many Africans arriving on trains or buses are arrested even where a pass is produced because they have "entered" a prescribed area. There is no such offence, and as outlined in Chapter 2, provided a person has a valid pass, he or she requires permission to be in an urban area such as Johannesburg only after the elapse of three days. While admittedly the offence in question (section 10(4) of the Urban Areas Act 1945), as defined, is difficult to enforce, there can be little doubt that there is widespread illegality associated with arrests under it. The common police interpretation of the offence as one of entry into a prescribed urban area is clearly invalid as a basis for arrest. It has already been noted that the existence of any legal power to arrest under South African law for this particular offence may be doubted in any event, and it can be concluded that many if not all arrests for this offence constitute false imprisonment.

Illegal practices associated with enforcing the offence of "failing to produce a pass on demand" (section 15 of the 1952 Act) have also been documented in Chapter 2. In the case of this alleged offence the police and development board officials appear to interpret the offence as failing to carry a pass, despite the ruling of the Appellate Division that reasonable opportunity to produce a pass must be given before arrest could be justified.[6] In consequence, many arrests for this offence are also unlawful under South African law and thousands detained on this basis have been equally subjected to false imprisonment.

In 1984, in the Johannesburg commissioners' courts, as many as 70 per cent of those arrested had charges withdrawn or were released after a caution and discharge.[7] This very high percentage of cases withdrawn in court justifies the inference that very many arrests are unnecessary as well as unlawful. It seems clear that police and officials exercising arrest powers leave the aid centres to distinguish "legals" from "illegals" from among those detained on the streets. Persistent high levels of arrests over many years point to an official policy in this regard.

Information on arrest

South African law and the relevant international standards require that on arrest a person shall be informed of the cause or grounds of arrest. If, as appears to be the case, arrests for both section 10 and section 15 offences in practice are unlawful because of police interpretation of these offences, it follows that persons could not be given an adequate ground justifying the arrest in many cases. In the case of a section 15 offence, for example, a person ought to be informed of the opportunity to fetch the pass book if it is not on his person in order to fulfill this requirement, but as has been noted, this is not done. In any event, Amnesty International's delegate was informed by people who had been arrested and by others concerned that no grounds as such are given by officers effecting arrests.

The role of the court in supervising arrests

It is not unusual in any jurisdiction for the police incidentally or deliberately to abuse arrest powers. In such circumstances, the role of the court before which persons are charged and prosecuted is to act as a check on such illegalities. However, the commissioners' courts responsible for trying pass law cases did not serve this function. This was largely a result of the failure of the courts to require evidence from prosecution witnesses before conviction. The "trial" usually operates on the basis of a guilty plea by the defendant, as explained in Chapter 6. In no trial observed by Amnesty International's delegate did a police officer, or any other witness, give evidence on behalf of the prosecution. Therefore, no examination was possible of the issues raised here surrounding the legality of arrests under the pass laws. Even where the accused complained of illegalities, for example, arrest before the curfew or of having been arrested immediately on entry into the prescribed area, the commissioners ignored the matter. Given that the defendants before the commissioners' courts are unrepresented, the failure by the court to require the legal basis of arrest to be established also makes it difficult for any civil claim to compensation for unlawful arrest and detention to be pursued subsequently, although this is a right which is laid down in both South African law and under international standards.

Post arrest procedure

The South African Criminal Procedure Act, section 50, regulates the procedure following arrest and is in conformity with international standards. Thus, the law provides that an arrested person shall be brought to a police station as soon as possible and normally charged or released within 48 hours, subject to possible extension over weekends and other days when there is no normal court sitting up to a maximum of 72 hours. The normal practice is to bring those arrested before the commissioners' court on the following day. The scale of arrests and detentions over weekends, however, is a major grievance voiced about the enforcement of the pass laws. In a city such as Johannesburg, the courts on a Monday sitting have their busiest day, dealing with those arrested from Friday to Sunday evening. Thus, average figures in 1984 for the Monday sittings of the commissioners' courts in Johannesburg were 350–400 alleged pass offences and over 100 trespass and curfew cases. This compares with a daily figure of about 250 during other week days.[8] From the point of view of the persons arrested, to be detained under these laws at weekends imposes the burden of possibly three nights in crowded police cells, to be followed very often by withdrawal of charges or by a conditional discharge on Monday, once their position has been found to be "legal". The withdrawal of such a high percentage of these charges because no offence has been committed or no proof of an offence is available underscores the intolerable burden that the arrest practices under the pass laws place upon the liberty and security of the individual African.

Access to legal advice or to relatives

It is the law in South Africa that a person arrested for an offence has a right from the time of arrest to a lawyer (Criminal Procedure Act, Section 73). For the bulk of the black population who subsequently appear unrepresented in the commissioners' courts, this is of little value, since they do not have lawyers or the means to engage them on their behalf. Of more significance is the possibility to contact relatives. The Criminal Procedure Act does not, however, impose a duty on the police to inform an arrested person of the right to have a lawyer or to contact relatives.

In practice, it appears that arrested persons may be permitted to telephone a friend or relative from the police station if they so request. It is possible to arrange release on police bail (or after a warning) but the extent of its use in the case of the pass laws is not known. Given the very large number of prosecutions withdrawn in court (often occurring when a relative produces a reference book in court that the person was not carrying at the time of arrest), it must be doubted that relatives are contacted from the police station by those arrested to a significant extent or that bail is frequently given by the police. The normal picture that emerges is of family, relatives or employer learning of an arrest, if at all, only in time to turn up for a court appearance. In most cases, they learn of the arrest through witnesses to it on the street rather than the authorities. On the morning of the court hearing, the aid centre may contact an employer to check on particulars, thereby alerting him or her of the impending court appearance. However, the centre does not consider that it is its function to alert relatives.

One consequence is that many of those prosecuted may, following conviction, be sent direct to prison not having the money available to pay the usual penalty of a fine. No time is allowed for payment of a fine. Amnesty International's delegate was told of numerous cases of fines being paid at the prison by relatives who had not learned of the person's arrest, prosecution and conviction (which can often take place all within 24 hours) until he or she had been committed to prison for non-payment of the fine. The failure to ensure following arrest by the police, that an arrested person is put in contact with relatives or an employer exacerbates the injustice inherent in the enforcement of these laws.

Charge

The procedure on charging involves firstly the completion of a charge sheet which subsequently is forwarded to the aid centre. Police questioning is peremptory since that is seen as the function of the aid centre. Prisoners are classified at this stage into those who were arrested without passes and those with passes (the alleged offence being connected with particulars absent from the pass in the latter case), or with being in the area without permission endorsed in the pass book, or with trespass, curfew, etc. Charging is the function of the South African police or, in Johannesburg (in 1984), officials of the administration board based at police stations. Fingerprints of all those charged are taken for subsequent checking by the aid centre. Many of those interviewed complained of the behavior of charging officers. Insults, name calling ('kaffir', 'baboon'), slapping on the face for failing to speak up or to move fast enough, being told they smelled and so on, were reported to be indignities commonly inflicted upon those arrested under the pass laws.

Detention conditions pending trial

The most serious complaints of those arrested concern the conditions of detention and their treatment in police stations pending trial. Police stations and facilities are segregated by race. Detention conditions for Africans are generally reported to be inferior to those for white persons arrested and, on the available evidence, are to be criticised as violating international minimum standards.

The arrested person following charge is placed in a communal cell which has in some cases a cement bench circling the wall, but in others, nowhere to sit but the floor. The cell can include other persons arrested for ordinary criminal offences, teenagers as well as adults. Male and female are separated. A thin foam mattress and a coarse blanket is normally issued to each prisoner, although complaints were made on interview that there were often not enough blankets or mattresses to go round. Serious overcrowding in police lockups, particularly at weekends, is widely known to be common. Black prisoners, young and old, are expected to sleep on the floor. White prisoners, however, have bunks. Complaints that the blankets issued to black prisoners were often lice-ridden or wet were also made. Each cell is equipped with a toilet that is not closed off and often fails to flush. Women prisoners, in particular, complained of the smells and the lack of air in the cells. A cold tap and a basin is also contained in each cell but no soap or towel is provided. Many of those interviewed by Amnesty International's delegate also complained of the cold at night.[9]

The process of feeding prisoners awaiting trial is said to be carried out in a way which subjects prisoners to indignity and inhumanity. The following account from one prisoner arrested in Johannesburg was confirmed by many others on interview and may be said to represent a typical experience:

"At 8:00 pm they gave us food. Our cell was one of three which opened on to a common yard. A large plastic can, like an oil drum cut in two, full of porridge mixed with soup, was left in the middle of the yard. Then they opened all three doors and the prisoners rushed to get to the can first, grabbing with their hands. There were maybe fifty prisoners, and many were fighting to get at the food because they were starving. There were no plates, spoons or anything provided. You just fight to get some food and stuff it in your mouth with your hands. A large drum of tea is also put in the yard and this is to be passed from mouth to mouth, there are no cups. Some prisoners got nothing, some were too disgusted to take any. Some prisoners get black police officers to buy them food from outside. If you have money and you tip they will get you what you want. One man was in for trespass and he asked for a nip of brandy. He tipped the policeman well. He got it brought in. He left the empty bottle in the window ledge of the toilet. The next morning it was the same—you fought for food or bribed a police officer."

The same prisoner told of serious brutality associated with the cleaning of cells, which is often the duty of convicted pass offenders assigned for non-payment of fines to cleaning duties at the police stations.

"The cells at Hillbrow are cleaned by pass offenders. They have been convicted for not having reference books and are sent to clean out cells. They have a very bad time. They are beaten by black police officers. There is a punishment called 'scutta'. This is the word for the way that officers get cleaning done in the police stations and prisons which is thought of as a game by them. It means you have to rush and clean at the double. The policeman shouts 'scutta' and the orderlies are immediately meant to rush to get buckets of water which they pour over the floor then, without stopping they must in a line take cloths and mop up the water, pushing it forward like making a dam of it and all the time they must hurry, hurry. They must run and wring out the cloth and rush back to the floor. The floor must be totally dry in minutes. All the time the police officer is shouting to hurry and hitting them on the back with a stick.

"When I witnessed this game at Hillbrow there were three pass offenders doing the cleaning. The officer said we need more men. He pointed to a number of us, 'you, you', picking out six men. I did not get picked. He had a broom stick and he stood behind the men shouting and hitting them across the back. As they were rushing to get out the cell door to fetch the water, the men, about five of them all got stuck in the cell door and one man fell down and was trampled by the others. He hurt his arm. I went over to help him. The policeman said 'Leave him. He is lying. There is nothing wrong with him'. The man got up. You could see he was hurt as he bent down to mop up the water with the cloth. All the time the officer was hitting the prisoners across the buttocks and back.

"If anyone fell forward he would hit them until they got up again. In this punishment you must not kneel while mopping or squat, you must bend down from the back. Any, everything must be done quick, quick. In two minutes the cell was bone dry and they moved out to clean the yard. The policeman was boasting that the prisoners could fight him outside. 'You can do anything you like if you see me on the street. Now is my chance'. This punishment of scutta is also used with pass offenders who are in prisons on cleaning duties."

While it was not possible to determine the extent of assault and ill-treatment which is experienced by pass arrestees, Amnesty International's delegate was satisfied, on the basis of the information obtained, that routine ill-treatment, degrading conditions of detention, including overcrowding and inhuman conditions for eating and sleeping, are the common experiences of a large number of those arrested under the pass laws, prior to being brought to commissioners' courts. The South African government has frequently claimed that prison conditions, including pre-trial conditions, in South Africa, conform to the United Nations' Standard Minimum Rules on the Treatment of Prisoners.[10] This claim, it would appear, is unlikely to be accurate with respect at least to the many thousands arrested and detained under the pass laws.

Summary of concerns about pre-trial procedures

Concern over the operation of the pass laws at the point of arrest may be summarised as follows:

(i) the use of arrest as opposed to summons procedure in the case of Africans;

(ii) the group character and scale of enforcement which denies individual justice to the person;

(iii) the legal basis of arrest, in particular, as to whether arrests for a "section 10 offence" ("being in a prescribed area without permission in excess of 72 hours") are compatible with the South African Criminal Procedure Act 1977;

(iv) police practices in the interpretation of the major offences (section 10, section 15) which render the bulk of these arrests unlawful;

(v) the failure adequately to fulfill the requirement that the arrested person be informed of the grounds or cause of arrest.

Apart from the arbitrary and unjust nature of the laws themselves under which people are being arrested, it must be concluded that arrest practices by the police are equally arbitrary and violate both national and international standards governing the protection of the liberty and security of the person.

Following arrest, as this study has indicated, there is inadequate effort to ensure that those arrested have the opportunity to make contact with relatives or with legal advice. Further, the conditions and treatment of Africans arrested for pass offences awaiting trial in police stations are commonly degrading and inhuman. Violence against prisoners is reported to be commonplace. Many of these features flow from the group approach to arrest which in turn reflects official policy in the enforcement of the pass laws.

CHAPTER SIX: ENFORCING THE PASS LAWS: COURT STAGES

During the Amnesty International mission to enquire into the pass laws in April 1984, an important enquiry conducted by Mr. Justice Hoexter into the court system of South Africa was published and debated in parliament. Its major recommendations have already been noted. The Hoexter Report was critical of judicial administration in South Africa's lower courts, both magistrates' and commissioners' courts. But it was particularly condemnatory of the standard of justice administered in commissioners' courts which try pass law cases. The Report's recommendation, that pending abolition magistrates should take over the jurisdiction of commissioners' courts and that administrative responsibility should be transferred from the Department of Co-operation and Development to the Department of Justice, was accepted by the government. From 1 September 1984 the transfer was effected.[1]

Following this development a second Amnesty International mission visited South Africa in May 1985 in order to assess the effects of these changes on proceedings in commissioners' courts. To provide a full picture it is proposed in this chapter, unless the context requires otherwise, to describe first the courts as observed in 1984 before commenting on the impact of the transfer of responsibility in September 1984.

The role of the aid centre

The establishment and administration of aid centres was discussed in Chapter 4. Persons arrested for pass offences following overnight or longer custody in police stations are bought to the courts at an early hour to be interviewed by aid centre officials prior to appearance in court. The links between the centre in Johannesburg and the prosecution is illustrated by the fact that in 1984 those who conducted interviews at the aid centre and those who had responsibility for charging at some police stations were the same officials (manpower liaison officers) employed by the West Rand Administration Board.

Aid centre officials interview each arrested person normally through an interpreter. The object is to investigate the person rather than the alleged offence as such. Information is committed to an investigation form. Fingerprints taken at the charging stage or at the aid centre enable identity to be checked where it is in doubt with records in the centre or via teleprinter to the Reference Bureau in Pretoria. Employment and housing details are also checked. The primary concern of the investigation is to sift "legals" from "illegals"—that is, those who have rights or permission to be in the area, and those who do not.

Where the arrest has arisen because of some information absent from a reference book, such as the requirement until recently that it contain an employer's monthly signature or because a contract has expired, the employer will be alerted and a withdrawal of the charge, or "caution and discharge" will be recommended. In Cape Town, Amnesty International's delegate was told in 1984 that aid centre officers there would travel to an employer to fetch travel documents deposited with him or her. In addition, aid centre officials in both Cape Town and Johannesburg stated that their functions included helping persons lawfully in either city to find employment.

The aid centre also recommended how cases should be disposed of, whether to withdraw charges, to caution and discharge, or to proceed to a trial. The prosecutor and the commissioner in court seemed invariably to follow these recommendations. In other cases, where doubts remain as to identity or "legality", the recommendation will be for a remand in custody (RIC) for further investigation including a possible enquiry under section 29 of the 1945 Act (as to whether the person should be declared "idle or undesirable"). Indeed, in 1984 in Johannesburg it was established procedure to pass up to the commissioner hearing the case the aid centre Investigation Report Form, which included all particulars on the alleged offence, any previous convictions and recommendation as to disposition along with the charge sheet in the case. This procedure, which was observed by Amnesty International's delegate, would appear to undermine any possibility of an impartial hearing by the commissioner. The defendant may well have made admissions prejudicial to him on the aid centre form, with which the commissioner was forearmed before any evidence was led, and since the commissioner apparently always followed the aid centre's recommendation, his role was in many cases simply to rubber stamp the aid centre's judgment.

The aid centre, therefore, should be seen as an aspect of the overall influx control system. Its function, as the Riekert Commission noted, is to cut down the waste to the economy in man-hours resulting from the scale of arrests of Africans generated by that system.[2] As was emphasised by officials, negligent employers who do not keep papers in order and "technical offenders" can be speedily separated and returned to work. Through investigation of the illegal employee, the centre also gathers information on employers, which is used by the development boards in subsequent prosecutions of employers. The centre is not, therefore, as its name might imply, intended to assist the arrested person in the context of a prosecution that can result in a substantial fine or imprisonment. Rather, it is an integral part of the prosecution and trial process, necessitated by the scale and evident arbitrariness of a large number of arrests for pass law offences. As noted in Chapter 5, a high percentage of arrests (over 70% in Johannesburg in March 1984) lead to a withdrawal of charges or to a caution without a fine, following the recommendations of officials.[3] The fact that individuals have charges withdrawn or are released with a caution is a limited compensation for the disproportionate intrusion on their lives and dignity resulting from arrest, detention in degrading conditions and further processing by officialdom. It should be recalled as well that the manager of an aid centre has powers himself under the Black Labour Act to order the removal of a person, without the need for any trial to take place (see Chapter 4). No differences have resulted in the role of the aid centres, which remain under the control of the Department of Co-operation and Development, as a result of the transfer of responsibility for commissioners' courts to the Department of Justice since September 1984, with the minor exception that by commencing interviews earlier in the day the courts are able to commence their hearings earlier too.

Trial of offences in commissioners' courts (1984)

A large number of cases dealt with by these courts were observed in 1984 in Johannesburg, Cape Town and East London. In 1985, a smaller number of trials were observed, including in the main courts in Market Street, Johannesburg and at Germiston, a town neighbouring Johannesburg. At the time of Amnesty International's missions, two studies has been conducted into commissioners' courts (West 1982, Monama 1983). Monama's study was based on a two week period of observation in December 1982 at the Johannesburg commissioners' court.[4] West's study was based on the files of monitors from the Black Sash of the Langa court in Cape Town in 1982, and on personal observation.[5] Amnesty International's delegate met both these academic researchers and also visited and observed trials in the same courts that were the subject of the earlier studies. This study draws on both pieces of research and their value to this report is gratefully acknowledged.

Commissioners' courts normally commenced in the late morning to allow for processing of those arrested by the aid centres attached to the courts. The volume of arrests will vary according to the size of the city or town. In Johannesburg, where most trials were observed, there were six commissioners' courts in 1984 which sat permanently, disposing of an average 350–400 pass arrests and 100 trespass or curfew cases on a Monday (following the weekend arrests) and an average of 200 cases per day for the remainder of the week. In Cape Town and East London, normally only one court sat, but also dealt regularly with a large volume of cases. In Johannesburg, one court dealt with "section 29" enquiries, the others with pass law and related offences, with male and female defendants prosecuted in difference courts. The corridors and the public stalls in the courts were crowded. The stalls were physically divided, a legacy of the segregation policies which divided court facilities into European and non-European. More extreme remnants of this policy are to be found in rural commissioners' courts where even the dock and the witness stand are partitioned and have separate entrances for the races.

In each court the defendants were lined up in corridors leading from cells behind the courtrooms and filed into a dock when their names were called in turn. Each defendant was distinguished by surname and given a tab with a number which was left with the clerk after the case was completed. Prosecutions were disposed of with great rapidity, rarely exceeding two or three minutes for each case. The majority of defendants pleaded guilty. It was clear that all the personnel in the court were geared to the completion of the court list as the primary consideration which, given the volume of cases, required a constant flow of defendents through the court. It was not unusual to hear the clerk call another case before the previous case was completed. Frequently, relatives, friends or employers who crowded into the court to deliver a reference book or other documentation had to make frantic efforts to present these before the case was disposed of and the defendent remanded or fined and returned to custody. In one case observed, a young woman entered the dock in Court B, the prosecutor said "No reference book, R.I.C." (remand in custody), reading from the aid centre from which clearly recommended this. The young woman was led from the dock, gesticulating wildly at the prosecutor that her relatives were trying to get to the front of the court. He finally turned to see someone struggling through the packed court to hand in her reference book. She was brought back to the dock and discharged.

The most common prosecutions in Johannesburg were for the following offences: failing to produce a reference book on demand (section 15 offense); remaining in a prescribed area longer than 72 hours without permission (section 10 offense); "foreign blacks" entering a prescribed area (section 12 offense); breach of curfew regulations; trespassing on black hostels.

Once the defendent was in the dock, the prosecutor called out (for example) "twee klagtes" or "two charges", or "section 10, section 15". Alternatively, he would rapidly recite the charges and ask "how do you plead". At this juncture, the interpreter took over and recited the charges in the African language and asked how did the defendant plead. The interpreter informed the court in Afrikaans or English of the plea "guilty" or "not guilty".

If, as in the majority of cases, the plea was expressed as guilty, the commissioner asked "anything in mitigation?". The interpreter queried the defendant and informed the court. The commissioner sometimes questioned the accused briefly on what had been said and imposed sentence.

Some Illustrative Cases

In the female court, a young woman charged with the two offences, pleaded not guilty to section 10 and guilty of section 15. The commissioner asked, "Why did you plead not guilty to section 10?" and she replied,"Because this is my fourth day." The commissioner then found her guilty and asked, "Anything in mitigation?" the defendant replied, "I brought my mother's children to holiday with their mother in Johannesburg. I forgot to bring my reference book with me." The commissioner stated, "You have to have permission to come to Johannesburg," and imposed a sentence of R30 or 30 days.

A young man pleaded guilty to section 10; section 15 was withdrawn. In mitigation he stated "I came here to seek work; I have found employment, but I have no documents." The commissioner asked, "Where are you from?" He replied "The Transkei." "Did the authorities give you permission?" "No," he said. Sentenced to R35 or 35 days in prison.

In a similar case, a female defendant pleaded not guilty to an offence under section 10. After a discussion between the interpreter and the defendant she changed her plea to guilty. In mitigation she stated, "My parents are old and sickly. I cannot get a job in the Transkei to support them." She produced documents but these were valid only in the Transkei, not for Johannesburg. She was sentenced to R50 or 50 days, suspended for one year on condition that no section 10 offense would occur between April 1984-April 1985. This sentence, which was explained in detail to the defendant, was imposed because the commissioner considered that the defendant may have thought that she in fact had permission to work in Johannesburg. She was told to get permission if she wanted to come to Johannesburg.

A male defendant charged with trespassing in a black hostel pleaded guilty and explained he acted as a messenger between a husband who stayed at the hostel and his wife. The commissioner stated that he had no permission to be there and sentenced him to R40 or 80 days. This was a sentence which the commissioner had no jurisdiction to impose. The maximum penalty for the offence is R20 and/or imprisonment with or without hard labour for a period not exceeding two months.[6] The sentence was unlawful.

A woman pleaded guilty to trespass in a male hostel. She admitted previous convictions. In mitigation, she stated "I am nine months' pregnant. I entered the hostel area to look for the father." The commissioner, in giving a caution and discharge, directed her to the fourth floor of the building to take proceedings for maintenance.

A female defendant charged with breach of the curfew in Johannesburg pleaded not guilty. "I was arrested at 9.30, not 12.00 midnight." The commissioner asked if the arresting officer was in court. He was not and the case was discharged.

A female defendant pleaded guilty to section 10, and section 15. "Anything in mitigation?" asked the commissioner. "I came to Johannesburg to see my child who is in hospital." the commissioner replied "If I want to go to Cape Town, I have to arrange a place to stay. So should you. You should get permission to come here. You must have a place to stay." She was sentenced to R30 or 30 days on count one, R10 or 10 days on count two.

A male defendant pleaded guilty to breach of the curfew. "I was on my way home from work. I am a barman in a hotel." The commissioner gave a caution and discharge, and instructed the interpreter: "Tell him he should get himself a 'night special'."

A female dressed in a white shop coat pleaded guilty to breach of the curfew. "Anything in mitigation?" "I was going from my work to a shop." "Where do you work?" "I work at Continental Restaurant." "Are you working at 2 a.m.?" "We work from 11 a.m. to 2 a.m. We were making salads for the morning." "You shouldn't be out at that time of night without a night special, 20 rands or 40 days". This sentence may also have been unlawful. The maximum fine provided by law is four rand or one month for a first offence. However, for a second offence the penalties are 20 rand or three months' imprisonment. No suggestions was made that there was a previous conviction.[7]

In an East London court a series of cases related to trespass on a white farm: a woman with a child was prosecuted for being "illegally on premises without permission". She pleaded guilty. In mitigation she stated: "I went there to fetch money from my husband. He is working there. He came late. I had no transport to go home. I stayed. I am asking for pardon." The commissioner sentenced her to R10 or 10 days for having no reference book and accepted her excuse on the charge of trespass.

Assessment

While it was clear both from the cases observed by Amnesty International's delegate and those described in other studies that the quality and experience of commissioners vary considerably, it is clear to Amnesty International that the proceedings in the commissioners' courts, as observed by its delegate in 1984, did not conform to, or come near to conforming to, the international standards for a fair trial. Quite apart from the unacceptability of a judicial process organized on racial lines (subsequently condemned by the official Hoexter inquiry) and the unjust nature of the laws enforced therein, the adjudication on pass law offences in commissioners' court compounded the injustice of the pass law system.

Concerns about pass law trials relate both to the personnel of the court and to virtually every aspect of procedure.

Personnel of the Court

The Commissioner

The commissioner's function in the trial was to act as judge. He determined guilt or innocence and sentence. While the jurisdiction of the commissioners' court was confined to what might be considered minor offences, the commissioner was empowered to impose the sanction of deportation from the urban areas, a sanction which was not available to the ordinary courts. In other words, the commissioner, who was acknowledged by the Hoexter Commission to lack all independence, had greater powers than the independent judiciary. The commissioner is a civil servant who, as that report acknowledges, is required in that capacity to implement the policy of the Department of Cooperation and Development which employs him. It is incompatible with any notion of fairness that an officer of a government department should preside at a criminal trial, where the policies that have led to the prosecution and trial were laid down by other officials of the same department. The common practice whereby the commissioner also doubled as a prosecutor in other cases deserves no further comment in terms of the concept of fair trial. As noted in Chapter 4, the Department of Cooperation and Development in its evidence to the Hoexter Commission defended the status of the commissioner, claiming that his judicial functions helped "to execute government policy and to bring home to Blacks policy aspects determined by the Department". This open rejection of independence and impartiality as requisites for a judge in these cases is sufficient in itself to deny to the commissioners' court the description court, and to the commissioner the title judicial officer. The occasional commissioner observed by Amnesty International's delegate to act conscientiously (particularly the commisisoner conducting "section 29 inquiries" in Johannesburg) cannot compensate for the fundamental defect of lack of independence.

Observation of the procedures in the courts amply demonstrated that the commissioners, with few exceptions, did not act in a judicial manner. In the first place, the speed of disposition of cases in the courts, rarely lasting longer than two or three minutes, denied the possibility of individualized justice to the defendants prosecuted. When it is remembered that the commissioner often did not understand the language used by the defendant but had to rely on an interpreter it strains credulity to imagine that any real consideration can be given to a case within a matter of minutes which includes the time for translation. These trials of two or three minutes resulted in fines often equivalent to several times the weekly wage of a African or, for those unable to find the money, two or three months in prison.

The failure to act judicially in not requiring the prosecution to produce evidence and to challenge the evident illegalities in arrests under the pass laws has already been noted.[8] Other monitors of these courts observed the commissioners record convictions, where in effect the person was pleading not guilty—for example, where the accused claimed he was denied opportunity to fetch a pass—while also pleading guilty. Instead of acquitting, as ought to be done the commissioner convicted and cautioned and discharged the person. Monama points also to the commissioners' failure to check the prosecutors' free use of remands in custody, often for lengthy periods, particularly in the case of so-called "foreign blacks".[9] His observation, that the commissioner did not inform or explain the right to apply for bail, but automatically remanded in custody unless bail was requested, was confirmed during the Amnesty International mission. It is a significant indicator of the atmosphere of these courts that neither commissioner nor court officials referred to the defendants as Mr. or Mrs. but rather by surname or number.[10] Indeed, in the case of some commissioners the defendant was not addressed at all, all comments and questions being directed to the court interpreter.

Amnesty International's delegate also had the opportunity to observe the disposition of pass law prosecutions against white employers in the Johannesburg magistrates' court. The contrast was considerable, not least in the time taken over each case, the attitude of the magistrate to the defendants and in the sentences imposed. It was particularly noticeable that the magistrate responded sympathetically to the most common defence of ignorance or confusion over the bureaucratic procedures involved in hiring African employees, a response wholly absent from the commissioners' court in dealing with the employees in question.

Prosecutors

In some instances prosecutors in the commissioners' courts had a modicum of training, but in the majority of cases, they were junior civil servants drawn from clerical and administrative grades with limited general educational attainment and no legal knowledge. The Hoexter Commission commented upon the "disturbingly low average level of experience of prosecutors", in both commissioners' and magistrates' courts in South Africa. The prosecutor's function seemed to consist only in the announcing of charges or the withdrawing of them on the basis of the case comments. In Cape Town, West found that it had been quite common for the prosecutor to double as interpreter.[10] It was clear in all trials observed by Amnesty International's delegate that the prosecutor was not personally acquainted with the facts in any case he presented, or in a position to prove any feature of any case if called upon. On no occasion where trials were observed did the prosecutor call a witness. In no case, indeed, was any evidence as such called by anyone, except in the "idle and undesirable" enquiry procedures. The majority of defendants pleaded guilty, but where a not guilty plea was made, the prosecutor was never in a position to lead evidence, and as bail was not normally preferred, or given if sought, an accused was in effect punished for pleading not guilty by a remand in custody. This could often mean a loss of a job as well as imprisonment for some weeks. It was largely because of these realities in the commissioners' courts that Africans pleaded guilty. In summary, the prosecutor acted in that capacity in name only in the trials attended by Amnesty International's delegate in 1984.

Interpreters

The South African legal system must accommodate to a multi-lingual society. The official languages are Afrikaans and English. In addition, there is a plurality of African languages which lack official status. In legal proceedings, the function of an interpreter is crucial and the availability of interpretation is guaranteed by South African law. Where the interpreter acts for all parties in the court, including prosecutor and defendant, his role is especially crucial. In the commissioners' courts, the interpreters were often police officers or court clerks who doubled as interpreters. As noted, the prosecutor has been known to assume the role simultaneously of interpreter in some courts.

The prosecutor often left the reciting of the full charge to the interpreter, who in turn frequently failed to recite it in full to the defendant, but summarized it only. Equally, the interpreter might fail to narrate what the accused actually said, representing it by "he pleads guilty", or "he pleads not guilty". Thus Monama notes that in practice the offense of remaining in a prescribed area without permission longer than 72 hours (section 10 of the 1945 Act) is represented as follows: "You were found within the prescribed area for more than 72 hours. Is that so?" A reply of "yes" is then translated to the court as "guilty".[11]

In conversation with Amnesty International's delegate, an interpreter in Johannesburg admitted that he summarized rather than narrated the evidence. Much of what the accused might say was not recited to the court, "because he might talk about all kinds of irrelevant things". But what is relevant or irrelevant under these complex offenses should in principle be a matter for the court to determine, not an interpreter. This role of the interpreter in "double translation"—summarizing the charges for the accused and translating his replies into bureaucratic and court language—must raise serious possibilities of innocent defendants being convicted. This is all the more likely when the haste with which the cases were dispatched is considered and the fact that virtually all defendants are unrepresented. The affinity of the interpreter with the court and its routines and pressures was reflected in the rendering by him of mitigation evidence: it was noticeable in different courts that apart from exegesis of the accused's remarks, what he might consider a "tall story" was not infrequently rendered with a smile to the court.

It was also noticeable that the proceedings operated on the assumption that an interpreter was always needed. The accused was not asked if he or she could speak English or Afrikaans. Yet many of those convicted were clearly employees and maids who lived or had been born in the cities and by necessity must speak one of these languages. It was probable in may cases that the people unaccustomed to courts assumed that when they were addressed in Xhosa, for example, they must reply in that language. To impose, in effect, the need for translation clearly increased the risks of false convictions. In one case, at least, which was not observed but described to Amnesty International's delegate by the defendant involved, the commissioner insisted that the accused speak in an African language, despite the fact that he understood English. However, in other cases observed, if the accused replied in English or Afrikaans the case proceeded in that language. The point, however, is that the accused person was not asked at the outset whether an interpreter was needed.

Legal representation of defendants

Of the trials observed in 1984, an accused was represented in only one case. It is clear that virtually every defendant in the commissioners' courts was unrepresented, something which had not changed in 1985. Notices advertising the availability of legal aid and advice were posted at the courts in Johannesburg, giving telephone numbers to ring, but no service is provided at the courts and clearly the vast majority of defendants are either unaware of the possibility or do not avail themselves of it. It is clear that the absence of legal representation diminishes to vanishing point the chances of fair trial in the commissioners' courts. The involvement of human rights organizations in legal representation of pass offenders is discussed below.

Bail

One factor other than lack of means which was known to contribute to the virtual absence of lawyers was fear on the part of the accused that contesting a case would lead to adjournments and remands in custody. It was confirmed by organizations concerned such as the Black Sash (which had attempted to arrange legal representation in some cases) that Africans caught up in the pass law system prefer, if they can, to plead guilty and to pay a fine in order to get out of the clutches of officials as quickly as possible. The "drawback", that legal representation would lead to delays with defendants being remanded in custody, was mentioned by several commissioners in interview. They were generally hostile to the idea that legal representation was necessary or desirable. Nor, it seems, would remand on bail be favourably considered as a general policy. It was a general view of all personnel associated with these courts who were interviewed that bail should only be rarely granted because people would not return for trial. No evidence was offered to support these opinions. It has been claimed that a policy directive has been issued to commissioners not to grant bail.[12] This could not be confirmed during the Amnesty International missions, but it was clear that, apart from several cases observed in East London, no commissioner or prosecutor raised the possibility of bail when a case was being adjourned. While bail was granted on occasions at the request of the accused (although more often refused), it was fixed at what must be considered a high rate given the usual fines for the offences in issue. The scale of the injustice involved in the refusal of bail or setting it impossibly high is underlined by the fact that anything from a quarter to one third of all cases observed in several days in Johannesburg were adjourned by the prosecutor for periods of normally two weeks.[13]

Sentencing

Disposition or sentence in the commissioners' courts in the observed cases seemed highly arbitrary. Heavy fines were routinely imposed without any apparent concern on the part of the commissioner as to the ability of a defendant to pay. The default term of imprisonment fixed should the fine not be paid (and paid immediately) normally was an equivalent number of days' imprisonment to the number of rands imposed, and occasionally even double the fine.

The ratio between fine and days in prison of one rand to one day creates an obvious disproportion where, unable to pay a fine of R70, for example, a person would spend 70 days committed to prison. This is an even more serious matter since pass offenders convicted in the commissioners' courts are known to be contracted out to farmers for the duration of their sentence—a form of forced labour condemned under the International Labour Organization (ILO) Conventions, and which is discussed in chapter 7.

The high proportion of offenders who are committed to prison in default of payment of a fine is of major concern, particularly when it is known that the proportion is much lower in the case of ordinary criminal convictions, Monama found for December 1982 that, out of a total of 555 convictions surveyed in the commissioners' courts in Johannesburg, 44 per cent of these sentenced were committed to prison. Similarly, West confirmed from official criminal statistics that the figure is approximately 40 per cent. Since imprisonment is only exceptionally available as a direct penalty for breach of the pass laws, it is clear that the majority of those in prison were there because they could not afford to pay the fine imposed. Figures for March 1984 which were made available to Amnesty International's delegate by the aid centre in Johannesburg and which concerned convictions under section 10 (remaining in an urban area without a permit for longer than 72 hours) show that 446 defendants paid fines and 989 were jailed in default for periods up to the maximum of three months. These figures, however, would be reduced by the number who had fines paid for them at the prison—an unknown percentage.

If time were allowed to pay fines, as is permitted by the Criminal Procedure Act, at the discretion of the court, it is clear the numbers sent to prison would fall sharply. The injustices involved need no underlining, not least in the many cases, known to monitors of these courts, where a person within the space of twenty four hours or less may be arrested, convicted and imprisoned without relatives being aware what has befallen him or her. The authorities cannot be unaware of this and it must therefore be deliberate policy implemented by the commissioners' courts to require immediate payment of fines at the court. That this is the case is evident from the fact that the valuable institution of the "Prisoner's Friend", an official available at criminal courts in South Africa to help defendants and relatives after convictions with the payment of fines, functions differently in the pass courts than in the ordinary magistrates' courts. Thus, in the Cape Town magistrates' court, this official has authority to grant time to pay fines for criminal offences, even to waive them in certain cases. When interviewed by Amnesty International's delegate, the official proudly stated that no one had gone to prison for non-payment of a fine in the previous three months. The equivalent official in the pass court, however, had no authority to defer fines. The discrimination effected through administrative policy whereby the non-criminal pass offender is committed to prison while the ordinary criminal offender is given every opportunity to pay a fine is blatant and indefensible. This topic is discussed further in chapter 7.

Appeal

It is possible to appeal from the commissioners' court to the Supreme Court. However, no appeals are brought. No one to whom the observer spoke could recall an appeal ever having been brought over conviction or sentence. It was remarkable that this situation was not seen as a matter for concern by those who administered justice in the commissioner's courts. The chief presiding officer in the Johannesburg court, when interviewed, took a complacent view: "The safeguards are such that there is nothing to appeal about". South African criminal procedure does provide for an alternative safeguard, automatic review of sentences of lower courts, where the sentence is in excess of three months or R250. However, the maximum sentences that commissioners' had power to impose normally fell below that limit and, therefore, commissioners' decisions (other than under section 29 inquiries) were effectively immune from review. In the result the commissioners' courts have functioned for many years with no scrutiny from anyone outside the department that ran them and dictated policy within them.

Conclusions on the trial process

This chapter has so far examined the major features of trial procedures in the administration of the pass laws as observed in 1984. It has found blatant and serious fault in terms of the international standards of fair trial and confirms the similar assessments in the West and Monama studies. The decision to remove responsibility for pass law courts to the Department of Justice, and the recent decision to implement soon the other recommendation of the Hoexter Commission, to abolish these courts, is welcome. However, as the experience since September 1984 when the Department of Justice took responsibility for these courts establishes, improved judicial procedures and standards in themself are insufficient to make arbitrary and discriminatory laws acceptable. The pass laws directly violate international standards in leading to imprisonment on grounds of race. Fairer procedures may mitigate their effect but only to a limited extent. To ensure justice and respect for fundamental human rights, it is their abolition that is required.

The transfer of responsibility for the commissioner's courts to the department of justice and its effects

The Hoexter Commission's recommendation that the Department of Justice take on responsibility for the administration of justice in commissioners' courts came into practical effect from 1 September 1984. This did not entail the abolition of the courts, as some newspaper comment claimed, but rather a series of changes which taken together have removed some of the more arbitrary features of proceedings in the pass law courts before that date. The most siginificant effects have resulted from changes in personnel. In the major centres such as Johannesburg and Cape Town, commissioners who had been hearing cases have been transferred from these duties and replaced by more experienced magistrates (all of whom by law are also entitled to exercise commissioners' functions). Apart from Johannesburg, hearings of violation of the pass laws are no longer taken in separate courts, but integrated with the lists of offences in the ordinary magistrates' courts building. In Johannesburg, however, the courts are still held in the commissioners' buildings although there is now a smaller number of courts and fewer cases to be heard.

In other centres across the country, however, the transfer of responsibility has resulted apparently in nominal changes only. In a speech on the opening of a magistrates' court building in the KaNgwane homeland in March 1985 the Chief Minister, E.J. Mabuza, commented:

"The commissioners' courts are still there and they sit as commissioners' courts and their jurisdiction has not been altered. In some cases, the court officials of the commissioners' courts, as they were before 1 September 1984, have been appointed by the Department of Justice in the same capacities, from the court interpreter right up to the presiding officer. All the changes that have occurred have simply been a movement from one building to the other. The same heads are wearing the same caps, the only difference being that the caps have just slightly been turned".

Nevertheless, those with experience of monitoring the commissioners' courts in Cape Town and Johannesburg have confirmed that the standards of adjudication have improved. The most important change identified and confirmed by Amnesty International's delegate has been in the quality of prosecution staff. Prosecutors now insist on a written statement from an arresting officer before proceeding with a prosecution, in an attempt to reduce the enormous scale of arbitrary arrests associated with the enforcement of the pass laws. In 1984, up to 70 per cent of monthly arrests in Johannesburg under the pass laws led to a withdrawal of the prosecution in the face of the court or to a conditional discharge. Now, the Department of Justice prosecutors do not proceed at all with these cases, leading to the release of the arrested person from the court building before appearance in court. In October 1984, it was reported that more than two thirds of people arrested for pass offences in Johannesburg were being released before prosecution because the police were not following the new procedures.

It is not clear, however, what impact this policy is having on actual arrest. In March 1984, some 5,870 people were interviewed by the Johannesburg Aid Centre following arrest. This had dropped dramatically to 1,765 in March 1985, seven months after the takeover by the Department of Justice. However, it is unclear whether the reduction results from an actual decine in total arrests. Amnesty International's delegate was informed that there was now a policy of distributing pass arrests over the many local police and magistrates' courts within Johannesburg. It was also believed by some that the reduction in arrests, if there had been such, was a consequence of the redeployment of the police to deal with township violence, which had been accelerating through 1984 and which ultimately led to the imposition of a state of emergency in certain areas in July 1985.

As a result of the reduction in the number of cases being heard by the magistrates, for whatever reason, and the more careful screening by the prosecutors, it was evident that more attention could be devoted to each particular case. Nevertheless, following personal observation by Amnesty International's delegate in several centres, the conclusion must be drawn that the improvements achieved or that are possible of achievement are modest. The atmosphere now conforms more to that of a court, but the system is still based in the guilty plea and on an administrative rather than judical process.

The prosecutor is rarely in a position to produce any evidence whatsoever to prove the charges. He relies on the police statement and on the information which may include incriminating admissions from the earlier aid centre interview. Where the defendant pleads not guilty he is rarely able to respond except as before by withdrawing the charge or seeking a remand in custody. Further, the fact that the major offence, "being in a prescribed area for more than 72 hours without permission", is defined so as to place the full onus of proof on the defendant encourages enforcement by guilty plea, and taints the entire procedure with unfairness. It remains a system that functions in the routine case by prior interrogation at the aid centre, with no opportunity granted for the accused to consult a lawyer in advance, where the prosecutor is unable to provide any evidence independent of what can be extracted from an unrepresented, often poorly educated and confused defendant.

One important change for a minority of defendants who wish to have legal representation is that bail will be more readily granted where an adjournment is sought in court for that reason. As previously noted, it was the denial of bail and the insistence on remand in custody by the former commissioners which resulted in an even greater proportion of people being prepared to plead guilty so as to avoide time in prison on remand.

Generally, sentencing in the courts is now more moderate and consistent between cases. Thus, in one morning's cases observed in the Germiston Commissioners' Court, all but one was disposed of by a suspended fine.

In summary, the evidence is that the prosecutors and magistrates operating, at least in the courts observed, have through more professional attitudes moderated the arbitrary character of the former commissioner-run courts. While this is to be welcomed, it does not remove the injustice inherent in an essentially non-judicial process that functions through the admission of guilt by the defendant. Nor can any reform of procedure change the racially discriminatory nature of the laws themselves. It requires to be repeated that only the final abolition of offences and laws which permit the imprisonment of black people for exercising their freedom of movement could constitute acceptable reform.

CHAPTER SEVEN: ENFORCING THE PASS LAWS: PUNISHMENT AND FORCED LABOUR

Sentencing by commissioners' courts was considered in the previous chapter. This chapter examines the fate of the pass offender following conviction and sentence. While a considerable proportion of those convicted are discharged with a caution, most are fined or imprisoned. Thereafter, some face the further sanction of deportation or repatriation, as outlined in Chapter 3. It should also be recalled that powers exist to direct Africans to prison "farm colonies" without the requirement of a conviction and with or without an administrative inquiry into alleged idleness or undesirability.[1] All of these dispositions and penalties result from offences created by South African law out of the movement, residence or presence of Africans, offences which violate the Universal Declaration of Human Rights in multiple ways, as outlined in Chapter 1. All of them also follow procedures which fall short of international standards of fair trial.

Fines

Most of the numerous offences created under the pass laws provide a fine as the penalty. Imprisonment as a primary sanction is normally imposed only where the person has previous pass law convictions and, in the cases of so-called "foreign blacks", in urban areas without permission.

For the majority of pass offenders, therefore, conviction results in a fine. Given the scale of prosecutions, such fines involve the extraction of considerable sums of money from what is, in effect, the poorest section of the population. In 1983, in the seven administration board districts of the transvaal alone, 146,200 convictions brought in a total of R1,119,618 in fines. Of this amount R218,252 went directly to the state and R901,366 to the individual regional boards. In the Western Cape, the total amount paid in fines for 1983 was R723,257. Africans paid R545,000 of this through commissioners' courts, and employers of illegal labour R178,258 through magistrates' courts.[2]

The administration boards before disestablishment in 1984 were responsible for enforcing influx control and were required to be self-financing. Their principal sources of revenue came from sales in liquor stores in the black townships, which until recent times were exclusively owned by the boards, and from pass law fines. Whether designedly or not, the policy of heavy fines in the commissioners' courts augmented revenue. The African population was, in effect, required to pay for the influx control system of which it was the sole victim.

Default imprisonment

The fact that the imposition of large fines leads to the immediate committal to prison of an estimated one in three of those convicted in the pass courts, unable to raise the fine, has already been noted.[3] The practice which ensures this, of ordering an equivalent number of days' imprisonment (or double the days of imprisonment) to the fine imposed (e.g. R70 or 70 days; R40, or 80 days), was criticised as disproportionate, arbitrary and frequently illegal. It is a principle of sentencing law in South Africa that a fine should be proportionate to an offender's ability to pay and the law also allows, at the discretion of the court, time to pay a fine.[4] In Chapter 6 it was noted that in the Athlone magistrates' court, Cape Town, the Prisoner's Friend exercised such a discretion at the direction of the court for ordinary criminal offences, implementing an official policy to curb prison numbers. A different policy was evident in the commissioners' courts. Immediate payment was required to the fines officer before the person could be released, leading to the foreseeable result of large scale committal to prison for those who had no means or no relative on hand to pay the fine. An unknown proportion of such offenders have fines paid at the prison by relatives, and are released, but a considerable proportion remain imprisoned.

Commissioners and other officials interviewed seemed unconcerned about this outcome of their sentencing, commenting only that if fines were not immediately paid people would not pay them and could not thereafter easily be traced. Whatever merit this had as an argument in the case of those "illegally" in the cities, Africans charged with offences such as breach of curfew or reference book offences were for the most part qualified to be in the urban areas and had fixed addresses.

The majority of those committed to prison because of their inability to pay fines are immediately "paroled" for farm labour or allocated to cleaning duties at police stations or other public buildings for the duration of their sentences. In the Johannesburg commissioners' courts in 1985, then presided over by magistrates, pass offenders unable to pay fines were apparently allocated directly from the court cells to cleaning duties in police stations, without committal to a prison, suggesting a system of conscious exploitation. Such a practice appears to be a variant of the scheme first introduced in the 1940s, also in Johannesburg, whereby, acting under official instruction, commissioners offered Africans arrested for pass offences the "choice" of farm labour for periods up to twelve months or facing prosecution.[5] Amnesty International's delegate was informed that today on the borders of the Orange Free State this exploitation of pass victims has been known to take an equally explicit form. Raids on black settlements by Orange-Vaal Board officials were alleged to coincide with harvest time (the months of September, October and November), and it was claimed that Africans are "sold" outside court houses, following conviction for squatting and other pass infringements, to local wheat and maize farmers in the Orange Free State.

There would appear to have been indifference on the part of commissioners to the scale of default imprisonment flowing from their sentencing policies. The moderation in sentencing evident in Johannesburg since the Department of Justice was given responsibility for commissioners' courts in late 1984, was discussed in Chapter 6. Such a change in policy, if general throughout South Africa, could lead to a reduction in default imprisonment and to the abuses long associated with it, including the forced labour of pass victims on farms and other places.

"Who wants to be sold?"—The parole scheme and the pass offender[6]

Section 75 of the South Africa Prisons Act 1959, entitled "agreement for labour of prisoners", provides that subject to the employment of prisoners on public works to the extent possible, the prison authorities may contract with private persons for firms for the employment of prison labour. This provision of the Prisons Act, and limited statistical information in the annual Report of the Commissioner of Prisons, is the only formal acknowledgement of a system of forced labour involving pass offenders and most other categories of African prisoners which has functioned in different guises in South Africa for over a century. The act, in the words of one former Minister of Prisons, authorizes the "lease" of prisoners "to any person, body of persons, organisation or authority which the Commissioner of Prisons thinks fit." [7]

The various schemes, such as the 1940s' "inter-departmental" scheme already mentioned, which have existed over many years for the utilisation of prison labour by both state and private interests have been documented elsewhere.[8] The current system is termed "parole", a description which appears to have been deliberately chosen to suggest what would be ordinary penal in many countries. Thus the Official Yearbook of the Republic of South Africa 1980-81, describes parole as follows:

"The basic principles of release on parole, which have been adopted by most Western countries, are incorporated in the penological legislation of South Africa. Release on parole is subject to certain basic requirements and considerations—the most important being employment, accommodation and aftercare. With few exceptions those serving sentences of up to six months are released on parole mostly on reception or at other times during their sentences. Prisoners serving longer than six months may also be released on parole after having served certain portions of their sentences. On release a prisoner is given free transport to his home or place of work and is supplied with sufficient clothing if he has no clothes of his own." (emphasis added) [9]

In this account there is a deliberate equating of "instant" parole—immediate diversion on reception into prison of the bulk of offenders serving sentences of less than two years (who are disproportionately black) [10] to perform labour for private interests—with the normal concept of release of prisoners who have served a proportion of a sentence of imprisonment and who under supervision are free to lead an ordinary life in the community. "Instant" parole is, in fact, a unique South African institution whereby thousands of prisoners, including pass victims, are, in the accurate argot of warders and African prisoners, "sold" principally to white farmers as virtual free labour.

A South African study of prison work explains the parole scheme as follows:

". . . immediately after being sentenced prisoners are asked of they would rather serve their sentence in prison or be released on parole to work for a private person at market wages. The majority of prisoners opt for parole. The standard contract is entered into between the employer and the parolee which states that the employer must be responsible for the food, clothing and shelter of the prisoner and on expiry of the parole period the prisoner must be returned to the prison. In addition the employer must pay the parolee the current market wages in his particular district. The maximum hours of work are stipulated as being ten per day. The employer has no right of restraint over the parolee who can leave the employment and return to prison if he wants to do so." [11]

This account does not acknowledge either that the scheme as described violates in principle the International Labour Organisation's (ILO) Conventions on Forced Labour (to which, however, South Africa is not a party) or that the actual operation of the scheme involves no real choice for the offender and little or no possibility of return to prison before the expiration of sentence. While the study makes reference to abuses in the past resulting from similar schemes and to the lack of safeguards for the prisoner, it does not confront the cumulative evidence over many years of the gross physical abuse of prisoners by white farmers. Nor does it document the often very low level of "market wages" and poor conditions which characterise the lot of African prisoners paroled for farm labour. The Viljoen Commission into the South African Penal System, which reported in 1976, equally emphasised the formal protections of prisoners laid down in the hiring contract between private employers and the prisons department, including inspection by prison staff of accommodation and food.[12] It is clear, however, from the recurrent cases that come to public notice, that such inspection as is undertaken is not sufficient to prevent abuse of prison labour on a substantial scale. This may be reflected to some extent by the fact that in 1983-84 Africans (in total, 4,115) constituted three quarters of the parolees who absconded from employers.[13]

Statistics on the use of parole

The scale of private or state use of prison labour outside of prison in South Africa is not easily determined because little official information is released on the subject, as is the case with the prison system generally. In 1973-1974, a total of 276,871 persons were imprisoned for one to four months (including the four nominally independent homelands—the so-called TVBC states). Of these, 112,094 or 40 percent were released within twenty four hours of admission to prison and sent primarily to farms.[14] In 1983-1984, 188,660 prisoners were admitted to prison for terms from one to four months (a total excluding the TBVC states). Of these a total of 54,366 "units" were released on parole. Of this total 40,624 were African male and female, 129 were whites, 74 Asian and 11,539 Coloured. All cases of immediate parole (those sentenced to two years and under) numbered 77,344 in 1983-1984, of which 58,925 were African, and the likelihood is that most, male as well as female, were made available to private employers including farmers.[15] It is not possible on the available figures to determine what percentage of the total were imprisoned for pass offenses but it is likely that they constituted a substantial proportion of the total.

The parole scheme and the ILO convention on forced labour (No. 29) 1930

Under the Forced Labour Convention 1930, the term "forced or compulsory labour" means, "all work or service which is exacted from any person under the menace of any penalty and for which the said person has not offered himself voluntarily".

An important exception is:

"Any work or service exacted from any person as a consequence of a conviction in a court of law, provided that the said work or service is carried out under the supervision and control of a public authority and that the said person is not hired to or placed at the disposal of private individuals, companies or associations." (Article 2(2)(c)).

Prison work followed conviction for a criminal offence, therefore, does not constitute forced labour provided the conditions cited are met. In South Africa these conditions are not met with respect to pass law cases. In the first place, the requirement that a conviction in a court of law should be a pre-requisite to compulsory labour in prison is absent in those instances where, under administrative direction, Africans are sent to "farm colonies" (section 29 inquiries, Chapter 3 above). The Prisons Act defines a "farm colony" as a place where prisoners are sent "to learn habits of industry and labour". In March 1982, there were 195 prisoners undertaking forced labour at such farm colonies, following inquiries by commissioners under Section 29 of the 1945 Act.[16]

The requirement of a conviction in a court of law, is in any event not satisfied, even where prosecutions take place, because of the nature of the commisioners' courts which deal with pass cases. As noted by the Committee of Experts in its commentary on the Convention,

"This provision aims at ensuring that penal labour will not be imposed unless the guarantees laid down in the general principles of law recognised by the community of nations are observed, such as the presumption of innocence, equality before the law, regularity and impartiality of proceedings, independence and impartiality of courts, guarantees necessary for defence, clear definition of the offence and non-retroactivity of penal law." [17]

The lack of independence of the officials who try the bulk of pass law offences and the non-observance of the normal guarantees of fair trial in commissioners' courts has been fully documented in Chapter 6, and was also confirmed by the Hoexter Commission. It follows, therefore, that from the outset labour extracted from any person imprisoned through the commissioners' courts, whether imprisoned directly or by reason of non-payment of a fine, constitutes forced labour under the Convention of 1930.

Apart from the absence of fair trial guarantees and an independent court, the parole system to which the bulk of those imprisoned under the pass laws are exposed, as well as thousands of other sentenced prisoners, is in itself incompatible with the Convention, which specifically excludes the use of prison labour by private interests (section 2(c) cited above). Article 4 of the Convention imposes an obligation on a state party not "to impose or permit the imposition of forced or compulsory labour for the benefit of private individuals, companies or associations". South Africa, however, is not a party to the Convention, nor is it currently a member of the ILO. The Committee of Experts on the ILO Forced Labour Convention has commented that both the requirement of a conviction by a court and the prohibition on putting prisoners at the disposal of private individuals, companies, or associations in the Convention, "are important guarantees against the administration of the penal system being diverted from its true course by coming to be considered as a means of meeting labour requirements".[18]

The South African penal system in practice illustrates such a diversion from the true purposes of imprisonment, for the precise purpose of meeting labour requirements.

The parole scheme and the forced labour convention (No. 105) 1957

Under this supplementary Convention, to which South Africa is not a party, forced or compulsory labour for certain purposes is condemned, including, under Article 1(b), "as a means of racial, social, national or religious discrimination". The exaction of labour from those convicted under the pass laws constitutes the most direct contradiction of this norm. Only Africans may be guilty of pass law offences, and the laws are, therefore, explicitly racially discriminatory. Any labour by those imprisoned under the pass laws, whether normal prison work or work outside prison for the state or for private persons such as farmers, must under the 1957 Convention be condemned as forced or compulsory labour in addition to the extent that such labour is independently in violation of the 1930 Convention on Forced Labour.

The operation of parole

While information from official sources on the use of prison labour outside of prison is sparse, sufficient detail has emerged from court records, newspaper reports and prisoners themselves to justify the greatest concern by the international community over this largely invisible dimension of apartheid. Further research, however, is required before a full picture emerges and certain aspects only are highlighted here.

"Consent" to parole

A common official response to criticism of the use of prison labour on private farms is to claim that the scheme is entirely voluntary. Prisoners, it is said, have a choice whether to be paroled or whether to remain in prison and may return to the prison at any time from the farms or other places. The evidence is overwhelming that this official view presents a false picture of the functioning of parole.

In practice, it is reported that prisoners are selected and sent to farms without any real choice. While there, they are locked up at night in cell-like accommodation and, in many cases, they are, in effect, not free to return to prison. They are often subjected to very long hours of work, live in wretched conditions, receive poor wages, and are frequently the victims of systematic brutality.

Africans who have been regularly arrested for squatting at Grasmere in the southern Transvaal told Amnesty International's delegate in 1985 that on being sent to farms they had clothes and shoes removed to prevent escape and were given sacks to wear. At night they slept in barns on sacks. There is little evidence to suggest that conditions and treatment "on parole" in the 1980s have changed significantly from the 1940s and 1950s when, as noted by Allen Cook in his study:

"Once [on the farms] all schemes were the same. Labourers got the same 'uniform', a sack with holes cut out for the head and arms—a tell-tale garment on the country roads should a 'volunteer' try to escape. Labourers were locked and guarded in the same foul 'compounds', whipped and driven with the same whips and sticks, fed with the same maize porridge, regardless of which particular 'scheme' has ensnared them—or even indeed if they had gone to the farm of their own 'free' will."[19]

The involuntary nature of the present-day system is confirmed by the frequent complaints conveyed to Amnesty International's delegate of obstruction or of refusal by prison officials to co-operate when relatives who find the money for fines attempt to pay them at the prison. The law permits a fine to be paid at any time and the prisoner should be brought back from a farm to the prison to be released. However, it was said that once the unfortunate prisoner had been sent to a farm, only the intervention of a lawyer, unavailable to most Africans, and the threat of legal action, would secure his or her release from a farm.

It is not possible, of course, to assess to what extent such conditions prevail in every parole situation. However, in view of the large number of cases of ill-treatment of parolees recorded over the past two decades, it appears that the parole system does result in widespread abuse. At the least, the evidence suggests that a government inquiry into the operation of the parole system and the treatment of parolees is justified. Some of the cases reported over the last 20 years are recounted below.

Selection for parole

As already noted, the great majority of those prisoners who are destined for farms are released into the custody of the farmer within one or two days after admission to prison. The common procedure has been documented in a number of civil and criminal proceedings. Thus the experience of one pass offender committed to Modderbee Prison, Benoni, in 1979, came to light in statements taken by lawyers for a Supreme Court action by three ex-parolees against their former employers:

"My name is Frans Le Kwapa Mokonoto, I am 35 years old . . . a builder by trade. I have what is known as a 'black certificate' for building which I obtained from the State Industrial School in Hammanskraal.

"On Thursday, 8 March 1979, I was arrested in Parkhurst, Johannesburg, while on my way to visit [a friend]. I was arrested because my pass book was not in order and I appeared in court on Friday 9. I was found guilty and sentenced to a fine of R60.00 or 60 days' imprisonment. On the same day I was transferred to Modderbee Prison . . . On the following Monday, I was examined by a prison department doctor and certified fit to work, and sold to Mr————. We were all lined up in a big room where there were 50 or 60 prisoners, then white policemen called some of us out. We were given a ticket on which was written our name, our sentence and our date of release. We had no option of whether to go or not. At no time was I asked whether I wanted to do farm labour."

It is to be noted that Frans Mokonoto was a qualified builder, not a farm labourer, yet he was immediately selected to work on a farm. His statement goes on to recount, the beatings he received at the hands of foremen on the farm because, unaccustomed to picking tomatoes, he was slower than other prisoners selected.

In several other statements made by parolees for the purposes of this case, it emerged that only one was asked if he wished to do farm labour. A plaintiff in the case, Petrus Mofokeng, stated in his evidence in court that, following conviction for a general tax offence and unable to pay the fine, he was taken to Modderbee prison from where he was fetched by the farmer and taken to his farm. At this stage he had no idea he was being "paroled", in prison he had signed a form with his thumb print but had not been given the opportunity to read it, although he could both read and write.

It also emerged that the farmers who arrive at the prison to "lease" labour do not directly select the prisoners. Instead, prisoners were allocated to them by police or prison staff. The farmer apparently tells the officer for what periods he will require the prisoners as labourers, and parolees are then selected according to the length of sentence and the requirement of the farmer. Prison labour is particularly in demand during harvesting season. It appears that pass offenders who are given a default sentence of two weeks or less are sent to police stations or allocated to cleaning duties at other public buildings such as the mortuary, while those with longer sentences are sent to farms.

Treatment of parolees on farms

The treatment claimed to have been meted out to parolees on at least one farm gained attention as a result of the case brought by Frans Mokonoto in 1980. A prosecution for assault brought against a farmer by a parolee led to an acquittal. Thereafter, three exparolees initiated a civil action for assault, which after it had commenced, was settled out of court on terms that were not disclosed.[20] Detailed allegations that a systematic brutality was practised at the farm emerged from evidence given in both court cases and from statements made for purposes of the case by the plaintiffs and other parolees as witnesses. It is to be noted, however, that most of these allegations were denied and were not proved in the court since the case was settled:

1. Assaults on prisoners with fists, sjamboks and sticks with coat hanger wire attached at the ends were alleged to be commonplace, and were allegedly carried out by the farmer, his son, by black foremen or "imbalas" and by "old" parolees, who had remained on after expiration of sentence as farm labourers.

2. Contrary to the requirement of the contract to supply prison labour, prisoners were locked up nightly in a large unlit cell with barred windows and a padlocked door. Prisoners uniformly referred in their statements to the living quarters as a cell.

3. Prisoners earned 45-60 cents per day and worked six days per week as long as was required. The maximum laid down in the Prison Rules is ten hours per day.

4. All new prisoners, on arriving at the farm, it was claimed, were assaulted to accustom them to the "law of the farm" and to discourage them from running away. One parolee stated:

"Altogether 13 of us prisoners were taken by [the farmer]. When we arrived at the farm after about three hours we were met by a man who I later learned was the farmer's son. The farmer told his son that I had been pointing at him, while I was being transported on the back of the van. The son hit me with his fist in my face. This assault took place while we were standing where the truck offloaded us. I tried to explain that I had merely been gesticulating to my fellow prisoners and not pointing [at the farmer] but this was to no avail. [We were] then instructed to go to work.

"When we knocked off after the first day's work, we were taken to a big dormitory. When we went there at night we were locked in and the room was opened again in the morning. We were warned by the other prisoners on the farm that that night there would be trouble. That evening after we had eaten, [the farmer's] son came into the cell. He was accompanied by five black workers who were not prisoners and who served as our supervisors on the farm. These men were carrying sticks which we in prison call 'donkie piels'. I was singled out from the new prisoners and was punched and kicked in the mouth and back after I had fallen down. I lost roughly four to six teeth in the bottom row and my mouth was bleeding. They said they had singled me out because I had been pointing in the back of the van that morning. The son instructed supervisors to take me out and wash my mouth out. When I came back in, I saw that the 12 other new prisoners were lying on their stomachs having stripped naked. These men were being hit on the back with the donkie piels by the workers. Every Tuesday and Friday, the son and some five workers would come to the cell and would beat up the new prisoners. The form of the beatings was the same. That is, the new prisoners would have to strip naked, lie on their stomachs on the floor, and would get beaten with donkie piels.

"We used to start work at 6.00 in the morning and work until 6.00 in the evening. Sometimes we worked later, even as late as a quarter to eight. We had one break during the day. That was at ten o'clock in the morning when we had a fifteen minute break for lunch. Our work was in the fields on the farm. Mr. —— was growing pumpkins, tomatoes and peaches. Our job was to dig in the fields to pick the fruit and vegetables and to put it in bags. Most of the work we did was with the peaches. For lunch we were given porridge mixed with milk but the milk tasted as though it had been mixed with water.

"While we were working in the fields, we were supervised by two black workers employed by the farmer. They carried sticks with them. There was no one from the prison who gave any supervision or control.

"[There were] five of [the farmer's] own workers working on the farm, in addition he had about 60 prison workers. On Tuesdays and Fridays, he or his son would go to Modderbee to return and hire prison labourers."

5. New prisoners were allegedly subjected to a variety of initiation ceremonies, consisting of prolonged beatings, humiliations and forced exercises. One prisoner who had been given R70/90 days' sentence for non-payment of a traffic fine, related one such "ceremony":

"In the cell the new prisoners were put on one side in the toilet and called out one by one and told take off their clothes by the "indunas". A plate was put on the floor and we were made to run around the plate and they would hit us with belts on our backs. They also hit us with their hands on our faces and the front of our bodies. The other prisoners had to sing while this was going on. I and the two other older prisoners were not made to do this for a long time, but the younger ones were made to do this for a much longer time. I was sore and I bled from my nose and mouth. We were then given blankets but had to share with some of the other new prisoners. We then went to sleep."

The ritual beatings and reference to singing while this ill-treatment was being administered is significant. Forcing African prisoners to sing and to dance while under ritual assaults was alleged by other prisoners interviewed during the Amnesty International missions to be a common form of "entertainment" with the prisons themselves, which are discussed later in this chapter.

The forced exercises complained of by prisoners included one where they were required to lie flat on the ground, naked, inside their living quarters. Large stones were then placed on their backs and they were ordered to do press ups. Another such exercise outside of the cell was recalled by one parolee as follows:

"One of the forms of punishment which occurred regularly on the farm was that the prisoners were made to pick up concrete blocks and carry them over their heads. We were told to stand in lines. We had to lift up and put down the blocks while he called 'panzi' and 'phezalu'. This had to be done many times and he would hit those with a sjambok who could not keep doing it. He then said that we must run to another part of the field holding the concrete block over our heads. The farmer's son used to ride in a jeep behind us as we were running. Anyone who fell was beaten."

6. Prisoners also complained of being threatened with death. One parolee's statement claims:

"S., one of the workers on the farm, who was not a prisoner and who was one of our supervisors, continually pointed out [what he claimed were] the graveyards all over the farm. These graveyards had stones and rocks on top of them. S. said these graves were the graves of our fellow prisoners. He said, if we did not want to work and we think funny things we would be hit and would die and be buried on the farm."

7. None of the parolees who made statements ever saw any prison staff at the farm, and no evidence exists that any supervision was ever exercised by the prison authorities.

8. The farmer in question stated in court that he had 4,000 parolees working on his farm between August 1972 and August 1979. he fetched them personally from Modderbee prison and returned them at the end of their sentence.

9. There was evidence in the statements made for the purpose of legal proceedings, principally from the comments made to returned parolees who bore evidence of assaults and injuries, that at least some prison staff were aware of the reputation of that particular farm.

Other farm cases from the 1970s

The allegations which emerge from the case outlined above (most of which were denied in court and were never proved) are not unique. The following list of other cases involving the assault or the death of farm or parolee labour during the 1970s was compiled from newspaper reports by Allen Cook in Akin to Slavery, Prison Labour in South Africa:

Rand Daily Mail, 12 May 1971. A Hartbeesfontein (Transvaal) farmer was found guilty of having put a castration ring (used for rams) round the testicles of a 14-year-old African alleged to have "become too much of a gentleman."

Rand Daily Mail, 7 December 1971. Two Standerton (Transvaal) white farmers and an African boss-boy were found guilty of having killed a parolee in a series of assaults which the judge described as "cruel, inhuman and merciless." The two whites were sentenced to six years' imprisonment each, the boss-boy to four years' imprisonment.

Rand Daily Mail, 28 May 1973. Four people including a two-year-old boy were killed and another injured when a "prominent" Carolina (Transvaal) farmer opened fire on Africans on his farm.

Rand Daily Mail, 20 September 1974. An Olifantsfontein (Transvaal) farmer and two of his employees were convicted of beating two Africans and then painting them silver. One of the Africans was hospitalized for a week. The farmer was fined R60.

Rand Daily Mail, 16 December 1975. A Bothaville (Orange Free State) farmer was found guilty of having shot a labourer dead for not obeying an instruction. The farmer was sentenced to five years' imprisonment of which two years were suspended.

Sunday Tribune (Durban), 15 July 1977. An investigation by this newspaper into conditions of farmworkers in Natal found that workers were "often beaten for punishment."

Sunday Times (Johannesburg), 17 July 1977. The Mayor of Carnarvon (Cape Province) was found guilty of whipping a woman worker with a sjambok. The woman was treated for 25 lash marks on her back, buttocks and legs and spent a week in hospital.

Rand Daily Mail, 1 September 1978. A 21-year-old Delmas (Transvaal) farmer was fined R500 and given a sentence of one year's imprisonment suspended for five years after assaulting a 65-year-old African herdsman. The African died of multiple injuries the day after the assault. He had got in the farmer's way when the farmer was engaged in a jackal hunt.

Daily Dispatch (East London), 4 January 1979. A Paulpietersburg (Natal) farmer was jailed for one year for killing a seven-month-pregnant African woman on his farm. His defence was that the woman was stealing a log and that he had fired at her buttocks. The judge said that the farmer "could have and should have aimed at the lower part of the legs" and not at the buttocks. He gave the farmer leave to appeal against the sentence.

Sunday Express (Johannesburg), 3 June 1979. A wine farmer called Du Toit of Rawsonville (Western Cape Province) was found guilty of chaining a 13-year-old boy by the neck, of beating a labourer with a hosepipe while he was strung up by the neck, and of killing another labourer by beating him in the same way.

Cases in the 1980s

More recent newspaper reports published while this study was being prepared indicate a continuation of such incidents:

Cape Times, 13 November 1984. On 15 November 1984, at the regional court in Bellville, a white farmer and two prison warders were found guilty of having assaulted William Albert, a young prisoner parolee, five times during the Easter weekend in 1983. The prisoner died of his injuries. The accused had been charged with culpable homicide but the magistrate said this had not been proved beyond a reasonable doubt.

The victim weighed 36 kg. at the time of this death and the magistrate said he had "the physical build of a child". Giving evidence in his own defense, the farmer stated that Mr. Albert, a small man, was a very bad worker. He was not weak but lazy, he said. He hit him on the buttocks with a stick because he was not handling cases of tomatoes properly while they were being loaded onto a lorry. The same day he slapped him on the cheek and again hit him with a stick because he was not working properly. "I didn't want to hurt him I just wanted him to get a move on" the accused told the court. He complained to the prison officer about Albert. The co-accused prison officer said he would look into it. The farmer told the court that he later saw the third accused fell the deceased man with a smack and then trample on the stomach of the youth who screamed and lost consciousness. He (the third accused) had then trampled on his head. The victim died after transfer to Cape Town hospital.

The magistrate fined each defendant R1,000 (or 100 days' imprisonment) and imposed a sentence of four months; imprisonment suspended for four years. A condition of the suspended sentence in the farmer's case was that he made no use of prison or parole labour during the four years.

Cape Herald, 28 July 1984. Fourteen contract workers from the Transkei aged between 16 and 40 years quit their job at a farm in the Bree River area near Worcester, saying they were no longer prepared to put up with long working hours, low wages, assaults and verbal abuse of the owner. A spokesman for the workers, Mr. Mbawe, told the Worcester advice office, "The men realised what they were in for when they arrived at the farm after a fifteen-hour journey from Queenstown. When they asked for food, his reply was, 'You've come to work not to eat'." The men said their working days, Mondays to Saturdays, started at 5.00 a.m. and ended at 6.00 p.m. In this time they were not allowed to eat. "But he did give us water." The man said they were given a 25 kg. bag of maize meal every fortnight in lieu of Saturday work. They were also given a portion of tripe every Friday. "If we wanted extras we had to go the the bosses' farm shop where items were more expensive than at the Bree River railway station, 20 km away." The men's wages amounted to R21 per week, and many workers had stayed on because, "We had saved our wages with the boss and it was not easy to get it back. He did not want us to save at the post office."

The men complained of threats and assaults, and about their living conditions. "Our rooms had no beds and no blankets. We had to cover ourselves with cardboard. We slept in our work clothes. There were no tables, no chairs, no washing facilities—we had to fetch our water from a river a kilometre away and wash in drums. When we complained about our living conditions and when we asked to be taken to town to buy ourselves blankets and other necessities, he said he did not want to waste his petrol on us." The farmer involved denied assaulting anyone and told the same newspaper that he was generous: "No other farmer in the area treats his workers the way I do—that can be confirmed by the Bantu Administration Board." Because the men had broken their contracts they were given 72 hours to return to the Transkei by the Administration Board.

The "rent a convict" scheme

A variant of the scheme for the use of prison labour detained on farms is a system of daily labour known widely in South Africa as the "rent a convict" scheme. Pass offenders are the normal group of prisoners made available under this system. The system is distinguished from the scheme so far described in that the prisoners are fetched from the prison and returned there in the evening.

An account of this system was given by the Minister of Justice in parliament in reply to a parliamentary question on 19 February 1985:

"Prisoners are made available to hirers at a fixed tariff approved by the Treasury. The prisoners concerned are not employed by the hirer and therefore conditions of employment are not laid down, but prisoners are to be treated in accordance with the stipulations of the Prisons Act of 1959 (Act No. 8 of 1959) and the Regulations promulgated in terms thereof. Prisoners are collected at the prison by the temporary warders in the employ of the hirer at 06h45 and are returned to the prison at 16h30. They have breakfast and supper in the prison and have lunch, which is provided by the prison, at their places of work. A lunchtime is provided for this purpose from 12h00 to 13h00."

This information was given in reply to questions by Peter Soal, an opposition M.P., who had asked about a potato farm at Bethal where "foreign" workers were employed and where an average of 50 prisoners were hired daily. The questions had been prompted by an expose of conditions on the farm by a newspaper. Peter Soal, who visited the farm, told the newspaper that the labourers' conditions were "incredible," and that none of the relevant ministers (Justice, Co-operation and Development and Manpower) to whom he had sent the newspaper reports, "expressed any concern or regret." [21] It may be noted that the Bethal district figured in the forced labour scandals concerning pass victims in the 1940s.[22]

Prisoners may be made available not only to farms on a daily basis, but also to urban dwellers. Thus, in Middleburg in the Transvaal, pass offenders are hired daily, at a rate of R1.20 per day, Monday to Friday and 95c on a Saturday. The hirer, who must be white, is sworn in as a temporary warder. No restriction is placed on the work the hired prisoners may do, but a popular use is as a gardener and odd-job man. One effect of these schemes in urban areas is to undercut the wages of Africans seeking daily work such as gardeners in the suburbs.

The pass offender in prison: Statistics

The percentage of pass offenders committed to prison, including those who actually serve their sentences in prison and those diverted from the prisons to work for private concerns, has been in recent years a matter of considerable dispute within South Africa. The issue has arisen in the context of general concern about overcrowding in South African prisons.

South Africa has a high crime rate and an extremely high rate of imprisonment. In 1983-1984, there were over half a million admissions to prisons, 266,700 sentenced prisoners and 255,000 unsentenced. In 1977, 450 persons per 100,000 of the population were admitted to prison as compared with a figure of 96 in the United States (which is itself considerably higher than most other countries). In 1983, the United Kingdom, which has roughly double the population of South Africa, had an average daily prison population of 50,850 compared with 107,174 in South Africa.[23] South African prisons, while built to hold 70,000 according to evidence given to the Hoexter Commission, have an overpopulation of about 40 per cent.[24] The Hoexter Commission condemned the consequent severe overcrowding in prisons and blamed the situation on the large numbers of pass offenders committed to prison:

"Another material factor in regard to the overcrowding of our prisons is that hordes of Blacks [sic] land in prison as a result of influx control. Judged by civilised norms these people are not real malefactors. They are the needy victims of a social system that controls the influx of the people from the rural to the urban areas by penal sanction. The reason for this virtually unstemmable influx is poverty." (para. 5.2).

The prison service in reply disputed that pass law offenders constituted an inordinate percentage of the prison population, claiming that a survey on 30 April 1984 had disclosed a total of 3,844 sentenced prisoners and 1,619 unsentenced, or 5.19 per cent of the prison population due to influx control violations. However, these figures have been in turn disputed. Researchers at the Institute of Criminology at the University of Cape Town have noted that in 1978-79, when annual figures were published, pass offenders represented 40.27 per cent of all sentenced black prisoners that year.[25] While these latter statistics are not now published, it has been calculated that in 1984 some 35 per cent of all admissions to prison in South Africa were for pass law offences.[26] The dispute over the interpretation of statistics results from the piecemeal way in which information is revealed and the limited returns published in the Annual Reports.[27] What is not in dispute is that a considerable number of Africans convicted under racially discriminatory laws governing movement end up in South Africa's prisons. Those handed over to farms or other private employers from the prisons, on the available evidence, as already outlined, are subject to a regime which in substance constitutes imprisonment. All are prisoners of conscience under Amnesty International's mandate.

Prison conditions and the pass victim

If information of a statistical nature on South African prisons is difficult to interpret, the knowledge of conditions of detention for the pass offender and others in South African prisons is equally uncertain. In part, this results from lack of information and research on prisons and prison conditions. But lack of research in turn is explained by the legislative inhibitions in South Africa on reporting or researching on prisons, which have the effect of imposing a form of censorship.

The Prisons Act 1959 provides:

"Any person who . . . publishes or causes to be published in any manner whatsoever any false information concerning the behaviour or experience in prison of any prisoner or ex-prisoner or concerning the administration of any prison, knowing the same to be false, or without taking reasonable steps to verify such information (the onus of proving that reasonable steps were taken to verify such information being upon the accused) . . . shall be guilty of an offence and liable on conviction to a fine not exceeding two thousand rand, or in default of payment, to imprisonment for a period not exceeding two years or to such imprisonment without the option of a fine or to both such fine and such imprisonment." [28]

Nevertheless, sufficient information may be gleaned from official sources and the limited research to date to provide a picture of prison conditions characterised by overcrowding and violence. In this, South Africa is by no means exceptional. However, it is unique as the Hoexter Commission noted, in imprisoning the innocent for the crime of movement because of their race.

South African prisoners are segregated according to race, and white and "non-white" wear different prison uniforms. Every prison officer has the power of a police officer and may carry arms.[29] Most accommodation for "non-whites" is in communal cells, which are for the most part characterised by gross overcrowding and the mixing of young persons, children and adults.[30] No separation is attempted of those such as pass offenders, whether on remand or following sentence from, in the Hoexter Commission's terms, real malefactors, offenders with previous prison experience, or long-term offenders including those committed for violence or other serious offences. On remand, awaiting trial and after conviction, prison cells are controlled by prison gangs, often composed of prisoners with a record of violence, which have long been a feature of South African prisons. Murders committed by nationwide prison gangs are a serious problem. Between 1974 and 1978 in the Western Cape alone, research of court records has revealed that 41 African prisoners were killed as a result of gang activity and 77 others sentenced to death for these murders.[31] Sexual assault is commonplace among prisoners, and it was alleged to Amnesty International's delegate that pass offenders, because of their general vulnerability, were frequently victims of such assaults. In June 1985, Helen Suzman, M.P., who has long campaigned about prison conditions, read out an account of conditions in one prison to the South African Parliament.

"I have received a particularly disturbing report about conditions in North End Prison in Port Elizabeth. The Eastern Cape, I must say, has more than its fair share of horrors. This statement comes from a man who was picked up by the police and charged with public violence. His case was remanded and he was kept in jail. The statement makes ugly reading . . . It states that he was kept in a cell 5 metres by 7 metres in which 90 prisoners slept on mats. Yes, 90 prisoners slept in a cell of that size! In one corner of the cell there was a pit which served as a toilet—with no privacy whatsoever! Among the 90—and this is almost the worst aspect of this matter—there were children awaiting trial.

"In the cell were 'bosses' belonging to gangs which bullied other prisoners, appropriated the bread and meat of other prisoners and beat up those who resisted using the so-called 'pompa' punishment which apparently means blows on the face. Every night according to this report the young adults and the children were sodomised by these 'bosses'. This goes on in many jails. However, the worst thing about this particular case was that the warders were apparently well aware of what was going on and did nothing to stop the practice." [32]

This account of North End prison is supported by information obtained by Amnesty International's delegate about conditions of detention in other prisons. These conditions which the pass offender shares with others would appear to be in clear contravention to the rights of both unconvicted and convicted prisoners the South African prison regulations, and under the United Nations Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners which the South African Government claims to uphold.

Pass offenders in most cases have no previous prison experience, are frequently illiterate, and come from a rural background which has left them unaccustomed to the urban environment. The assault on their senses by the experience of arrest, prosecution and imprisonment under the pass laws can only be surmised. In prison, the pass victim lacks all status. Not recognized as a criminal on a short term basis, "reference book" or "trespass" people are considered and referred to as a nuisance, "taking up space", to be despatched to farms or other places as soon as possible. Such attitudes towards them are said to be shared by other prisoners and prison staff alike. Males are fair game for assault by anyone. Whereas "real" prisoners may require a different attitude. All ex-prisoners interviewed by Amnesty International's delegate, white and African, agreed that pass offenders were the butt of the system and are treated as people who must do double work to justify their keep. Pass prisoners are normally employed on maintenance and cleaning duties in the prisons or as servants for the prison staff.[33]

Otherwise what emerged from interviews conducted by Amnesty International's delegate was a picture of a prison regime characterised by strict discipline imposed through violence or the threat of violence on all offenders, including the pass offender, who are not white. It was reported that, in some prisons at least, black prisoners are told on reception that they should never look up at a white officer, and are allowed only a few minutes to eat each meal, in conditions of silence and under threat of assault by warders with canes for disobedience. White prisoners, in contrast, former black prisoners alleged, eat separately, are allowed ample time to consume their meal and are not required to remain silent.

Prison complaints machinery and assaults

The Prisons Act and regulations do explicitly prohibit ill-treatment of any kind, including assaults on prisoners, and provide a complaints machinery which is not wholly ineffective. Thus, in 1983, for example, some 1,066 complaints of assault by prison officers were made by prisoners: of these, 244 resulted in departmental trials (with 130 convictions) and 50 in criminal investigations (with 11 convictions).[34]

However, the efficacy of the law in preventing assault must be doubted, not least where officially tolerated assaults occur, such as was disclosed in a recent official report on Barberton Prison, whose inmates include pass offenders.[35] The Report, released in May 1984, disclosed that new prisoners were assaulted on arrival at the prison. It was established that a practice had existed for many years at this maximum security prison to "groet" or "warm te maak" (to "greet" or "warm up") new arrivals. Prisoners were stripped naked and then forced to go into a prison yard and run past a circle of warders, black and white, who were armed with truncheons or pieces of rubber pipe. Prisoners were then hit by the warders as they ran, with a prisoner receiving as many as thirty strokes. The Report also confirmed that assaults by warders took place at other times. The report noted, "There is every reason to believe that these practices were known to senior officers, but accepted as a tradition particular to that institution, and therefore a blind eye was turned to it." [36] The Commissioner of Prisons, Lieutenant-General W. H. Willemse, strongly condemned these practices and announced that steps had been taken to "prevent anything of that sort happening again." [37]

Further research is necessary before the full prison regime to which prisoners and other black prisoners are exposed is documented adequately. What is already known, however, suggests a catalogue of ill-treatment and degradation that violates minimum standards and calls for urgent action by the South African Government.

CHAPTER EIGHT: ACTION ON THE PASS LAWS

The preceding chapters of this study based on two Amnesty International missions to South Africa have documented how the system officially described as "influx control" functions in practice and leads each year to the arrest and imprisonment of many thousands of black people on grounds of race.

This chapter concludes the study with a brief survey of the responses to the pass laws of some of the non-governmental bodies within South Africa concerned with human rights, and a discussion of recent developments in the continuing debate at official level on future policy on influx control. The most recent and most significant development in that regard was the publication in August 1985 of a report of the Committee for Constitutional Affairs of the President's Council entitled An Urbanisation Strategy for the Republic of South Africa. This proposes abolition of 'coercive' influx control including the pass laws.[1]

Non-governmental action

That the injustices inherent in the pass laws and their enforcement have come to be more widely recognised within South Africa, including in the President's Council Report just cited, is almost entirely due to the work of a small number of human rights organisations and of individuals over the last decade. The South African Institute of Race Relations (SAIRR) has, in this field as in others, painstakingly recorded the statistics relating to pass law and group areas prosecutions, forced removals and deportation in its annual Survey of Race Relations. In addition, the important historical accounts of the pass laws have been researched and published by the Institute.[2] The Black Sash, a traditionally but not exclusively white women's organisation, has been particularly active on the pass laws. Through its network of advice centres it has for many years helped individual Africans to cope with the burden of laws and administration which rule where they can live and work. It devised and developed a system for monitoring the functioning of the commissioners' courts through volunteers observing trials, thereby bringing to light for the first time the arbitrariness of these courts.

Legal defence: The role of lawyers

All but a few members of South Africa's legal profession, it would appear, are largely ignorant of the law and practice related to the pass laws and the bureaucracy that surrounds them.[3] Only a handful of lawyers have experience of the pass law courts. For example, in 1983 less than one per cent of the 284,000 black people prosecuted under the pass laws in commissioners' courts were legally represented.[4]

There have been exceptions. The Centre for Applied Legal Studies at the University of the Witwatersrand in Johannesburg has played a crucial role in research and action on the pass laws. Research and publications on the commissioners' court from the Centre and similar studies from the University of Cape Town concerning the Langa commissioners' court, were made available to the Hoexter Commission which ultimately recommended the abolition of these courts. The public interest lawyers' group, the Legal Resources Centre, with offices in Johannesburg, Durban and Cape Town, has primarily fought the pass laws through the civil courts, and in a number of cases has achieved significant victories over the hitherto assumed omnipotence of the officials, boards and inspectors who enforce these laws. The small Black Lawyers Association, comprising advocates and attorneys, and Lawyers for Human Rights, comprising advocates, are increasingly active in defense work on behalf of pass victims.

Nevertheless, it has always been and remains the case that the majority of people prosecuted under the pass laws have no legal representation. In 1983, as mentioned, a mere 2,738 of those prosecuted were defended. One response by the Black Sash, Lawyers for Human Rights and other groups has been to devise rotas of lawyers willing to appear at the courts and undertake representation before the commissioners' or magistrates' courts of Africans who wish representation or whose family request it. The presence of Black Sash monitors in the courts has proved important for the identification of cases that may have some success if defended. The changing attitudes of prosecutors since September 1984, and the take-over by the Department of Justice is reflected in Johannesburg in their willingness to alert monitors to cases being processed which they consider merit a defense lawyer's attention. Modest victories have been won (including in the area of bail) by the lawyers' rota scheme.

The impact of a small number of lawyers on the system is, however, inevitably limited, and that is recognized by those involved. It is equally recognized, not only by the lawyers involved, but by all organizations working on behalf of pass victims, that attempts to deliver justice in courts where people are prosecuted for offenses that other citizens cannot commit because they are of a different colour cannot be achieved.

The abolition of 'influx control'?

The proposal to abolish so called influx control, including passes andf pass laws, most recently mooted by the Report of a committee of the President's Council, while significant and welcome, is hardly a new idea. As mentioned in Chapter 2, official enquiries over many years have broached or recommended this possibility or variations on it, only to be ignored.[5] It is perhaps telling that the report compiled by the President's Council in 1985 should conclude almost in the exact same language of the Fagan Commission in 1984—that black urbanisation is impossible to prevent, that pass laws are a major grievance of the African population, and are "damaging to relations between groups".[6] What is different on this occasion, as noted in Chapter 2, is the range of interests in South Africa who advocate the abandonment of influx control laws, not least the business community.[7] Significant too is the apparently broad acceptance in government circles that change is necessary. It still remains unclear, however, what future policy on African mobility will be and whether control is genuinely to be abandoned or simply recast in a different form. In that context, the proposal by the government of a new common identification document, in lieu of reference books, for issue to all persons in South Africa and to be produced on demand, does not afford sufficient guidance as to the likely effect of such a system on the African population. Meanwhile, the pass laws and the reconstructed pass courts continue to function.[8]

The report of the President's Committee on Black Urbanisation: preliminary observations

Before commenting on the proposals in this important report, certain preliminary observations are appropriate. It is noteworthy that the committee, which in effect was considering the future of the black majority of South Africa, did not have a single representative from that population among its members. The committee's report assumes the continued existence of apartheid and fails to address its fundamental elements.

The admission in the report that pass laws violate human rights is to be welcomed. The committee, however, clearly endorses other related aspects of apartheid, or avoids comment on them as being outside its terms of reference. The obscurity of such language as "the existence of group-related settlement in urban centres is recognised" (para. 11.12) cannot disguise the endorsement of the Group Areas Act and residential segregation. The implication is that further black urbanisation will take place only in the carefully located new black "cities" such as Khayelitsha, 30 km. from "white" Cape Town. The report equally assumes that racial classification and the system of "national" and "independent" black states will continue. The committee did not consider that it was its task: "to express a view on the utilisation of influx control in order to obtain certain constitutional objectives" (para. 9.86).

The one member of the President's Council Committee who refused to sign the report, Mr. Connie Mulder, a former government minister and now a leader of the Conservative Party, made clear his belief that influx control is central to the maintenance of a system which denies equal political rights to the African majority population, and therefore cannot ultimately be so ignored. He is reported to have insisted that:

"there was a link between citizenship and the pass laws: blacks were either regarded as citizens of their own 'homelands' and subject to influx control or they were citizens of South Africa and entitled to freedom of movement and political rights in South Africa. If the policies of influx control and racial separation were abandoned, then we must do away with our areas, our schools, our facilities. We must then open everything to blacks, including Parliament."[9]

The committee did touch on the issue of citizenship, that is the denationalisation policy, which has stripped over eight million black South Africans of their citizenship and nationality. The report notes that the State President has referred the question to a Special Cabinet Committee, and recommendations would be forthcoming "to be based on investigation and negotiation on the problems of terminology and content that surround the question of citizenship" (para. 9.106).

The government has since declared that South African nationality could be "restored" to the "citizens" of the TVBC states. This presumably entails a system of dual citizenship, though the crucial question of citizenship rights remains unsatisfactorily unclear.[10]

The committee's arguments on influx control

The principal arguments of the committee are that the policies of preventing African urbanisation, whatever their objectives, have not proved effective and that there is an urgent need of economic and social grounds to plan positively for "orderly" black urbanisation. The report produces detailed statistical evidence to establish that if influx control was replaced by a policy which accepted urbanisation, nothing dramatic would happen. In particular, the report is at pains to emphasize that the traditional white fear of being overwhelmed by African people, should controls be removed, is misplaced. This calculation is based on the consensus of expert demographic opinion that already the major source of increase in urban African numbers is through natural increase of the population already lawfully in the cities (under section 10). If there were no barriers to further migration from rural areas, the likely in-migration movement would be at most one to three million over a decade, made up largely of dependents of those already in cities.[11] A further argument for accepting urbanisation is that the natural increase in the African population should gradually reduce along the lines of decrease in family size in the white and other populations. The overall case is explained succintly in a separate article by two experts whose approach reflects the Committee's own:

". . . on the basis of careful statistical projections . . . by the year 2000, there will be an additional two million blacks in the white metropolitan areas if influx control is abolished. This will result in a black population in these areas of 9.52 million. If, however, influx control is maintained up to the year 2000 there will be a total of 7.76 million blacks. Clearly the difference of two million will not qualitatively alter the character of the white cities. If certainly does not merit the costs.

"Apart from the political costs of black alienation there are substantial financial costs. [In] the current financial year (1984–5), roughly R89 million will be spent on administering influx control. This means that by the year 2000, we will spend more than R1.3 billion to reduce the black population in the common areas by a factor of 2 in 10. We doubt whether it is worth the cost."[12]

Government response

As yet the response of the government to the proposed abandonment of influx control, to the ending of reference books and the pass laws remains to be spelled out. In general, the President's Council report builds on the Riekert Commission, in the acceptance of black urbanisation, and this at least is in line with official thinking. The amendment of Section 10 of the Urban Areas Act, legislated in mid-1985, whereby it is made easier to obtain a qualification for urban residence, is perhaps a portent. However, the limits of change have already been made clear. In the deepening crisis following the state of emergency and growing international pressure, State President P.W. Botha has categorically rejected "one man, one vote", has endorsed the "homelands" as a positive aspect of any solution and has insisted that urban residential segregation under the Group Areas Act will continue.[13] He has also been reported as describing the President's Council report as proposing amendment to influx control laws rather than abolition.[14] Finally, plans are already well advanced to introduce a uniform identification document for all in South Africa.

A Common Identity Document: Namibian experience

The President's Council committee on urbanisation did not oppose the retention of reference books for Africans provided they were not used for influx control (para. 175). It welcomed, however, the idea of a common document of identity:

"The Committee supports the principle of uniform identity documents for all citizens of the RSA (including the National States) and agrees that it is necessary that all citizens of other countries should be able to identify themselves inside the RSA. In the RSA as in Western and other countries the police should be able to establish the identity of any person beyond all doubt." (para. 9.131)

It is fair to note that the committee explicitly takes the point that the substitution of a common document, if failure to produce it on demand is made a criminal offence, could lead to new pass laws under a different guise:

"Care should be . . . taken that a new type of technical offence is not created in this way and accordingly failure to carry such a document should not be a criminal offence." (para. 9.155)

It will be of importance to note whether this recommendation is or is not followed in any new legislation governing identity documents.

It is on this question that the experience of Namibia may be instructive. Namibia, termed South West Africa under South African law and a territory whose continued occupation by South Africa the United Nations has declared illegal, had the same influx control system including reference books as South Africa until 1977. Various amendments were then made by proclamation by a newly-appointed South Afrcian Administrator-General. Africans were no longer required to have permits to remain for more than 72 hours in urban areas in which they were not lawfully resident or to produce passes on demand. However, they continued to be required to obtain permission to seek work and their work contracts still had to be registered.[15]

The sections of the pass laws which were repealed in 1977 in Namibia were replaced by the Identification of Persons Act 1979, which came into force in 1980. Under this Act and accompanying regulations, all persons resident in the territory had to apply for a common identity document, and all were required to carry it. The identity document had to be produced on demand to any member of the "security forces" defined as the South West Africa Police, the South West Africa Territorial Force, or "any such other body or force or category or group of persons as the Administrator-General may . . . declare to be a security force for the purposes of this Act."[16] Failure to produce is an arrestable offence punishable by a fine of R500 or 6 months' imprisonment, or both, penalties much heavier than those that apply to reference books in South Africa itself. The regulations require the taking of fingerprints and photographs to be inserted in the document by a "registry officer", recording of employment details and the issuing of an individual identity number. There is power to include in the document "whether by means of a letter or figure or otherwise any information contained in the application."[17]

The regulations also require details of "population group", "tribe" and "tribe code" for inclusion in the identity document. Although the South African government claimed to have discontinued race classification in Namibia in 1980, the 1985 Special Report on Apartheid of the ILO, states that:

"In practice, however, racial classification does continue through the issue of identity documents, which require all Namibians to be registered according to the official division of the population into 11 ethnic groups."[18]

The inclusion of employment details in the document, added to race classification, means that nothing that was in the reference book under the pass laws has been omitted. The experience has been that the new identity document has been used oppressively and in a discriminatory manner against Africans, including through mass round-ups and security checks by security forces. The 1983 Special Report on Apartheid noted also that "[the Act] which required persons over 16 years of age to carry an identity card [is] in practice of much more significance for blacks than for other race groups. In spite of the removal of influx control constraints on free movement of labour continue through the registration of work contracts and by an increased fine on employers who engage unregistered workers".

This experience of Namibia with identity documents is relevant to the proposals for South Africa itself. Indeed, Namibia may prove the prototype. It is the case in South Africa under existing law, as noted in Chapter 1, that all races are issued with identity documents. The difference is that the separate system and legislation for the black reference book has been coercively enforced, while the separate legislation for other groups has not. The result was graphically illustrated in answer to a parliamentary question in 1984. Mrs. Helen Suzman asked how many people classified as White, Coloured, Indian and Black had been arrested over the past 10 years for not being in possession of an official identity document. The answer was Whites 0; Coloureds 2; Indians 0; Blacks 637,584.[19]

CHAPTER NINE: THE PASS LAWS: CONCLUSION

Amnesty International's Statute commits the organisation to work throughout the world to secure observance of the provisions of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights by, among other things, "working towards the release of and providing assistance to prisoners of conscience"—those who are "imprisoned, detained or otherwise physically restricted by reason of their political, religious or other conscientiously held beliefs or by reason of their ethnic origin, sex, colour or language provided that they have not used or advocated violence". Amnesty International has also committed itself to oppose by all appropriate means the infliction of torture or other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment of all prisoners.

As this report has sought to show, each year many thousands of black South Africans are subjected to arbitrary arrest and imprisonment simply by virtue of their race. They, as one category of political prisoners among many in South Africa, continue to comprise the overwhelming majority of the country's prisoners of conscience. As this report has also shown, they also constitute one of the most abused groups of South Africa's prisoners and have been frequently, perhaps routinely, subject to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, some of it bordering on enforced slavery.

Recently, there have been calls from quasi-governmental and other influential sectors in South Africa for reform of the pass laws, but it is unclear how far the government is prepared to go to effect change. The pass laws appear inextricably bound up with other basic elements of the apartheid system such as compulsory race classification and residential segregation which, it appears, the government is currently committed to preserve. It is true that, in the very period that this report has been in preparation, action has been taken to reduce some of the most glaring aberrations of the judicial process which for many years characterised the pass law courts. Such action is welcome, though overdue and relatively inconsequential when measured against what is actually needed to put an end to the imprisonment of individuals simply on the basis of their race.

Amnesty International is totally opposed to imprisonment on the basis of race and therefore calls urgently and unreservedly for the complete and total abolition of the pass laws and any other system which may be devised to criminalize the movement and residence of black people in South Africa on the basis of race. Mr Justice Hoexter, in a notable but regrettably undeveloped phrase, in his report on the pass law courts, wrote:

"That inhabitants of the same country should purely on the grounds of race be criminally prosecuted in separate courts for any offence whatever is. . . by any civilized standard, unnecessary, humiliating and repugnant."

Amnesty International endorses this statement but is obliged to add that it is equally repugnant and wholly unacceptable that inhabitants of the same country should be subject to, and liable to imprisonment under, laws—not just courts—which discriminate on the grounds of race. The pass laws should be abolished now.

GRAMM-RUDMAN-HOLLINGS WILL PINCH ALL TOES

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, the barrage of questions and complaints we are all receiving about Gramm-Rudman-Hollings undoubtedly will grow as its impact becomes clearer. I voted for the budget balancing bill with the conviction that if we do not get hold of our mounting fiscal problems now, we may face economic chaos later. In a weekly column I write for newspapers in my State, I have attempted to answer some of the questions I am frequently asked. I also offer what I think will be the ultimate result of Gramm-Rudman-Hollings—a combination of revenue increases and spending cuts that will move our country in a sounder financial direction. I ask that the column be printed in the RECORD,

The column follows:

PAY-AS-YOU-GO PATH WILL PINCH ALL TOES

(By U.S. Senator Paul Simon)

There is a near-panic developing over the enactment of the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings plan to reduce the deficit. Otherwise rational people—like columnist George Will—seem to have come unglued.

People who should have been in near-panic about the deficit now are in that state over this response to the deficit.

Let me comment on two of the statements I hear:

"We should deal with the deficit but not in this way!"

Any way that steps on toes—and that is required—will have some unpopularity. But Gramm-Rudman-Hollings (GRH) does not require any specific formula. It simply says if Congress and the administration don't come up with better answers, we're not going to continue this indefinite drift.

GRH calls for percentage across the board cuts if Congress and the White House fail to respond to specific targets in reducing the deficit. GRH is invoked only if better answers are not found. But it is a recognition that we cannot indefinitely continue to spend roughly one-fourth more money than we take in without causing economic chaos. GRH leaves plenty of room, for those with better ideas to solve the deficit, to propose them. But I find that most of those who call GRH the wrong answer have proposed no solution at all.

"But a program I believe in strongly may get cut."

It may indeed!

Programs a lot of us believe in strongly may be cut.

But the day is past when groups favoring education programs, health research, and a great many other things I favor can simply hold out their hands and ask for money. Now, people interested in money are also going to have to be interested in revenue. That is a dramatic change and a needed change. If you want more support for education, for example, which I happen to favor strongly, then those of us who favor that will also have to come up with ways to pay for it. Whatever the program you favor, you have to also propose means of getting the revenue for it if you are talking about spending increases.

My guess is that we will come up with a combination of revenue increases and spending cuts that will move our country in a sounder financial direction.

Indefinite drifting toward bigger and bigger deficits is a course toward economic disaster. That threatens not only our economy, but our free system.

Gramm-Rudman-Hollings will force us to face reality. I hope Congress and the White House will act responsibly so that there will be none of the horrendous cuts some people have talked about. We won't go to GRH's automatic pilot unless Congress and the President give up the controls.

We know that the course we were on prior to GRH courts disaster. Whether GRH will force us to a responsible course we will know within a few months.●

HEALTH CARE: QUALITY AND CONSTRAINT

● Mr. QUAYLE. Mr. President, Dr. Otis Bowen has taken on one of the toughest jobs in the country as the new Secretary of Health and Human Services. But he has also taken on one of the most important—touching the lives of millions of Americans in programs ranging from Social Security to Medicare.

One of Dr. Bowen's biggest challenges was outlined recently in an Op-Ed in the Indianapolis Star by Frank E. Samuel, Jr., president of the Health Industry Manufacturers Association. Mr. Samuel argues that Dr. Bowen must see to it that quality, access, and compassion remain top priorities for administration health programs.

As Mr. Samuel points out, Dr. Bowen has the opportunity to show that the administration's commitment to fiscal commonsense is matched by a social commitment to quality and access. I am sure that Dr. Bowen will keep this important message in mind as he carries out his new duties. I ask that Mr. Samuel's Op-Ed be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

HEALTH CARE: QUALITY AND CONSTRAINT

(By Frank E. Samuel, Jr.)

A country doctor from Indiana is now taking control of the third largest budget in the world—the Department of Health and Human Services. And Otis R. Bowen enters the scene at a historic juncture for federal health policy. A two-decade spending binge in health care has been followed by a strict Reagan spending diet. And although that diet seems to be bringing costs under control, it is not doing so without sacrifices in the tremendous advances in quality and access that accompanied the high spending.

So Bowen has a unique opportunity to stop the pendulum in the middle, and bring federal health policy into a new era that balances quality with cost constraint. To succeed, he must rekindle a commitment to compassion, and progress without pushing aside the Reagan emphasis on fiscal control.

Cost control was scarcely on the agenda when Medicare and Medicaid legislation passed in 1965. Nearly all political factions eventually agreed with a need to invest resources in improving health care for the elderly and poor.

The investment paid dividends not only for the beneficiaries of these programs. The infusion of new resources into the health care system helped bring about a technological boom that has benefited all of society. Advances in diagnosis and treatment of heart disease, cancer, blindness, infant death and scores of other conditions and diseases, to some degree, are part of the Medicare/Medicaid legacy.

But the investment was costly. And as health costs grew, the political support for unabated growth in federal health spending waned.

If the 1960s and 1970s were the years of technological advancement and expanded access, the 1980s are the decade of cost control. President Reagan came to office with a mandate to do something about health costs. So since 1981 the administration and Congress have made changes in Medicare and Medicaid that will yield $35 billion in cuts by 1987. What's more, Medicare's hospital payment scheme was overhauled to save costs. Rather than reimbursing hospitals for whatever costs they incur, Medicare now pays a set price for each of 476 diagnoses—regardless of how much it costs the hospital to treat a patient. The private sector has also clamped down on health costs.

The results are striking. In 1984, private and public sector health care spending grew by only 9.1 percent—the slowest rate in 20 years. Hospitals share of those costs grew by only half their 1983 rate. But evidence is mounting that we may be paying for this cost-cutting fervor in the form of reduced health care quality.

About 35 million people—15 percent of the population—are estimated to be without health insurance. While Medicaid—the main federal-state health financing program for the indigent—covered 65 percent of the poor in 1976, it now covers only 52 percent.

Changes and cutbacks in Medicare payments have led hospitals to release elderly patients too soon. At recent Senate hearings, doctors reported increased pressure from hospitals to release Medicare patients when their treatment costs reach the set price for their illness. And public hospitals report that other hospitals are "dumping" more patients onto them only because the severity of their condition makes them unprofitable to treat when bumped against the set Medicare price.

Medicare changes have also led hospitals to use treatments that may run up higher long-term costs. Newer pacemakers, for example, cost more initially than the older models. But for some patients they can reduce long-term costs because they can be adjusted for changes in the patient's condition without follow-up surgery. Medicare's payment system, however, often discourages use of the more expensive model because Medicare pays a set rate for pacemaker cases, regardless of the actual pacemaker used. So the hospital is money ahead using the cheaper version, especially since patients may well have to return for follow-up surgery—in which case the hospital again collects the total fee from Medicare.

Can Bowen forge the political consensus needed to stop this trend before it leads to a backlash that will drive costs out of control again? Yes, by establishing a clear agenda now, based on quality and access, and putting together the political coalition to back it.

As a start. Bowen should:

1. Balance long-term and short-term savings. Federal health spending has been cut, at least in the short term. But will these savings hold up tomorrow? Delayed care by families who lack health insurance or by Medicare patients released early from hospitals because of inadequate payment levels will burst upon us at a higher cost when care can be put off no longer. Somebody will have to pay eventually. Bowen should, at the very least, see to it that Medicare hospital payments keep up with inflation.

2. Plug the gaps in health care coverage. Incentives from Medicare's new pricing system and private sector initiatives have reduced hospital use. Some of those savings should be reinvested in areas of greatest health care need—the uninsured medical treatment for pregnant women and newborns, and protection for those who suffer catastrophically expensive illness. This may not even mean more spending, just a reallocation to those most in need.

3. Recognize that health care progress is impossible without technology.

Development of new technologies is essential to health care quality. Medicare places a premium only on technologies that cut short-term costs. While many technologies do that, others don't; they instead reduce hospital admissions or greatly improve health care quality. Investment in these technologies may be unprofitable given the incentives of Medicare. Without such products, medical advance will slow down, affecting us all. Is that a cost we want our children to bear?

A new consensus may be emerging that is questioning whether cost cutting in health programs has gone too far. If quality continues to suffer under excessive cost squeezes, a backlash could undo much of the fiscal constraint the Reagan administration has successfully injected into the health care system. The challenge for Bowen is to reintroduce quality before it's too late—and to do it without sending signals that cost containment is a thing of the past.

If he succeeds in this, his boss may go down in history as the only modern president who could bring fiscal common sense to health care without jeopardizing the social commitment to quality and access.●

NICARAGUA

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I am one of those who has been very much concerned about our involvement in Nicaragua. I am not in love with the Sandinistas. They are not Boy Scouts. They are not as sensitive to human rights as they should be and they are obviously too often politically inept, and sometimes just plain crude.

What the Government of the people of Nicaragua should have is a government selected by a decision by the people of Nicaragua. We should not be involved in that decision. We should make clear our concern for human rights, but we should not be sending weapons to that troubled area.

The evidence supporting that position is overwhelming.

It was confirmed to me recently in an affidavit by Edgar Chamarro sent to me by a friend in California. I urge my colleagues and their staffs to read this statement.

I also urge my friends at the CIA to read it. We need a good intelligence gathering operation, but it should be just that.

The affidavit of Edgar Chamarro is disquieting, suggesting that we ought to reexamine our policies and reexamine them quickly. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

The affidavit follows:

INTERNATIONAL COURT OF JUSTICE CASE CONCERNING MILITARY AND PARAMILITARY ACTIVITIES IN AND AGAINST NICARAGUA

AFFIDAVIT OF EDGAR CHAMORRO

City of Washington, District of Columbia, ss:

I, Edgar Chamorro, being first duly sworn, depose and say the following:

1. I am a citizen of Nicaragua. I was born in Granada, Nicaragua on July 23, 1931. I presently reside in the United States of America with my wife and two children, at 640 Allendale Road, Key Biscayne, Florida. I have applied to the Government of the United States for permanent resident status so that I can live permanently in the United States. I am currently awaiting final action on my application. I have been advised by my attorneys that I should not travel outside the United States until my application for permanent resident status is formally approved; travel outside the United States at the present time, according to my attorneys, could prejudice my application and result in my being permanently excluded from the United States. Since I am unable to appear in person before the International Court of Justice, I am submitting my testimony to the Court in written form.

2. I will begin by describing my background. I was raised in Nicaragua. At the age of 19, I joined the Jesuit order of the Roman Catholic Church, and subsequently became a Roman Catholic priest. I studied at the following Jesuit-affiliated institutions: Catholic University in Quito, Ecuador; St. Louis University in St. Louis, Missouri; and Marquette University in Milwaukee, Wisconsin. I later served as full professor and Dean of the School of Humanities at the University of Central America, a Jesuit-affiliated institution in Managua, Nicaragua. I left the priesthood in 1969, but continued my career in education. In 1972, I received a Master's Degree in Education from Harvard University, Cambridge, Massachusetts.

3. I returned to live in Managua, and went into private business. I worked for an advertising agency called Creative Publicity. I developed an expertise in advertising, public relations and mass communications. In 1977, I was appointed by the Nicaraguan Government to be a member of the Mission of Nicaragua to the United Nations in New York. I served in that capacity for one year, after which I returned to Nicaragua. In June 1979, I took up residence with my family in Miami, Florida. At that time, there was a full-fledged insurrection against the Government, and the Guardia Nacional ("National Guard"), the Nicaraguan armed forces loyal to the President, General Anastasio Somoza, were bombing residential neighborhoods and shooting innocent civilians in the streets. I did not wish to remain in Nicaragua under such conditions.

4. On July 19, 1979, the insurrection succeeded in overthrowing the Somoza Government and a new Government of National Reconstruction was established in its place. The new government was led by the Frente Sandinista de Liberaction Nacional (Sandinista National Liberacion Front) or "FBLN," which favored broad social and economic change in Nicaragua. I traveled back to Nicaragua in September 1979 to learn about the new government first-hand, and to decide whether to move back to Nicaragua with my family. Although I, too, favored social and economic changes in Nicaragua, I felt then—and still feel—that the policies and programs of the FSLN were and are too radical, and that I could not lend my support to a government dominated by that political party. I decided to remain in Miami.

5. Toward the end of 1979 I began to work with a group of Nicaraguan exiles living in Miami who, like me, opposed the policies of the new government. In 1980 we constituted ourselves as the Union Democratica Nicaraguense (Nicaraguan Democratic Union), or "U.D.M." Our principal activity was to write letters to members of the United States Congress urging them to vote against financial assistance for the Nicaraguan Government. We also held political meetings and rallies with other like-minded Nicaraguan exiles in Miami, and we set up regional committees in other cities of the United States where substantial numbers of Nicraguans were residing. The leaders of our organization, with whom I worked closely, was Jose Francisco Cardenal. Cardenal had served briefly as Vice President of the Council of State, the legislature of the new Nicaraguan Government, but had resigned his post and left Nicaragua because of his disagreements with the new government's policies.

6. In 1981, the U.D.M. underwent a transformation. During the first half of the year, Cardenal was contacted by representatives of the United States Central Intelligence Agency, and he began to have frequent meetings with them in Washington and in Miami. He also began to receive monetary payments from these people. He was told that the United States Government was prepared to help us remove the F.S.L.N. from power in Nicaragua, but that, as a condition for receiving this help, we had to join forces with the ex-National Guardsmen who had fled to Honduras when the Somoza Government fell and had been conducting sporadic raids on Nicaraguan border positions ever since. Cardenal was taken to Honduras by his C.I.A. contacts on several occasions to meet with these Guardsmen. The U.D.N., including Cardenal, initially opposed any linkage with the Guardsmen. The C.I.A., and high-ranking United States Government officials, insisted that we merge with the Guardsmen. Lt. General Vernon Walters, then a special assistant to the U.S. Secretary of State (and formerly Deputy Director of the C.I.A.) met with Cardenal to encourage him to accept the C.I.A.'s proposal. We were well aware of the crimes the Guardsmen had committed against the Nicaraguan people while in the service of President Somoza, and we wanted nothing to do with them. However, we recognized that without help from the United States Government we had no chance of removing the Sandinistas from power, so we eventually acceded to the C.I.A.'s, and General Walters' insistence, that we join forces with the Guardsmen. Some U.D.N. members resigned because they would not associate themselves with the National Guard under any circumstances, but Cardenal and I and others believed the C.I.A.'s assurances that we, the civilians, would control the Guardsmen in the new organization that was to be created.

7. At that time, the ex-National Guardsmen were divided into several small bands operating along the Nicaragua-Honduras border. The largest of the bands, headed by Enrique Bermudex, a former Colonel, was called the 15th of September Legion. The bands were poorly armed and equipped, and thoroughly disorganized. They were not an effective military force and represented no more than a minor irritant to the Nicaraguan Government. Prior to the U.D.N.'s merger with these people, General Walters himself arranged for all of the bands to be incorporated within the 15th of September Legion, and for the military government of Argentina to send several army officers to serve as advisers and trainers. The merger of the U.D.N. with the 15th of September Legion was accomplished in August 1981 at a meeting in Guatemala City, Guatemala, where formal documents were signed. The meeting was arranged and the documents were prepared by the C.I.A. The new organization was called the Fuerza Democratica Nicaraguense ("Nicaraguan Democratic Force") or, by its Spanish acronym, F.D.N. It was to be headed by a political junta, consisting of Cardenal, Aristides Sanchez (a politician loyal to General Somoza and closely associated with Bermudez) and Mariano Mendoza, formerly a labor leader in Nicaragua; the political junta soon established itself in Tegucigalpa, Honduras, taking up residence in a house rented for it by the C.I.A. Bermudez was assigned to head the military general staff, and it, too, was based in Honduras. The name of the organization, the members of the political junta, and the members of the general staff were all chosen or approved by the C.I.A.

8. Soon after the merger, the F.D.N. began to receive a substantial and steady flow of financial, military and other assistance from the C.I.A. Former National Guardsmen who had sought exile in El Salvador, Guatemala and the United States after the fall of the Somoza Government were recruited to enlarge the military component of the organization. They were offered regular salaries, the funds for which were supplied by the C.I.A. Training was provided by Argentinian military officers, two of whom—Col. Oswaldo Rivero and Col. Santiago Villejas—I got to know quite well; the Argentinians were also paid by the C.I.A. A special unit was created for sabotage, especially demolitions; they were trained directly by C.I.A. personnel at Lepaterique, near Tegucigalpa. Arms, ammunition, equipment and food were supplied by the C.I.A. Our first combat units were sent into Nicaraguan territory in December 1981, principally to conduct hit-and-run raids. The first military successes of the organization came in March 1982, when C.I.A.-trained saboteurs blew up two vital bridges in northern Nicaragua—at Rio Negro and Ocotal.

9. 1982 was a year of transition for the F.D.N. From a collection of small, disorganized and ineffectual bands of ex-National guardsmen, the F.D.N. grew into a well-organized, well-armed, well-equipped and well-trained fighting force of approximately 4,000 men capable of inflicting great harm on Nicaragua. This was due entirely to the C.I.A., which organized, armed, equipped, trained and supplied us. After the initial recruitment of ex-Guardsmen from throughout the region (to serve as officers or commanders of military units), efforts were made to recruit "foot soldiers" for the force from inside Nicaragua. Some Nicaraguans joined the force voluntarily, either because of dissatisfaction with the Nicaraguan Government, family ties with leaders of the force, promises of food, clothing, boots and weapons, or a combination of these reasons. Many other members of the force were recruited forcibly. F.D.N. units would arrive at an undefended village, assemble all the residents in the town square and then proceed to kill—in full view of the others—all persons suspected of working for the Nicaraguan Government or the F.S.L.W., including police, local militia members, party members, health workers, teachers, and farmers from government-sponsored cooperatives. In this atmosphere, it was not difficult to persuade those able-bodied men left alive to return with the F.D.N. units to their base camps in Honduras and enlist in the force. This was, unfortunately, a widespread practice that accounted for many recruits. The F.D.N. received all of its weapons from the C.I.A. In 1982, the C.I.A. provided FAL rifles to all F.D.N. combatants. These were acquired used from the Honduran army, which found these rifles expendable after the United States Government reequipped the Honduran army with American-made M-16 rifles, thus enabling the C.I.A. to purchase the FALs for the F.D.N. (Later, in 1983, the C.I.A. acquired AK-47 assault rifles for the F.D.N.).

Training continued under the direction of Argentinian military officers, although gradually the Argentinians were replaced and C.I.A. personnel performed all military training themselves. By the end of 1982, we were ready to launch our first major military offensive designed to take and hold Nicaraguan territory, which the C.I.A. was urging us to do. Our principal objective was the town of Jalapa, in northern Nicaragua. More than 1,000 of our fighters were involved, and we used light artillery (mortars, supplied by the C.I.A.) in combat for the first time. Although we inflicted casualties on the Sandinistas and caused substantial destruction in Jalapa and other neighboring towns, our offensive was repulsed and we were forced to retreat to Honduras and regroup without having accomplished our objective.

10. My specific job during the first year after the creation of the F.D.N. was to serve as staff person to the political junta. I was based in Miami, where I did political propaganda work, wrote letters, organized rallies, set up committees in various parts of the United States and generally worked at building support for our cause within the United States. During this period Cardenal grew increasingly unhappy over his lack of influence with the F.D.N. He had frequent conflicts with the C.I.A. personnel who were supervising and directing the F.D.N.'s political and military activities and found that he had no control over Bermudez or the other members of the F.D.N. general staff, who answered only to the C.I.A. Eventually he quit the organization, returned to Miami and entered the insurance business.

11. In November 1982 I was approached by a C.I.A. agent using the name "Steve Davis" and asked to become a member of the "political directorate" of the F.D.N., which the C.I.A. had decided to create as a substitute for the "political junta." (I am able to refer to "Davis" by name because I know that it is a pseudonym; United States law makes it a criminal offense to reveal the real name of any undercover C.I.A. operative). I had lunch with "Davis" at a restaurant near my home in Florida. "Davis" told me he was speaking in the name of the President of the United States, who want "to get rid of the Sandinistas." "Davis" explained to me that the F.D.N. had a bad image in the United States, and particularly among members of the Congress, because it was perceived as an organization of ex-National Guardsmen. He told me that in order to maintain the support of the Congress for the C.I.A.'s activities it was necessary to replace the political junta with a group of prominent Nicaraguan civilians who had no ties with the National Guard or the Somoza Government. "Davis" left without asking me to make a commitment. He told me I would be contacted again in the near future.

12. Later that month, "Davis" telephoned me and asked me to have dinner with him in his hotel suite at the Holiday Inn in Miami. When I arrived, "Davis" introduced me to another C.I.A. man, who used the name "Tony Feldman." "Feldman" was introduced as "Davis'" superior from Washington, and he acted as though "Davis" worked for him. "Feldman" told me that the C.I.A. had decided on a seven-member political directorate for the F.D.N., because any larger group would be unmanageable. He said that I had been selected as one of the seven, and he asked me to accept. He told me that the United States Government was prepared to give its full backing to the F.D.N. so that, by the end of 1983, we would be marching into Managua to take over the Nicaraguan Government. I was glad to see that the United States Government was committed enough to our cause to be taking such an active role, and I agreed to join the directorate they were creating. Over the next several days "Feldman" took control of the operation and moved the headquarters to the Four Ambassadors Hotel, also in Miami, where we met constantly. "Feldman" and his assistants discussed with me possible candidates for the directorate, but it was obvious that they had already decided who they wanted. The most important thing, "Feldman" emphasized, was that the directorate be formed immediately. He told me that the C.I.A. was worried that the Congress might enact legislation to prohibit the use of United States funds for the purpose of overthrowing the Nicaraguan Government, and that the creation of a political directorate composed of prominent, respectable civilians might persuade the Congress not to enact such legislation.

14. The press conference was held the next day, December 8, 1982, at the Hilton Conference Center in Fort Lauderdale, Florida. We filed in and introduced ourselves as the directorate of the Nicaraguan Democratic Force (F.D.M.), and then I read our statement of principles and goals. A C.I.A. officer named "George" had rewritten our original version of the statement, and I had to read his words. In January 1983, at the instruction of C.I.A. agent "Thomas Castillo," we put out a 12-point "peace initiative" drafted by the C.I.A., which essentially demanded the surrender of the Sandinista Government. I thought this was premature, but "Castillo" insisted that it be done to get the F.D.M. favorable publicity. Also at this time, another Nicaraguan civilian—Adolfo Calero—who had just left Nicaragua, was added to the directorate. Calero had been working for the C.I.A. in Nicaragua for a long time. He served as, among other things, a conduit of funds from the United States Embassy to various student and labor organizations. "Feldman" had told me that the C.I.A. was bringing him out of Nicaragua, where he had run the local Coca-Cola distributorship, to serve on the F.D.N.'s political directorate. Despite these public relations efforts, the United States Congress enacted a prohibition on C.I.A. efforts to overthrow the Nicaraguan Government, although it appropriated millions of dollars to the C.I.A. for clandestine military and paramilitary activities against the Nicaraguan Government. Before this prohibition was enacted, the C.I.A. agents we worked with spoke openly and confidently about replacing the government in Managua. Thereafter, the C.I.A. instructed us that, if asked, we should say that our objective was to interdict arms supposedly being smuggled from Nicaragua to El Salvador. If any of us ever said anything publicly about overthrowing the Nicaraguan Government, we would be visited immediately by a C.I.A. official who would say, "That's not the language we want you to use." But our goal, and that of the C.I.A. as well (as we were repeatedly assured in private), was to overthrow the Government of Nicaragua, and to replace the Sandinistas as a government. It was never our objective to stop the supposed flow of arms, of which we never saw any evidence in the first place. The public statements by United States Government officials about the arms flow, we were told by the C.I.A. agents with whom we worked, were necessary to maintain the support of the Congress and should not be taken seriously by us.

15. From January 1983 through June 1984, I worked for the F.D.N. full time and remained a member of the political directorate until November 1984. The C.I.A. paid me a salary of $2,000 a month to support myself and my family, plus expenses. Similar arrangements were made with the other F.D.N. "directors". I was put in charge of public relations for the F.D.N. We wanted to set up highly visible headquarters in a shopping center or office building, but the C.I.A. did not like the idea. They said it would become a target for demonstrations or violence. They insisted that we take an elegant suite at the David Williams Hotel in Coral Gables, Florida which the C.I.A. paid for.

16. At the end of January 1983, I was instructed to relocate to Tegucigalpa, Honduras to establish and manage the F.D.N.'s communications office. The C.I.A station in Tegucigalpa, which at that time included about 20 agents working directly with the F.D.N., gave me money, in cash, to hire several writers, reporters, and technicians to prepare a monthly bulletin called "Comandos," to run a clandestine radio station, and to write press releases. I was also given money by the C.I.A. to rent a house, office space and automobiles and to obtain office supplies and communications equipment. I also received money from the C.I.A. to bribe Honduran journalists and broadcasters to write and speak favorably about the F.D.N. and to attack the Government of Nicaragua and call for its overthrow. Approximately 15 Honduran journalists and broadcasters were on the C.I.A.'s payroll, and our influence was thereby extended to every major Honduran newspaper and radio and television station. (I learned from my C.I.A. colleagues that the same tactics was employed in Coasta Rica in an effort to turn the newspapers and radio and television stations of that country against the Nicaraguan Government). I worked very closely in all of these matters with several C.I.A. agents based in Tegucigalpa, but most closely with one of the deputy station chiefs, named "George," who had drafted the F.D.N.'s first press statement in Miami and was then transferred to Tegucigalpa to continue working with us. Together with "George," and subject to his approval, I planned all the activities of my communications office and prepared a budget. The budget was reviewed by the C.I.A. station in Tegucigalpa and, if approved, sent to Washington to obtain the necessary funds, which were always provided to me in cash.

17. I was not the only member of the directorate to prepare a budget in this fashion. Indalecio Rodriguez, who was put in charge of "civilian affairs," which meant assistance for Nicaraguan refugees in Honduras or family members of our combatants, worked with his C.I.A. "adviser" in the same manner in which I worked with "George." Adolfo Calero and Enrique Bermudez worked on the military and logistics budget. This budget was not as large as one might suppose. The F.D.N. never received money to purchase arms, ammunition or military equipment. These were acquired for us and delivered directly to us by the C.I.A. One of the senior agents at the C.I.A.'s Tegucigalpa station, known to us as "the Colonel," was an expert in these matters, and he, together with his assistants, determined what we needed and obtained it for us, including: arms, ammunition, uniforms, boots, radio equipment, etc. As long as I was in Honduras (until June 1984), the F.D.N. never acquired its own arms, ammunition or other military equipment. We were just the end receivers. The main items in the military and logistics budget that Calero and Bermudez worked on were things that could be acquired locally, such as food for our men, for which money had to be obtained from the C.I.A. Calero and Bermudez were our main links with the C.I.A. They met constantly with the C.I.A. station chief (whose name I cannot reveal here because I am uncertain whether it is his real name or a pseudonym) and his principal deputies.

18. Most of the C.I.A. operatives who worked with us in Honduras were military trainers and advisers. Our troops were trained in guerrilla warfare, sabotage, demolitions, and in the use of a variety of weapons, including assault rifles, machine guns, mortars, grenade launchers and explosives, such as Claymore mines. We were also trained in field communications, and the C.I.A. taught us how to use certain sophisticated codes that the Nicaraguan Government forces would not be able to decipher. This was critical to our military operations because it enabled various units, or task forces, to communicate with each other, and to coordinate their activities, without being detected by the Sandinistas. Without this communications capacity, our forces inside Nicaragua would not have been able to coordinate their activities with one another and they would have been unable to launch effective strikes at the designated targets. Even more critical to our military activities was the intelligence that the C.I.A. provided to us. The C.I.A. working with United States military personnel, operated various electronic interception stations in Honduras for the purpose of intercepting radio and telephonic communications among Nicaraguan Government military units. By means of these interception activities, and by breaking the Nicaraguan Government codes, the C.I.A. was able to determine—and to advise us of—the precise locations of all Nicaraguan Government military units. The information obtained by the C.I.A. in this manner was ordinarily corroborated by overflights of Nicaraguan territory by United States satellites and sophisticated surveillance aircraft. With this information, our own forces knew the areas in which they could safely operate free of government troops. If our units were instructed to do battle with the government troops, they knew where to set up ambushes, because the C.I.A. informed them of the precise routes the government troops would take. This type of intelligence was invaluable to us. Without it, our forces would not have been able to operate with any degree of effectiveness inside Nicaragua. The United States Government also made it possible for us to resupply our troops inside Nicaragua, thus permitting them to remain longer inside the country. Under cover of military maneuvers in Honduras during 1983, United States armed forces personnel constructed airstrips, including the one at Aquacate, that, after the C.I.A. provided us with airplanes, were instrumental in resupplying our troops.

19. The C.I.A. was also directly involved in our military tactics. The agency repeatedly ordered us to move our troops inside Nicaragua and to keep them there as long as possible. After our offensive at the end of 1982 was turned back, almost all of our troops were in Honduras and our own officers believed that they needed more training and more time before they would be ready to return to Nicaragua. The F.D.M. officers were overruled by the C.I.A., however. The agency told us that we had to move our men back into Nicaragua and keep fighting. We had no choice but to obey. In 1983, the C.I.A. instructed us not to destroy farms or crops because that would be politically counterproductive. In 1984, however, we were instructed to destroy export crops (especially coffee and tobacco), and to attack farms and cooperatives. Accordingly, we changed our tactics in 1984.

20. In July 1983, we were visited in Tegucigalpa by Duane Clarridge, the C.I.A. official, based in Washington, who was in charge of the agency's military and paramilitary activities against Nicaragua. At that time we were introduced to Clarridge as "Maroni." (I am free to state his real name because his identify has already been publicly disclosed in the United States). During a meeting with the political directorate, Clarridge told us that the C.I.A. had decided that something must be done to cut off Nicaragua's oil supplies, because without oil the Nicaraguan military would be immobilized and its capacity to resist our forces would be drastically reduced. Clarridge spoke of various alternatives. He said the Agency was considering a plan "to sink ships" bringing oil to Nicaragua, but that one problem with this plan was that if a ship belonging to the Soviet Union were sunk it could trigger a serious international incident. Clarridge said that the C.I.A. was also considering an attack on Nicaragua's sole oil refinery, located near Managua. According to Clarridge, however, the refinery was located in a densely populated area, and the civilian casualities resulting from such an attack would be politically counterproductive. Finally, Clarridge said that the Agency had decided on a plan to attack the oil pipelines at Puerto Sandino, on Nicaragua's Pacific Coast, where the oil tankers delivering oil to Nicaragua discharge their cargo.

21. In September 1983, the C.I.A. blew up the pipeline at Puerto Sandino, just as Clarridge had advised us it would. The actual operatives were Agency employees of Hispanic descent, referred to within the Agency as "Unilaterally Controlled Latino Assets" or UCLAs. These UCLAs, specially trained underwater demolitions experts, were despatched from a C.I.A. "mother ship" that took them to within striking distance of their target. Although the F.D.N. had nothing whatsoever to do with this operation, we were instructed by the C.I.A. to publicly claim responsibility in order to cover the C.I.A.'s involvement. We did. In October, C.I.A. UCLAs attacked Nicaragua's oil storage tanks at Corinto, also on the Pacific Coast. This was a combined sea and air attack involving the use of rockets. It was a complete success; all of the tanks were destroyed and enormous quantities of oil were consumed by fire. Again, the C.I.A. instructed us to publicly claim responsibility, and we did. Later in October, there was another UCLA attack on Puerto Sandino, which again resulted in the demolition of the oil pipeline. We again claimed responsibility per instructions from the C.I.A. Subsequently, the UCLAs attacked Nicaraguan Government military facilities at Potosi and radio antennas at Las Casitas. We again were told to claim responsibility and we did.

22. We had a second visit from Clarridge in October 1983. Clarridge told us that the Agency had decided that the F.D.N. needed a single spokesman in order to more effectively persuade the Congress to continue supporting the C.I.A.'s activities against Nicaragua, and that Calero should be the one. He asked us to make Calero the head of the political directorate and we did so without objection. Clarridge also told us that the Agency wanted us to launch another major offensive with the objective of seizing and holding Nicaraguan territory, no matter how small. He said that as soon as our hold on that territory was secured, we should establish a provisional government, which the United States and its Central American allies would promptly recognize as the legitimate Government of Nicaragua.

23. The offensive was launched at the end of 1983, after the Congress had appropriated—openly for the first time—$24,000,000 to the C.I.A. for military and paramilitary activities in and against Nicaragua. While our forces inflicted greater casualties on the government's troops and on civilians, and destroyed more property than in previous attacks, we nevertheless failed to take or hold any Nicaraguan territory and the majority of our troops were forced to return to their bases in Honduras.

24. On January 5, 1984, at 2:00 a.m., the C.I.A. deputy station chief of Tegucigalpa, the agent I knew as "George," woke me up at my house in Tegucigalpa and handed me a press release in excellent Spanish. I was surprised to read that we—the F.D.W.—were taking credit for having mined several Nicaraguan harbors. "George" told me to rush to our clandestine radio station and read this announcement before the Sandinistas broke the news. The truth is that we played no role in the mining of the harbors. But we did as instructed and broadcast the communique about the mining of the harbors. Ironically, approximately two months later, after a Soviet ship struck one of the mines, the same agent instructed us to deny that one of "our" mines had damaged the ship to avoid an international incident.

25. In May 1984 the United States Congress voted not to provide more assistance to the C.I.A. for military and paramilitary activities against Nicaragua. Many of us became worried about receiving continued support from the United States Government and we expressed these concerns to our C.I.A. colleagues in Tegucigalpa. We were repeatedly assured by the station chief and his deputies, in the strongest possible terms, that we would not be abandoned and that the United States Government would find a way to continue its support. At around this time we were visited by Ronald F. Lehman II, a Special Assistant to the President of the United States who was serving then on the National Security Council. Mr. Lehman assured us that President Reagan remained committed to removing the Sandinistas from power. He told us that President Reagan was unable at that time to publicly express the full extent of his commitment to us because of the upcoming presidential elections in the United States. But, Mr. Lehman told us, as soon as the elections were over, President Reagan would publicly endorse our effort to remove the Sandinistas from power and see to it that we received all the support that was necessary for that purpose. We received a similar assurance of continued United States Government support, notwithstanding the refusal of the Congress to appropriate more funds, from Lt. Col. Oliver North, another official of the National Security Council.

26. It was still important to these officials, and to the C.I.A., to obtain additional appropriations of funds from the Congress, and they had not abandoned hope that the Congress could be persuaded to resume funding our activities. Our C.I.A. colleagues enlisted us in an effort to "lobby" the Congress to resume these appropriations. I attended meetings at which C.I.A. officials told us that we could change the votes of many members of the Congress if we knew how to "sell" our case and place them in a position of "looking soft on Communism." They told us exactly what to say and which members of the Congress to say it to. They also instructed us to contact certain prominent individuals in the home districts of various members of Congress as a means of bringing pressure on these members to change their votes. At various times Calero, Callejas, Seledon, Salazar, Rodriguez and I participated in these "lobbying" activities.

27. A major part of my job as communications officer was to work to improve the image of the F.D.N. forces. This was challenging, because it was standard F.D.N. practice to kill prisoners and suspected Sandinista collaborators. In talking with officers in the F.D.N. camps along the Honduran border, I frequently heard offhand remarks like, "Oh, I cut his throat." The C.I.A. did not discourage such tactics. To the contrary, the Agency severely criticized me when I admitted to the press that the F.D.N. had regularly kidnapped and executed agrarian reform workers and civilians. We were told that the only way to defeat the Sandinistas was to use the tactics the Agency attributed to "Communist" insurgencies elsewhere: kill, kidnap, rob and torture.

28. These tactics were reflected in an operations manual prepared for our forces by a C.I.A. agent who used the name "John Kirkpatrick." I assisted "Kirkpatrick" in translating certain parts of the manual, and the manuscript was typed by my secretary. The manual was entitled: "Psychological Operations in Guerrilla Warfare." It advocated "explicit and implicit terror" against the civilian population, including assassination of government employees and sympathisers. Before the manual was distributed, I attempted to excise two passages that I thought were immoral and dangerous, at pages 70 and 71. One recommended hiring professional criminals. The other advocated killing some of our own colleagues to create martyrs for the cause. I did not particularly want to be "martyred" by the C.I.A. So I locked up all the copies of the manual and hired two youths to cut out the offending pages and glue in expurgated pages. About 2,000 copies of the manual, with only those two passages changed, were then distributed to F.D.N. troops. Upon reflection, I found many of the tactics advocated in the manual to be offensive, and I complained to the C.I.A. station chief in Tegucigalpa. The station chief defended "Kirkpatrick" and the manual, and no action was ever taken in response to my complaints. In fact, the practices advocated in the manual were employed by F.D.N. troops. Many civilians were killed in cold blood. Many others were tortured, mutilated, raped, robbed or otherwise abused.

29. As time went on, I became more and more troubled by the frequent reports I received of atrocities committed by our troops against civilians and against Sandinista prisoners. Calero and Bermudez refused to discuss the subject with me, so I went straight to our unit commanders as they returned from combat missions inside Nicaragua and asked them about their activities. I was saddened by what I was told. The atrocities I had heard about were not isolated incidents, but reflected a consistent pattern of behavior by our troops. There were unit commanders who openly bragged about their murders, mutilations, etc. When I questioned them about the propriety or wisdom of doing those things they told me it was the only way to win this war, that the best way to win the loyalty of the civilian population was to intimidate it and make it fearful of us. I complained to Calero and Bermudez, and to the C.I.A. station chief about these activities, but nothing was done to stop them. In June 1984, Clarridge visited us again. Although he was well aware of the terrorist tactics the F.D.N. troops were employing, he spoke warmly to Bermudez: "Well done, Colonel," I remember him saying, "Keep it up. Your boys are doing fine." It was the last time I saw him. Shortly thereafter, I acknowledged to a newspaper reporter that our troops had killed some civilians and executed some prisoners, though I tried to explain these practices as best I could. Calero told me I could no longer work in Honduras and I was reassigned to the local F.D.N. committee in Miami. I was given nothing to do and I no longer had much interest in working for the F.D.N., or to be more accurate, for the C.I.A.

30. When I agreed to join the F.D.N. in 1981, I had hoped that it would be an organization of Nicaraguans, controlled by Nicaraguans, and dedicated to our own objectives which we ourselves would determine. I joined on the understanding that the United States Government would supply us the means necessary to defeat the Sandinistas and replace them as a government, but I believed that we would be our own masters. I turned out to be mistaken. The F.D.N. turned out to be an instrument of the United States Government and, specifically, of the C.I.A. It was created by the C.I.A., it was supplied, equipped, armed and trained by the C.I.A. and its activities—both political and military—were directed and controlled by the C.I.A. Those Nicaraguans who were chosen (by the C.I.A.) for leadership positions within the organization—namely, Calero and Bermudez—were those who best demonstrated their willingness to unquestioningly follow the instructions of the C.I.A. They, like the organization itself, became nothing more than executioners of the C.I.A.'s orders. The organization became so thoroughly dependent on the United States Government and its continued support that, if that support were terminated, the organization would not only be incapable of conducting any military or paramilitary activities against Nicaragua, but it would immediately begin to disintegrate. It could not exist without the support and direction of the United States Government.

31. I became more and more distanced from the F.D.N. in the second half of 1984. I had, for all intents and purposes, ceased to be a part of the organization. Finally, on November 20, 1984, I received a letter stating that the political directorate had decided to relieve me of my duties. I made no protest.

32. My opposition to the Nicaraguan Government continues. I oppose its policies and programs and I would like to see it removed or replaced. This should be accomplished, however, by the Nicaraguan people themselves, and not by the United States Government or by its instruments, including the F.D.N., which follow its dictates and serve its interests instead of those of the Nicaraguan people. My presentation of this testimony to the International Court of Justice is not an expression of support or sympathy for the present Nicaraguan Government or its case against the United States. It is a result of my commitment to tell the truth, to all interested parties, about my personal experiences in the F.D.N. Since I left the organization at the end of 1984, I have spoken publicly in the United States about my experiences and I have made myself available to journalists whenever they have requested interviews. When Nicaragua's attorneys approached me and asked if I would present testimony about my experiences to the International Court of Justice, I decided to do so. This decision is consistent with my practice of speaking openly and honestly about my experiences before any interested body or forum. Whatever the best solution for the Nicaraguan people may be, I am convinced that it can only come about on the basis of truth, and that those of us with relevant personal experience are under a moral obligation to make the truth known.●

DAVE DUERSON

● Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, I bring to the Senate's attention a Hoosier member of the Chicago Bears Superbowl championship football team, Dave Duerson of Muncie, IN.

On a team of great players, Dave has made his mark and has proved that he is indeed one of the best. In only his first year as a starter, he has garnered praise from teammates, coaches, sportswriters, and fans alike. At strong safety, he is an integral part of the Bears' renowned "46" defense. On the blitz, his 6 foot 1 inch, 203 pound frame has inspired fear in many quarterbacks, while receivers have learned to respect his speed and agility. A recent article in the New York Times called Duerson a "thinking man's safety" noted that the Bears' complex defense requires both outstanding mental and physical capability. Perhaps the ultimate confirmation of Duerson's talent was his selection to be a member of this year's Pro Bowl team.

Duerson has earned praise as more than an athlete, however. I was fortunate to know Dave Duerson when he was an intern on my staff in the summer of 1982. He combines physical ability with a strong character, warm personality, and keen intelligence. Playing on my staff softball team, he amazed others with his strength and propensity to hit home runs, yet always tempered his own ego with humility.

Dave is a graduate of Notre Dame with a degree in economics and was a member of his high school National Honor Society. He founded the Damco Corp., a camp that promotes drug and alcohol awareness among youth. To those of us who know Dave Duerson, he has been an inspiration both on and off the playing field.●

TRADE ADJUSTMENT ASSISTANCE

● Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, I submit for the RECORD the editorial which appeared in today's Journal of Commerce on the legislation introduced by myself and Senator MOYNIHAN on trade adjustment assistance.

Today, the preliminary announcement of the U.S. trade deficit for 1985 of $148.5 billion confirms our expectations that the deficit for 1985 would be at an all-time and unacceptable high. The deficit number also makes it absolutely clear that this is no time to eliminate trade adjustment assistance.

The editorial follows:

TRADE AID PROPOSAL LIVES

Despite presistent efforts by the Reagan administration, trade adjustment assistance legislation lives on Capitol Hill. A stubborn Congress has refused to back away from a program of government assistance for workers who lose jobs to imports. Now a new and better version of trade adjustment assistance is pending, and in spite of a frenzied atmosphere of budget cutting in Washington, this bill deserves support.

Congress can now make an even stronger case for trade adjustment because the new program would not draw on the taxpayer's dollar at all, but would instead be funded by a duty of 1 percent or less of the value of imports. Import duties are generally not the best way to aid struggling domestic industries, but in this case the duty is small—totaling only about $300 million on $350 billion worth of imports—and the program's potential is great.

A temporary casualty of Congress' inability to agree on a deficit reduction plan in December, the proposal deserves more attention than it has attracted. The budget fight centers on financing the Superfund for toxic waste cleanup. When it goes back to conference, Superfund, and not trade adjustment assistance, is expected to be in the spotlight.

The Office of Management and Budget indicates that the trade adjustment assistance program will be vetoed if passed by Congress. Sen. Phil Gramm, R-Texas, leads the administration's fight. But some administration sources say the trade assistance package is a little fish in a big pond and will not be killed by a veto if it is attached to the larger Superfund bill.

The conference members are bipartisan co-sponsors of the trade aid. They include 11 members of the Senate Finance Committee and the program's author, Sen. William V. Roth Jr., R-Del. The National Retail Merchants Association and other free trade groups are supporting the plan as a way to give firms a chance to adjust to import competition and a way to resist protectionist trade barriers.

In December, Congress did pass a continuing resolution providing $26 million to continue the training, job search and relocation assistance under the program, but not the unemployment compensation. In addition, loans, guarantees and technical assistance to firms were not funded.

The administration proposes an inadequate substitute in the form of much less funding under the Job Training and Partnership Act. This law provides for Labor Department-administered training, job search and relocation, but no unemployment benefits or aid to industry.

The Commerce Department is now in the process of "orderly disengagement" of its assistance to firms under the program. The Labor Department estimates that when funds were cut off on Dec. 19, between 10,000 and 15,000 workers were left in the lurch.

The $300 million in revenues earned under Sen. Roth's version of the program compares to the price tag for the current program—about $70 million a year. Sen. Roth points out that he borrowed the idea from Hong Kong. Everyone thinks Hong Kong is a free port, he says, but in fact, it assesses a small fee—0.05 percent—on all imports and exports and uses the fee for trade promotion.

The reformed program would continue all the old program's benefits to workers but add a new eligibility requirement and a new benefit. A worker would have to agree to retraining in order to receive a trade readjustment allowance. If no training program is available or suitable, an exception would be made. Workers would be given a $4,000 retraining voucher redeemable for training.

In the meantime, the giant trade deficit continues to grow. It is estimated that up to 80 percent of U.S. production faces import competition. The more aid aimed at adjustment to competition the better.

Failure to provide enough money for such workers and firms will make protectionist legislation seem more attractive to Congress and contribute to the vicious circle that has made ailing industries and unemployment a permanent fixture of the U.S. economy.●

THE DECLINE IN AMERICAN TRADE COMPETITIVENESS

● Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, in the last 36 hours two statistics were released that show that the United States continues to face a worsening crisis in its international trade position. Figures released yesterday by the Department of Labor state that U.S. business productivity fell 1.3 percent during the last 3 months of 1985, which is the sharpest decline in productivity in 4 years. Thus the productivity gain for 1985 as a whole was only 0.3 percent. Figures released today by the Department of Commerce show that the U.S. merchandise trade deficit hit a record high of $148 billion in 1985. This exceeds the 1984 merchandise trade deficit by $25 billion.

Manufactured goods had a deficit of nearly $113 billion in 1985, an increase of $23 billion from 1984. This manufactured goods deficit accounts for over 90 percent of the increase in the overall trade deficit and is the primary factor in explaining our worsening trade competitiveness.

Manufacturing imports are the largest component of the trade deficit next to petroleum, and they are dominated by the record number of automobiles imported primarily from Japan. Autos accounted for $32 billion of our bilateral trade deficit, or nearly a third of our imports from Japan.

All of these statistics show that the industrial competitiveness of the United States—relative to our major trading partners—has worsened in the most recent period.

Our competitiveness in international trade is a matter of national importance and urgency. President Reagan's own Commission on Industrial Competitiveness—the Young Commission—found that our inability to compete is a long-term and pervasive problem that hinders our economic growth. Competitiveness is the means to provide employment for Americans and to increase our standard of living. Competitiveness is vital to our ability to uphold our political, economic, and military commmitments worldwide.

This decline in American competitiveness is not a short-term problem caused by the down-side of a business cycle. It is also not just a monetary problem that can be resolved only by devaluing the American dollar. Rather it is the result of longer term forces at work in the American and the international economy.

Major changes have occurred in the way the international economy has been functioning since the 1970's. For example, our major new competitors come from the Pacific Rim states, Japan, South Korea, Taiwan, Singapore, and Hong Kong. It is estimated that U.S. trade with these states will be double that of our European trading partners by 1995. Our current trade imbalance with Japan reached $49.7 billion in 1985, nearly one-third of our overall merchandise trade deficit. Our new competitors have developed a new kind of competition; a concerted national strategy by national governments that is being mimicked and adapted all over East Asia; working with companies in a single-minded nationalist policy to continually increase exports and market share. As a result of these state-led strategies, they have also been able to maintain higher levels of investment and productivity growth than the United States for two decades.

These recent economic indicators demonstrate the severity of the problem. Our major trade policy objective must be to restore American competitiveness. This needs to be a top agenda item for Congress, the executive branch and industry.

Unfortunately, the administration continues to put trade policy on the back burner. The growth in our merchandise trade deficit and the stagnation in our productivity have not been answered with any overall coherent policy. Instead the administration has continued its piecemeal approach of negotiations on a sector-by-sector basis which does not lead to any fundamental reform.

We need a more realistic long-term trade strategy that balances American economic needs and the requirements of the world economy. We must develop a consensus to act now to meet the trade challenges facing the United States.●

CONDOLENCES FROM EXECUTIVE SECRETARY, INTERPARLIAMENTARY UNION

● Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. President, as President of the United States Group to the Interparliamentary Union, I ask to have printed in the RECORD a telegram of condolence from the Executive Secretary of the Interparliamentary Union, Mr. Terenzio, in connection with the tragic accident to our space shuttle and her crew.

The telegram follows.

JANUARY 30, 1986.

Senator ROBERT T. STAFFORD,
President, U.S. Interparliamentary Group.

Saddened tragic accident which befell crew of space shuttle Challenger. Please convey my sincere condolences to U.S. Congress and Government and to families of victims.

Regards,

TERENZIO.●

DECLINING U.S. COMPETITIVENESS

● Mr. BINGAMAN. Mr. President, I would like to take a few minutes today to point out today's release of a little noticed but tremendously important Government statistic.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics tells us that U.S. productivity dropped at an annual rate of 1.3 percent in the last quarter of 1985. This is the sharpest decline in 4 years. The decrease, when farming is excluded, was an even sharper 1.8 percent. That means that for the entire year, productivity grew at a negligible three-tenths of 1 percent compared with 2.1 percent in 1984.

Mr. President, these are admittedly dry, obscure, and perhaps little understood, additional Government statistics in the barrage of statistics released monthly in Washington. But, let me tell you what they mean, why they are important, and why they should not be ignored.

According to analysts, the decline in productivity is a reflection of the slowdown in economic growth last year. The last time there was a similar sharp drop was the fourth quarter of 1981, when annual productivity fell by 5.3 percent. The Bureau of Labor Statistics said the latest decline reflected a 3.9-percent increase in the number of hours worked and a 2.5-percent gain in the output of goods and services.

The Government also said that employment increased 2.9 percent in 1985, a rise that "was a good deal smaller" than the 5.1 percent of 1984. Also the number of average hours worked weekly dropped for the first time since the end of the 1981–82 recession.

Today the Government also announced the merchandise trade deficit for 1985, which reached a new record of approximately $148.5 billion. One third of this deficit is due to petroleum imports which accounted for a total of $52.4 billion. This amount is significant and we should be concerned.

Taken separately, these statistics each are cause for alarm. Taken together they are a 5-alarm fire. And we have not even called out the fire trucks.

Taken together these figures—the decline in productivity, the decreased rate of employment, the rising trade deficit and the resulting slow down in our economic growth—indicate to me an ever growing decline in our economic competitiveness.

We are without question in a new global economy facing stiff competition from more and more nations. Our ability to produce and sell goods and services at home and abroad is increasingly threatened. This declining ability to compete means one thing—it means we face a substantial decline in our standard of living if we don't reverse current trends.

One year ago this week, President Reagan's Commission on Industrial Competitiveness issued its report. Prepared by a distinguished group of American businessmen, former Government officials, labor leaders, and academics, it concluded that "America's ability to compete in world markets must be improved." The report carried several pages of solid recommendations. Unfortunately most of them have been ignored by the President and the Congress. But the problem of competitiveness it describes has not gone away. Instead it has grown worse and it is getting steadily more serious.

Mr. President, it is long past the time for us to come to grips with trade deficits, stagnant real wages, job losses, Government deficits, declining productivity and much more.

I am pleased that the distinguished minority leader, who is acutely aware of these problems, recently created a Senate Democratic Working Group on Economic Competitiveness. I am honored to serve on that group as its chairman along with my distinguished colleagues, Senators BAUCUS, KERRY, LEVIN, MATSUNAGA, MOYNIHAN, RIEGLE, and ROCKEFELLER. We intend in the coming months to address our competitiveness ills and to focus on their causes. I hope we can come to a consensus on lasting solutions.

In the meantime we must accept these grim but convincing Government statistics as unhappy harbingers of what lies ahead if we do not act. They point to a problem as deadly for our economy as a single cancerous cell if it is permitted to multiply.●

WE HAVE A DREAM

● Mr. MURKOWSKI. Mr. President, I would like to take a few moments to praise some very special Alaskan teenagers for their efforts to help retire the national debt—Andrea L. Anderson, Emmett Anderson, Douglas Antemie, Arnold Kalmakoff, Darrell Kalmakoff, Norman Kalmakoff, Parnell Kalmakoff, Patt Kalmakoff, Anita Marie Lind, Lisa M. Lind, Angela Shangin, Emily Speer, Terry Stephanoff, and Carl Willie.

These students attend Chignik Lake School in Chignik Lake, AK, and have taken it upon themselves to organize a fundraising drive to help pay off our country's financial obligation. Last fall they sent President Reagan their first $1,000 check, which was made out to the U.S. Government and endorsed "for use on the National Debt only."

Their project was inspired by the school's principal, Mr. David Smith, who was looking for a way to get his students involved in public issues. His efforts perked the students' interest, and they have been speaking about the debt problem to interested groups, informing anyone who will listen and trying to inspire others to action as well.

Contributions to this worthy cause can be made to Alaska Concerned Students for a Retired Deficit, P.O. Box 498, King Salmon, AL 99613. The concerned students also would like everyone to spread the word by contacting two friends. I ask that written material from this dedicated group of citizens be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. President, these students from Alaska remind us again that the national debt will have its greatest negative impact on our children and grandchildren. These students are setting the example of concerned citizenship, and I applaud their efforts.

The material follows:

How would you like to get a piece of gum from the store and find out you had to take a wheelbarrow full of U.S. currency to get it? Would you like to have a $1,000 in the bank and wait two years and find that you had nothing in the bank when you went back? Would you like to study hard for a job and find out that there are none?

This is what will happen in the immediate future if we do not retire the national debt. David Stockman, the recent Director of the Budget, said that if we do not do something about the national debt in the next five years, we will have the worst depression that we have ever had.

Since the beginning of this country we have spent more money than we have been taking in. You know that you can't earn a $1,000 and expect to spend a million. It just won't work.

This problem won't just go away and no one seems to be doing anything about it. Adults won't, the Congress won't, businesses won't but the students of Chignik Lake High School will! We have a dream that this nightmare will vanish.

As you can see from the graph since 1790 until 1981 we charged one trillion dollars. That's about 200 years. The second trillion dollars we have charged in about five years. And if this keeps up, our dollar will be a worthless piece of paper. Argentina's peso is in that condition now.

Most people think that we can't retire the debt. But the youth of America will not accept that! We have a dream of a prosperous future. Arnold Von Winkelried, a Swiss hero, in the face of certain defeat led a group of farmers with sticks, rocks and pitchforks against the enemy. He cried, "This day I die for Switzerland!" His efforts inspired his countrymen to win the battle and to set up Switzerland as a neutral nation from then on. If one person can make a difference, what can all of us do together?

The boy of Flanders, one person, saved his country by taking action.

Samantha Smith asked for peace. Her efforts got the world's attention.

One person by themselves can do little but if all of us join hands as a nation we can make our dream come true. The strength of our Nation is in its people, people who are willing to work together to save our future. We have a dream that we can keep the American dream alive.

We challenge you, Alaska! We challenge you, America! Stand up and be counted. We are a small group of students in Chignik Lake, Alaska. We have started a fund to retire the national debt. We are donating $1,000 toward that goal. It is being sent directly to President Reagan asking him to put it directly on the debt and support our efforts.

We are asking you to do three things to insure everyone's future. You owe it to yourself and to America's youth.

1. Donate dollars to Alaska Concerned Students for a Retired Deficit. The address is Box 498 King Salmon, AK 99613. Or send it directly to the President.

2. Call or write your National and State Congressmen and Senators. Call or write the President.

3. Call two other friends and tell them to do exactly the same thing.

Benjamin Franklin coined the phrase. "A stitch in time saves nine." Your dollar today can save millions tomorrow. We have a dream that the nightmare of all nightmares—the national debt—can be ended and the American dream again become a reality. Let's not let our future and our Nation's future "perish from the earth".

Thank you.●

PARENTS INVOLVEMENT IN CHILD EDUCATION

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I wish to draw the attention of the Senate to some excellent work recently published by the Home and School Institute. Dorothy Rich, president of that institute, has written a handbook for policymakers, advising all of us of the critical importance of involving parents in the education of children of all ages. I urge my colleagues to peruse the following excerpts from this publication entitled: "The Forgotten Factor in School Success—The Family."

I ask that the excerpts from the Home and School Institute handbook and an article by William Raspberry of the Washington Post describing that handbook be printed in the RECORD.

The material follows:

[From the Washington Post, Nov. 4, 1985]

LITTLE TRICKS FOR LEARNING

(By William Raspberry)

The title of Dorothy Rich's new policy maker's guide—"The Forgotten Factor in School Success: The Family"—sounds anachronistic. The family a forgotten factor? Why, everybody these days talks about the importance of home training, family reinforcement, parental involvement.

Rich hears the talk, too. But she knows that too often that's all it is. State and federal legislation on schooling seldom addresses what parents might usefully do; local school administrators, while they might spend a lot of effort coaxing parents to come out for special nights, almost never give parents anything to do that would help their children learn.

They don't, I suspect, because they don't know how to involve parents in the learning process. If that guess is correct, they ought to listen to Dorothy Rich.

Rich, founder and president of the Washington-based Home and School Institute and a recogized expert in the area of family-assisted learning, has, in two decades of research and practice, come up with a bundle of low-cost, common-sense ways for parents to help their children in school.

"The crucial thing is to have a partnership between teachers and parents," she says. "The need is for a role for the family that is complementary, not duplicative of what teachers are doing. There's so much that kids can learn in families that they cannot learn even in the best of schools."

What, for instance? Well, time management, for one. "Children forget what they are supposed to do and why they are supposed to do it. So in order to give them a memory jogger and help them plan ahead, I have parents get a plain calendar with squares for each day and ordinary colored markers or crayons. Starting with the current month, you go over the calendar with the [elementary age] child, filling in special days—birthdays, appointments and so on. Let the child decorate the calendar to personalize it, and then hung it where everyone can see and use it.

"With that as a base, you can talk about the future—'How old will you be in 1991? How old will I be? What do you think we'll be doing?' "

Or, one of Rich's favorites, the family "TV diet." "You agree to go on a TV diet for a week, meaning that, for that week, the family will watch no more than two hours of television a day. You sit down as a family, select the shows, add up the viewing times and post the list. You can have some family games or puzzles or books ready for the non-viewing hours. After a week, the family might agree to reward itself with a picnic or some special outing."

All of Rich's tricks—and it's something of a disservice to list just one or two—do at least double duty, sometimes more. The TV diet, for instance, teaches time management and self-discipline and also brings the family closer together. If the children are invited to discuss the strengths and weaknesses of the shows they view, it helps to develop their critical abilities. And most of the things Rich suggests involve at least some reading and writing.

This sort of thing—which some parents do on their own and which virtually all would do if they were prompted to do so and told of the educational implications for their children—is what Rich means when she talks about parental involvement.

Her booklet concerns itself mostly with a philosophical overview and policy recommendations. My own fascination, though, is with the particulars of how to do it.

Rich's little tricks cost virtually no money and not much time—the necessary materials can be sent home by the children, saving parents even the necessity of a trip to school. And yet it seems obvious that the payoff is far greater than you could hope to get from having a parent serve as a classroom volunteer or member of some busywork advisory boards.

THE FORGOTTEN FACTOR IN SCHOOL SUCCESS—THE FAMILY: A POLICYMAKER'S GUIDE BY DOROTHY RICH

FIVE QUESTIONS

The handbook addresses five major questions. Brief answers to each follow. Supporting details are found in the text.

What problems can family involvement solve?

Family involvement programs address major school problems. Among them are: disappointing student academic achievement; poor work behaviors and attitudes of students; and breakdown of the relationship between home and school.

Evidence outlined in Section I indicates that parent involvement:

Raises the academic achievement of students;

Improves attitudes and performance of children in school;

Helps parents understand the work of the schools;

Enables parents and children to communicate more and show their caring toward each other; and Builds school-community relationships in an ongoing, problem-preventing way.

This does not happen immediately. While not everything is yet known about family involvement, enough is now known about its benefits. Action needs to be taken to begin integrating family involvement in all school subjects and all school years.

Why is involving families so important now?

An urgent need today is to find ways to deal constructively with the fact that the majority of mothers are in the workforce and a growing number of children are living in single parent homes.

Many education issues today deal with families and with parent needs. These cut across all grade levels and include such topics as: schooling for 4-year-olds, care for latchkey children, tuition tax credits, vouchers, home schooling, student achievement, magnet schools, private schooling, and high school dropouts.

Family demographics affect the work of the school. Section VI presents current research on the impact of employed mothers and single parent households on student achievement. While not all answers or even all questions are yet known, enough is now known to support changes for schools to have programs and policies that work effectively with today's families.

What does good family involvement look like?

The traditional form of family involvement of the last two decades has been the Advisory Council with families in an advisory capacity, as in PAC's. Good or effective family involvement appropriate for today's families is different. The advisory role, while it may have been a relevant and useful model at the time it was designed, is no longer the most appropriate involvement method. This is due to changes in family life and to the findings of educational research.

Effective involvement today needs to be based on a non-deficit view of families. More traditionally, families have been identified by deficits, with the school in a compensatory role. The position of this guide, based on experience with thousands of families, is that there are strengths in every family that can be mobilized into effective educational action. Good involvement provides learning strategies for families to use at home. these reinforce but do not duplicate the school. It uses the school, community agencies, and businesses to "deliver support" to families in their important role in the education of their children.

What can schools do?

Schools must be ready to care about adults as well as children. Schools must begin to include parent involvement as a legitimate, integral part of its programs, recognizing that successful teaching of reading and math involves families. This means people, materials, and programs to enlist families as educational partners. Reaching the family must be considered as important as reaching the child. This means change from past practices which have tended to isolate schools from the community.

For public schools to attract and keep families (who have a choice as to which school to send their children), schools must show that they care about parents. A difference between public and private schools, some say, is that private schools respond more to parent needs, with more individualized attention to student and family.

This guide provides specific recommendations with examples for action. Among them are: the use of home education activities that employ the unique resources of the home to expand the work of the school; ways to provide teachers with training and information to help them work well with families; the use of school facilities for community needs; emphasis on early prevention of learning problems by reaching parents at local businesses, hospitals, and community agencies; involvement of senior citizens and non-parents in school-related activities; the connection of parent/school programs with organizations such as Parents Without Partners and American Association of Retired Persons.

What can policymakers do?

The Partnership for Excellence Design outlined in Section V includes: An Information Campaign on the Importance of Parents as Educators; Establishment of a Parent Educational Delivery System; and systematic programs of Home Learning Activities For Families and Others To Use With Children. A list of basic tasks and a projection of costs are provided. Starting modestly, it is possible to launch an effort at the state level for $75,000. At the school system level, it is possible to launch this design for $40,000, which provides a number of schools with direct services.

A 20 Question Checklist to help policymakers frame family-school initiatives has been specifically designed for this guide (Section III). This Checklist is useful in evaluating potential policies and programs to assess their "family factor" orientation.

Emphasis on the role of parents as educators may take some public reeducation. Generally speaking, the public has been accustomed to a school-community relations approach, more of a public relations effort rather than an educational sharing effort. Also, the public may confuse this new campaign with home-schooling, but not if policymakers are aware of these concerns in advance. (See Points to Focus On below.)

The material in this guide prepares policymakers to take the strategic leadership position in family-school involvement: holding hearings, evaluating programs and policies, organizing allies, and gaining and holding media attention.

POINTS TO FOCUS ON

Distinctive themes of this guide

The key is to recognize the family—every family—as a system for teaching and learning. Surveys indicate public concern and readiness to get involved. Data such as the numbers of children in poverty and numbers of single parents can seem almost unmanageable. The message and the program in this guide, based on research and experience, show that there are practical, effective strategies that can be used to address these conditions.

Political feasibility

The basic tenet of the family-as-educator approach outlined in this guide crosses ideological lines. These programs provide noncontroversial approaches to issues that were often avoided because of potential controversy. This approach offers policymakers a viable middle ground on school-family issues, presenting new premises from which constructive public debate can follow.

Importance of student attitudes brought from home

Schooling reforms for the late 80's and 90's, to be really effective, must focus on the attitudes students bring into school from home. A student's attitudes and self-esteem are key determiners of achievement. Schools depend on the "input" from the home—particularly the attitudes and the motivation that children bring to the classroom. However, the majority of schools have not yet worked with the home in sustained, systematic ways.

Different roles for teacher and parent

The parent involvement approach recommended by this guide is the involvement of the home that extends the work of the school. It is based on the different strengths of the home and the classroom.

The roles of parents and teachers are different—they are different but they are complementary. The family is in the ideal position to prepare for, expand, and extend the work of the school. To use the family only to duplicate the school does not take advantage of the family's significant educational role. There is traditional homework, but there is also the opportunity for families to engage in individualized give-and-take with students at "teachable moments" that teachers can only dream about.

"Home-schooling" and family involvement

The family-as-educator role differs from "home schooling." Family involvement in this guide refers to the more informal but strong role parents play in preparing children for school and in reinforcing and expanding the work of the school through learning experiences at home.

Home schooling refers to the taking over by the family of the children's schooling in place of sending the youngsters to school. While there is some public interest in home schooling, the vast majority of children will continue to go outside their own homes for formal schooling.

"School-community relations" and family involvement

School-community relations, as more traditionally defined, is based on public relations and building of goodwill towards the school. This should not be confused with the parent involvement approach defined in this guide which is intimately connected with the academic goals of the schools. This involvement is grounded in the research that supports the educational role of the family. An added bonus is that it builds excellent public relations for schools from a solid base of parent support.

Four rules for involvement programs

1. Link parents' involvement directly to the learning of their own children. An important reward for parents is their children's school success.

2. Provide ways for families to reinforce academic skills at home. Easy home learning techniques foster learning: young children use the TV schedule to keep to time limits, and dial and read telephone numbers; older students make "best buy" purchases at the grocery store and use maps to plan family trips.

3. Link the school's work to the community. Schools must share the responsibility of education. Home learning activities can be distributed at workplaces, churches, gas stations, and grocery stores. They can be provided in adaptations for bilingual and special education students. The wider public, including senior citizens, need to participate.

4. Provide for parent involvement at all levels of schooling. Research and parent programs have primarily centered on early childhood, but continuing support is needed as children move through school. Teens need help from home to get the best from the secondary years.

Parent involvement deserves consistent backing in the same way that the teaching of reading deserves consistent backing.

CURRENT MOMENTUM AND OPPORTUNITY

School and family responsibilities are increasing and will increase even more in the near future. Before 1990, there will be more young children in school and more mothers in the workplace. For more students to succeed, it is vital to enable families to have greater positive impact on children's schooling. There is today a convergence of forces and needs about families and schools:

Teachers are realizing more than ever that they must work in partnership with parents and the community.

A growing research base is affirming the impact of families as educators of their children.

Today's parents are more schooled than ever before, making it more possible for families to help their children.

There is strong interest in this country in self-help initiatives rather than in waiting for government and institutions to take care of individual needs.

The family may look different today but parents continue to care about their children. Teachers care about the achievement of their students. Both have more abilities and potential to do a more successful job than ever before.

These are the strengths that policymakers can build upon.●

JONAS SAVIMBI'S VISIT TO WASHINGTON

● Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, this week marks the arrival in Washington of Jonas Savimbi, the leader of the UNITA guerrilla forces in Angola. He comes here seeking financial and military aid from the Congress for his efforts to overthrow the Government of Angola.

It has been reported recently that the administration will offer him moral support for his struggle. There have been suggestions that the administration may offer covert aid to UNITA. Some conservatives in the Congress and elsewhere wish to go further, and offer Mr. Savimbi and his forces economic and/or military assistance totaling millions of dollars. Mr. Savimbi's supporters argue that he is leading a crusade against communism in Angola, and that for this reason we in the United States should give him our support.

As the ranking member of the African Affairs Subcommittee of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, I believe that it is important for those of us in the Congress who are charged with making these decisions to review the history of Angola and the current situation there carefully before reaching a judgment on this matter.

Mr. President, Angola has been at war for 25 years, since 1961. Prior to 1975, Mr. Savimbi's group UNITA, the now-ruling party of MPLA, and other rebel forces fought to free Angola from Portuguese colonial occupation. Since 1975, Angola has been wracked by civil war. UNITA has waged war against the Marxist government of Angola in an effort to topple it and seize power.

Because Jonas Savimbi is leading the struggle against a Marxist regime, and because he seeks support from the Reagan administration and from American conservatives, he has tried to portray himself as an anti-Communist crusader. But the facts reveal otherwise.

Mr. Savimbi in fact has long been an avowed Marxist and Maoist. As a guerrilla leader in the 1960's, he spent a year in China undergoing political training, and returned to Angola describing himself as a Marxist-Leninist, and his enemies as "notorious agents of imperialism." In 1970, UNITA's magazine, Kwacha-Angola, named its heroes and mentors as "great revolutionaries such as Mao Tse-tung, General Giap, Ho Chi Minh, Che Guevara, and many others."

As recently as September 8, 1984, in an interview with the Portuguese newspaper Expresso, Mr. Savimbi declared: "We felt that the Chinese philosphy could succeed in Angola, which was the case." He also said that "We are in favor of socialism because it is necessary to socialize production. Only in this way can values be created in people."

The fact is, Mr. President, that Jonas Savimbi is a long-time, self-avowed Marxist and Maoist revolutionary. How ironic, then, that he now seeks to portray himself as an anti-Communist crusader, and that he is being embraced by rightwing conservatives in this country. It is my understanding that the Conservative Caucus, an extreme rightwing group, recently named Jonas Savimbi as their "Man of the Year." Politics does indeed make strange bedfellows.

As columnist Richard Cohen wrote recently in the Washington Post:

> The "ism" that probably best motivates Savimbi is opportunism. That explains his alliance with South Africa. It is from it that Savimbi gets what it takes to wage his guerrilla war, and it is from Pretoria that he takes orders. The UNITA-South Africa relationship is so cozy that Savimbi was the only black African leader to attend President P.W. Botha's inauguration. Even African leaders who appreciate that UNITA has to take support where it is offered were offended by that. Consequently, Savimbi is a pariah in black Africa—the continent's No. 1 Uncle Tom.

Mr. President, if the United States were to now begin to offer military and economic support to Jonas Savimbi and UNITA, it would destroy any remaining credibility that this Nation has as an opponent of apartheid. UNITA is closely allied with the South African regime, so closely that it could not survive without South African support and assistance.

There is no way to assist UNITA without at the same time assisting the apartheid regime in South Africa. This fact alone separates the Angolan situation from those in Afghanistan, Cambodia, and Nicaragua. South Africa is the principal sponsor and arms supplier for UNITA, and South African forces perform direct combat roles side by side with UNITA forces. They also help UNITA indirectly by their own attacks against the MPLA forces in southern Angola, which South Africa has repeatedly invaded. Any aid to UNITA will ally us with the apartheid regime in South Africa, and will undermine our pressures on South Africa to dismantle apartheid, and to stop its aggression in southern Africa.

It is also worth mentioning, Mr. President, that UNITA has a long history of human rights abuses in Angola. These range from the kidnapping of foreign nationals—including Americans—for propaganda purposes, to murder and physical mutilation of civilians, to the shooting down of civilian aircraft, which resulted in the death of an American citizen in 1984. In April 1984, UNITA emulated the tactics of the terrorists in Beirut by driving a jeep loaded with explosives to a 7-story building in Huambo, Angola, killing over 100 people.

It has been argued by some that by aiding UNITA, we will roll back Soviet and Cuban influence in Angola by producing the overthrow of the MPLA government, or by forcing it into a coalition with UNITA. The reality is, Mr. President, that the Soviets and the Cubans have invested their prestige in Angola, and they are not about to retreat in the face of increased aid to UNITA. Rather, they will escalate their own aid, to increase Angolan dependence on Soviet and Cuban support. No effort to roll back Soviet and Cuban influence in Angola will be successful unless it takes into account the fact that their presence is mainly the result of South African military pressures in Angola. The Soviets and the Cubans arrived in force in Angola in 1975 to back the MPLA against other factions which were aided by South African and Zairean forces. In 1976–77, the number of Cuban troops was significantly reduced as South African and other external pressures eased. Subsequent South African attacks and invasions of Angolan territory, and increased support of UNITA, has caused an increase in Soviet advisers and equipment, and Cuban troops.

Mr. President, the best way to roll back the Soviet and Cuban military presence in Angola is to obtain the withdrawal of South African forces from the neighboring country of Namibia, which are illegally occupying that nation, and the cessation of South African support for UNITA. Angola has already agreed not only to a plan of withdrawal of almost 80 percent of the Cubans over a 3-year period when South Africa withdraws from Namibia, but it has also indicated that it will expedite the total withdrawal of Cuban troops if externally aided attacks are ended.

Mr. President, if the United States begins now to give aid to UNITA, it will end any role for the United States as an honest broker in southern Africa. It will defeat all of our efforts to bring independence to Namibia, and an end to the illegal South African occupation. It will destroy our efforts to bring about change in the apartheid system in South Africa, and it will ally us with the white racist regime in that country.

As the Washington Post editorialized on Tuesday, January 28:

> A three-purpose negotiation has been proceeding—it limps but it lives—to bring peace to Angola, independence to Namibia, and border security to South Africa. The United States is running this negotiation; despite everything, only the United States has access to all parties to keep running it. If, however, Washington stops trying to act as a mediator in Angola's civil war and instead joins it as a military patron of one side, then forget about the whole negotiation. Forget about trying to help settle southern Africa down.

Mr. President, it is true that Angola has a Marxist government. It is also true that the United States is the only major Western nation to refuse to establish diplomatic relations with Angola. It is also true that Angola has a major trade and economic relations with the United States, and is our fourth-largest trade partner in Africa. Angola's three largest trading partners are the United States, the Netherlands, and Brazil, and the Angolans desire to have good relations with the United States and other Western countries.

Mr. President, my distaste for Marxist regimes is as great as any of my colleagues in this body. I do not sympatize with the Angolan Government. But I am also a realist. I believe that the best way to limit escalation on both sides in Angola, is to press on with negotiations, for South African withdrawal from Namibia, and Cuban withdrawal from Angola.

As a veteran of Vietnam, I do not wish to see our country emulate that experience in southern Africa, and become involved in an escalating conflict in Angola. I hope that we have learned enough from the experience of Vietnam to judge more wisely where to draw the line regarding the limits of American involvement in foreign conflicts.

Mr. President, as we note the arrival in Washington this week of Jonas Savimbi, I hope that my colleagues will carefully consider where to draw that line, and what role we wish to play in southern Africa, before we decide whether or not to give our support to UNITA. And I hope that we will make that decision with a sense of history. It has often been said that those who do not learn from history are doomed to repeat it. Let it not be said that we have failed to learn from history, and that we have repeated our past mistakes in Angola.●

NATIONAL NATURBAHN CHAMPIONSHIP

● Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, my State of Michigan is proud to host the National Naturbahn Championship this coming weekend, February 1 and 2, at the newly designated Olympic Training Center in Marquette, MI. Naturbahn is a form of luge, a very specialized international sport. This competition is the first endeavor by the U.S. Luge Association to develop a strong Naturbahn program in this country. A select few of the competitors in this event will be sent to Europe to compete for the World Cup.

I would like to thank my colleagues that contributed their State flags to the Naturbahn Championship. I am hopeful that this competition will become an annual event, and will provide the impetus to develop a national Naturbahn team.●

ON THE U.S TRADE DEFICIT

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, today I rise to speak, once again, on the deplorable state of the U.S. merchandise trade deficit.

This morning, the Department of Commerce released the figures for last year's mechandise trade between the United States and the rest of the world. The news, while not unexpected, is still unacceptable: A trade deficit of $148.5 billion, our largest ever.

The trade deficit increased $25.2 billion in 1985. According to the International Trade Commission and the Department of Commerce, that means we lost 630,000 new job opportunities.

That our trade imbalance grew 20 percent last year reflects the fact that we continue to record trade deficits with our major trading partners: With Japan, a deficit of $49.7 billion, up 34 percent; with Western Europe, $27.4 billion, up 51 percent; with the Republic of Korea, $4.8 billion, up 14 percent; and with Taiwan, $13.1 billion, up 16 percent.

It took 191 years and 39 administrations to reach a trade deficit of $36.4 billion in 1980: It has taken the present administration only 5 years to quadruple that figure.

With the administration's doctrinaire adherence to some abstract notion of "free trade," and with a trade deficit like the one we had last year, is it any wonder that a wave of protectionism threatens to drown responsible trade policy? Although the administration will not acknowledge it, we are in the midst of an undeclared trade war, and as today's statistical release demonstrates, we are losing.

I call upon the President to actively support the efforts of those of us in Congress who have introduced legislation to address our trade problems—such as the Trade Enhancement Act and the Trade Adjustment Assistance Reform and Extension Act—while avoiding the protectionist measures sought by some.

Last November 20, Senator DANFORTH and I were joined by 31 of our colleagues in introducing S. 1860, the Trade Enhancement Act of 1985. A bipartisan effort to formulate a comprehensive approach to national trade policy, our bill seeks to address many of the reasons why our trade performance has been so poor.

First, our bill would expand trade by authorizing the President to negotiate new trade and monetary agreements with U.S. trading partners and by setting specific guidelines for those negotiations.

Second, TEA seeks to make trade fair. Based on legislation I introduced earlier in the 1st session (S. 1548; S. 1505), TEA would require the Treasury Department and the Federal Reserve Board to address the overvalued dollar and would require the U.S. Trade Representative to address unfair foreign trade practices. It also addresses violations of intellectual property rights, foreign "targeting," and foreign subsidization of exports.

Third, the Danforth-Moynihan bill would assist industries injured by increased imports. Although an open and fair trading system provides great benefits, surging imports can injure individual industries. TEA would require the President to grant temporary import relief to industries injured by excessive imports, but only if those industries agree to take action to adjust to the changing marketplace and the International Trade Commission agrees that the industry, with those changes, can be made competitive.

However, while seeking to improve our future trade posture, we must not forget those who have already lost their jobs to foreign competition.

Mr. President, the Trade Adjustment Assistance Program is the commitment our country made two decades ago to those workers who have lost their jobs to imports. It is, I might add, the only Federal program explicitly intended for workers so affected.

That is why last July Senator ROTH and I introduced S. 1544, a bill to reauthorize, extend and reform the TAA program. Our TAA bill was unanimously incorporated by the Senate Finance Committee into the budget reconciliation bill, approved by the Senate, and agreed to by the House conferees. However, as my colleagues know, Congress adjourned without completing action on the budget reconciliation bill—or otherwise explicitly extending the TAA Program.

Unfortunately, the administration has relied on this Congressional lapse to begin terminating TAA. The Department of Labor ceased paying benefits to an estimated 10,000 to 15,000 workers who were receiving cash assistance under the TAA Program. In addition, the Department of Commerce stopped technical and financial assistance to firms trying to adapt and adjust to import competition.

Therefore, in order to temporarily give the needed explicit authorization, Senator ROTH and I, joined by 20 of our colleagues, yesterday introduced legislation to reauthorize the TAA Program through March 15, 1986. This will give Congress time to complete action on the budget reconciliation bill and the Roth-Moynihan TAA bill—the best way that Congress can help ease the pain of the many workers whose industries have been ravaged by imports.

Let some good result from the ominous trade figures we learned of today. Let last year's deficit serve as the catalyst which moves us to confront our trade situation, and its resultant unemployment problems.

We can still avoid the dangerous effects of protectionism, but only if the administration acknowledges that a problem exists, and supports responsible efforts to address it.●

AUTHORITY FOR COMMITTEES TO FILE REPORTS ON FRIDAY, JANUARY 31, 1986

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that during the recess of the Senate over until Monday, February 3, 1986, committees be authorized to file reports on Friday, January 31, 1986, between 10 a.m. and 3 p.m.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

JOINT SESSION ON FEBRUARY 4, 1986

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the joint session to hear the President of the United States on Tuesday, February 4, begin at 8 p.m.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

TECHNOLOGY TRANSFER INVESTIGATION DOCUMENTS

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I send a resolution to the desk on behalf of myself and the distinguished minority leader, and ask for its immediate consideration. It is a legal counsel resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be stated by title.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A resolution (S. Res. 316) to authorize production of documents by the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations of the Committee on Governmental Affairs recently conducted an investigation of allegations of the illegal transfer of technology to the Socialist Republic of Vietnam. The Office of Export Enforcement of the Department of Commerce has now asked the subcommittee for access to documents obtained by the subcommittee during such investigation. Senators ROTH and NUNN, the chairman and ranking minority member of the subcommittee, would like to be able to respond to authorized requests for pertinent subcommittee records.

This resolution would authorize the chairman and ranking minority member, acting jointly, to provide the requested documents. It reserves for the subcommittee discretion to withhold confidential matters.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

The resolution, with its preamble, reads as follows:

S. RES. 316

Whereas, the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations of the Committee on Governmental Affairs has investigated allegations of illegal transfers of technology to the Socialist Republic of Vietnam;

Whereas, the Department of Commerce has requested access to records received during the Subcommittee's investigation which may assist the Department in fulfilling its own investigatory responsibilities;

Whereas, by the privileges of the United States Senate and Rule XI of the Standing Rules of the Senate, no evidence under the control or in the possession of the Senate can, by administrative or judicial process, be taken from such control or possession but by permission of the Senate;

Whereas, when it appears that documents, papers and records under the control of or in the possession of the Senate are needed in any investigation for the promotion of justice, the Senate will take such action as will promote the ends of justice consistent with the privileges and rights of the Senate; Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Chairman and Ranking Minority Member of the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, acting jointly, are authorized to provide to the Department of Commerce records relating to the Subcommittee's investigation of allegations of the illegal transfer of technology to the Socialist Republic of Vietnam.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BYRD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

LEGAL COUNSEL DIRECTION

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I send a resolution to the desk on behalf of myself and the distinguished minority leader and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be stated by title.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A resolution (S. Res. 317) to direct the Senate Legal Counsel to intervene in American Postal Workers Union, AFL-CIO, et al. versus United States of America and American Federation of Government Employees, AFL-CIO, et al. versus United States of America.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, pursuant to Senate Resolution 282 of the 99th Congress, the Senate legal counsel has intervened in two cases—Representative MIKE SYNAR, et al. versus United States of America and National Treasury Employees Union versus United States of America—in defense of the constitutionality of the Balanced Budget and Emergency Deficit Control Act of 1985, popularly known as the "Gramm-Rudman-Hollings" measure. The Attorney General has joined the plaintiffs in challenging the portions of the act which assign responsibilities to the Comptroller General in reporting excess deficits to the President.

The cases brought by Representative SYNAR and the National Treasury Employee Union have been briefed and argued, and are awaiting decision by a three-judge panel in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia. Two other unions representing Federal employees, the American Postal Workers Union, AFL-CIO, and the American Federation of Government Employees, AFL-CIO, have now filed additional actions challenging the act and have moved to consolidate them with the cases brought by Representative SYNAR and the National Treasury Employees Union.

This resolution would direct the Senate legal counsel to intervene in the name of the Senate in these new cases to continue the Senate's defense of the act. Mr. President, I move adoption of the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 317) was agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

The resolution, with its preamble, reads as follows:

S. RES. 317

Whereas, in the cases of American Postal Workers Union, AFL-CIO, et al. v. United States of America, Civil Action No. 86-0147, and American Federation of Government Employees, AFL-CIO, et al. v. United States of America, Civil Action No. 86-0154, pending in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia, the constitutionality of the Balanced Budget and Emergency Deficit Control Act of 1985, Public Law 99-177, has been placed in issue;

Whereas, in the related cases of Representative Mike Synar, et al. v. United States of America, Civil Action No. 85-3945, and National Treasury Employees Union v. United States of America, Civil Action No. 85-4106, the Attorney General has challenged the constitutionality of provisions of the Balanced Budget and Emergency Deficit Control Act of 1985;

Whereas, pursuant to section 274(a)(4) of the Balanced Budget and Emergency Deficit Control Act of 1985, the plaintiffs have delivered copies of their complaints to the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives and each House of Congress has the right to intervene in defense of the constitutionality of the Act;

Whereas, pursuant to section 703(c), 706(a), and 713(a) of the Ethics in Government Act of 1978, 2 U.S.C. §§ 288b(c), 288e(a), and 2881(a) (1982), the Senate may direct the Senate Legal Counsel to intervene in the name of the Senate in any legal action in which the powers and responsibilities of Congress under the Constitution are placed in issue: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Senate Legal Counsel is directed to intervene in the name of the Senate in the cases of American Postal Workers Union, AFL-CIO, et al. versus United States of America and American Federation of Government Employees, AFL-CIO, et al. versus United States of America.

SUPPLEMENTAL EXPENDITURES

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I send a resolution to the desk in behalf of Senator HATFIELD and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be stated by title.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A resolution (S. Res. 319) authorizing supplemental expenditures by the Committee on Appropriations for the procurement of consultants.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, this resolution would increase the amount of money in the budget of the Committee on Appropriations for computer costs, which have reached unexpectedly high levels because of last year's numerous iterations of the overall Federal budget and its impact on appropriations bills.

The additional money provided for computer costs will be drawn from other funds in the committee's budget, so that total funding for the committee will not be increased.

I understand that this has been cleared by Senator MATHIAS, chairman of the Rules Committee, and Senator FORD, the ranking minority member.

I ask for the adoption of the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 319) was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That section IV of Senate Resolution 85, ninety-ninth Congress, agreed to February 28, 1985, and amended, is amended by striking out "$115,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$140,000".

NO FRIDAY SESSION

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, as previously indicated, there will be no session on Friday so that Members desiring to attend the memorial service in Houston will be permitted to do so. There are some 20 or 25 Senators who will be attending that service.

ORDERS FOR MONDAY, FEBRUARY 3, 1986

RECESS UNTIL 12 NOON

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that once the Senate completes its business today, it stand in recess until the hour of 12 noon on Monday, February 3, 1986.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR THE RECOGNITION OF SENATOR PROXMIRE

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, following the recognition of the two leaders under the standing order, I ask unanimous consent that there be a special order in favor of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE] for not to exceed 15 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. DOLE. Following the special order, I ask unanimous consent that there be a period for the transaction of routine morning business not to extend beyond the hour of 1 p.m., with Senators permitted to speak therein for not more than 10 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PROGRAM

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, following morning business, the Senate will begin consideration of S. Res. 28, TV in the Senate.

I think it is safe to say there will be no votes on Monday. We will have hopefully a lively discussion. It is a very important matter to every Member of this body, and I hope we will have a full debate, and I am certain we will, and we do have at least an understanding there will be no votes after 6 p.m.

I think it is fair to say in this case there will be no votes on Monday. There will be debate.

Then, at 11 a.m., on Tuesday, we will resume consideration of S. 638, the Conrail sale. It is my hope, based on conversations with the principals on all sides, that we could conclude, finally dispose of that bill maybe midafternoon or early evening, and then, depending on what time it may be, return to TV in the Senate, hopefully conclude action on TV in the Senate next week and the following week. If we conclude TV in the Senate, it will be my intention to bring up the Genocide Convention.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished majority leader for calling up S. Res. 28 on Monday next. He is keeping his commitment that was made several weeks ago when I asked the distinguished majority leader if he would give assurance that S. Res. 28 would be brought up before the Senate early in the Second Session, and that commitment was made during the First Session, the closing days of the First Session. He has kept his commitment and fulfilled his assurance, as I knew he would.

I just want the RECORD to show that I and those who are very supportive of this resolution are appreciative of the distinguished leader calling up S. Res. 28 very early in the session and, as he indicated last year, he would try to do that immediately following the disposition of the Conrail legislation.

I commend him and I thank him.

Mr. DOLE. I thank the distinguished minority leader.

In my view I think the Senate is ready to act. It seems to me there has been a rather decided change just in the past 6 or 8 months. I will confess this Senator has changed some of his views.

I would hope that we could put together a responsible package and do it in fairly short order.

RECESS UNTIL MONDAY

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, there being no further business to come before the Senate, I move the Senate stand in recess until 12 noon on Monday, February 3, 1986.

The motion was agreed to and, at 7:29 p.m., the Senate recessed until Monday, February 3, 1986, at 12 noon.

NOMINATIONS

Executive nominations received by the Senate January 30, 1986:

BOARD OF INTERNATIONAL BROADCASTING

James Albert Michener, of Pennsylvania, to be a member of the Board for International Broadcasting for a term expiring April 28, 1987, reappointment.

U.S. INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT COOPERATION AGENCY

Carlos Salman, of Florida, to be a member of the Board of Directors of the Overseas Private Investment Corporation for a term expiring December 17, 1988, reappointment.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

REMARKS OF PHILIP L. SMITH AT DEDICATION OF MEMORIAL SCULPTURE OF DR. KING

HON. CHARLES McC. MATHIAS, JR.

OF MARYLAND

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, January 30, 1986

● Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, as authorized by concurrent resolution, the congressional tribute to Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., was marked by the dedication of a memorial sculpture of Dr. King in the rotunda of the Capitol on January 16, 1986. This moving ceremony commemorating Dr. King's legacy—the reconciliation of all Americans of every color and walk of life—was followed by a reception arranged by the Capitol Historical Society. At a luncheon before the dedication ceremony, the president and chief executive officer of General Foods Corp., Mr. Philip L. Smith, spoke with great feeling and understanding of the significance of the occasion, and I ask that his remarks be printed in the RECORD.

The remarks follow:

REMARKS OF PHILIP L. SMITH, PRESIDENT AND CHIEF OPERATING OFFICER, GENERAL FOODS CORP.

Good afternoon, Mrs. King, members of the King family, Senator Mathias, ladies and gentlemen.

Thank you for sharing in this happy and festive occasion. It marks both the dedication of a bust of Martin Luther King, Jr. in the U.S. Capitol building, as well as next week's first official observance of Dr. King's birthday as a national holiday.

It's a special pleasure and honor to welcome Mrs. Coretta Scott King, who is with us today. Mrs. King has been a leader in carrying on Dr. King's work. And she is an inspiration to all those who believe in what Dr. King stood for.

Thank you for being with us today, Mrs. King.

Before we have lunch, I just want to take a moment to tell you that we at General Foods are honored to be a part of this national celebration. And I emphasize the word "national." For these events celebrate what the memory of Dr. King means to all of us.

In honoring the man who began his public career 30 years ago as a hero and mentor for black Americans, these events celebrate the fact that Dr. King is today a hero and mentor to all Americans—black and white, north and south.

This truly is a cause for national celebration. For it marks not only how far black Americans have come in these past 30 years. It marks how far all Americans have come!

The dedication of Dr. King's bust in the Capitol building is laden with poetic and historic symbolism. This will be the first bust of a black man to stand in the Capitol building. The structure that is, as Nathaniel Hawthorne once said, "the center and heart of America."

It was in this building that much of the great drama of whether this country would be slave or free was fought—in Congress and the old Supreme Court chambers.

During the Civil War, the Capitol building was used for a time as a barracks for federal troops guarding the city. And when critics complained of continued construction while the war raged, President Lincoln replied: "If people see the Capitol going on, it is a sign we intend the Union shall go on."

In 1863, construction was finished, as the Statue of Freedom was lifted atop the dome—the same year the Emancipation Proclamation was issued.

The process of reconciliation, of healing the wounds of civil strife, began in the Capitol. There, in the President's Room, Abraham Lincoln refused to sign the Wade-Davis Bill, imposing radical reconstruction on the South.

This was the same process of reconciliation that would be carried to fruition a century later by people of good will from all over America—foremost among them, Martin Luther King. Standing at the other end of the Mall in 1963—exactly a hundred years after Emancipation—Dr. King faced the Capitol as he proclaimed his dream of what America could be.

Today, our Capitol building stands as a symbol of our ideals of freedom and equality and the rights of the individual. Ideals that are not always fulfilled. But ideals for which all of us, inspired by Dr. King, continue to strive.

As a native of Georgia myself, I'm pleased that on the outside, the East Front of our national Capitol boasts a facade of shining marble, which was dug from the earth of Georgia. And I'm even more pleased that inside, from today on, there will be a shining new bust of the Georgia preacher's son who changed his country and the world.

When Abraham Lincoln died, his Secretary of War said, "Now he belongs to the ages."

And with the events we are making today—we Georgians, we Americans, we human beings—can say of Martin Luther King: "Now he belongs to all of us."●

SHOULD WE BEGIN ANOTHER EXPENSIVE FOREIGN ENTANGLEMENT?

HON. STEPHEN L. NEAL

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 30, 1986

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Speaker, while enthusiasm is running high within the administration and on Capitol Hill to involve our country in yet another expensive foreign entanglement—this time in Angola, it might be prudent to reflect on the wisdom of such involvement. Mr. Sanford Unger, writing in the Washington Post, paints a far different portrait of the leader of UNITA, Jonas Savimbi, than the picture drawn for us by the administration and others.

Mr. Unger portrays Savimbi as a brutal and ruthless, but charismatic leader, who built his reputation as an anti-American and anticapitalist. Mr. Savimbi, says Unger, is masterfully manipulating American political leaders into believing that he represents the last line of defense against Soviet/Cuban aggression in southern Africa. The facts are, according to Mr. Unger, that it would take an enormous commitment by America to give Savimbi a chance to topple the Angolan Government. And American involvement would not hasten the Cuban exodus from Angola, but would probably prolong Angolan dependence on Cuba and the Soviet Union.

This is not a crisis situation, Mr. Speaker, I would urge my colleagues not to act in haste, but to take time to objectively weigh the facts concerning Mr. Savimbi and his organization and to consider the cost of borrowing to finance another war.

I commend Mr. Unger's article to the attention of my colleagues:

JONAS SAVIMBI: BIG WELCOME FOR A BAD BET

(By Sanford J. Ungar)

An African guerrilla leader named Jonas Savimbi will arrive in Washington this week on a tour aimed at gaining U.S. support for his guerrilla war against the Soviet-backed regime in Angola. His goal, in simple terms, is to become American's "contra" in Africa.

Savimbi is a charismatic African politician. But his guerrilla movement cannot win and he does not deserve U.S. financial support or sympathy.

Savimbi's march on Washington this week highlights his astonishing transformation from Chinese-supported revolutionary to conservative-backed "freedom fighter." Barely six years ago he could not get an appointment even with the assistant secretary of state for African affairs, because Congress had passed a law forbidding American covert involvement with his forces in the Angolan civil war. But this week Savimbi has an excellent change for a private meeting with President Reagan in the Oval Office.

The Clark Amendment, which prevented his forces from gaining American aid, was repealed last year. So now he will be paraded through Congress as the American candidate for leadership not only of Angola, but perhaps all of southern Africa. He will be portrayed as the one man who can give Cuban troops a bloody nose and help restore American influence and prestige there. Tonight, Savimbi's new high profile will be evident to 40 million viewers in a scheduled appearance on CBS's "Sixty Minutes."

The trouble is that Savimbi simply isn't what his best American friends believe or wish he could be. "Savimbi is a master at telling people what they want to hear," says John Marcum, professor of political science at the University of California at Santa Cruz and one of the leading U.S. experts on Angola. He has a quality of delivering a message in a way that pleases the ear of the listener."

Today that skill is being used to court American support, but in the past it has been employed to stir up sentiment against the United States.

Furthermore, Savimbi built much of his power base by overtly appealing to black-nationalist attitudes and antiwhite bias among some of Angola's tribal groups. His tactics are every bit as brutal and repressive as those of the government now in power in Angola—if not more so.

He has proudly claimed to have attacked the installations of American and other Western companies. And he has lost most of his support from other African nations by collaborating with the white minority regime in South Africa.

Besides, UNITA is far from winning. In fact, U.S. aid to Savimbi now would prolong rather than shorten the Angolan war, and it would increase rather than end the Cuban presence in Angola.

The United States has no business taking a position on either side of this civil war. There is little in Angola's internal conflict that has anything to do with American national interests. And the risks are many. Funding Savimbi now would put the United States into a de facto military alliance with South Africa. That would violate the declared policy of the Reagan administration and would also alienate America's good friends elsewhere in Africa.

I have met Jonas Savimbi during his previous visits to the United States, and I have been greatly impressed with his political and rhetorical skills. He is a genuinely charismatic figure whose eyes seem alive with fire when he talks of the struggle in Angola. He speaks superb English (along with, it is said, Portuguese, French, and several other languages), and he is particularly adept at playing to the American fear of Fidel Castro, whose troops prop up Savimbi's enemy.

Other journalists who have visited him in the bush inside Angola—it is easy to arrange trips from South Africa or Namibia on South African planes—have been even more dazzled by Savimbi. They have heard him give dramatic, spellbinding orations to "party congresses" of his supporters, and they have been taken with his apparent willingness to stay at his fighters' side in their most difficult moments—rather than spending much of his time in fancy restaurants in European capitals, as the leaders of other Third World nationalist movements have sometimes been known to do.

Nonetheless, it is one thing to recognize the mystique of Jonas Savimbi and quite another to commit American prestige—and deficit financing—to his cause. Those who would bankroll him as an American surrogate in southern Africa would do well to examine the recent history of Angola and Savimbi's own record.

Savimbi's involvement in the tangled politics and the violent struggle for control of Angola goes back to the early 1960s. That was more than 10 years before the country became independent, following a revolution in Lisbon, and was thrust into the unenviable position of a pawn in the East-West struggle. Although many students of African politics see Savimbi as an opportunist who adjusts his ideology to the needs of the moment, most still recognize him as a genuine Angolan nationalist—a man whose record and credentials as an opponent of colonialism entitle him to some role in his country's future.

A member of the Ovimbundu tribe (which makes up about a third of Angola's population), Savimbi was born in the country's central highlands in 1934 to a family that one Protestant missionary described as being of "exceedingly humble, primitive, pagan background." Nonetheless, he graduated at the top of his high school class, and the missionaries, who saw great promise in him, sent him to Portugal for advanced studies.

Before long, however, he was being harassed by dictator Antonio Salazar's secret police for his political activities on behalf of Angolan independence, and so he fled to Switzerland in 1960, enrolling in the political science department at the University of Lausanne.

According to one State Department document that has frequently been quoted, Savimbi turned up at the American Embassy in Bern early in 1961, declared that he had been inspired by a speech by then-United Nations ambassador Adlai Stevenson in favor of self-determination for all peoples of the world, and introduced himself as "the future president of Angola."

Within months of making his ambitions known to U.S. diplomats, Savimbi had gone off to Leopoldville (now Kinshasa), the capital of the newly independent Belgian Congo (now Zaire), to join Holden Roberto, the leader of a generally pro-Western organization called the National Front for the Liberation of Angola (FNLA).

The FNLA was being aided and encouraged by the United States as an alternative to the Soviet-supported Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola (MPLA). (It seemed unlikely to the superpowers that Portuguese colonial rule could last much longer on a continent where so many other countries were setting their possessions free, and in this period Washington and Moscow were characteristically choosing up sides among the new and future nations of Africa.)

But in 1964 the rivalry between Roberto and Savimbi came to a head, and Savimbi broke away from the FNLA. Two years later, he brought together his own cadres and formed a "third force," UNITA—the National Union of the Total Independence of Angola. Savimbi found help from China, among others, and UNITA managed to play its own unpredictable part in the war against the Portuguese.

As independence approached in 1975, the military struggle in Angola turned into a tripartite civil war among the nationalist groups, and that doomed the prospect of open, fair elections. To the surprise of many outside observers, UNITA actually outlasted the FNLA, which, despite help from the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency, crumbled before the Soviet- and Cuban-aided MPLA.

Meanwhile, South Africa, concerned about the effects of the civil war on its neighboring territory of Namibia, had also intervened in Angola. Inevitably, the South Africans offered to help Savimbi, and he accepted.

The MPLA managed to establish a government in Angola's capital of Luanda late in 1975, and it has stayed in power since then with the support of a Cuban military and civilian contingent now estimated at between 25,000 and 35,000. But UNITA has also sustained its guerrilla struggle against the MPLA, with money and supplies from South Africa, for more than 10 years. Savimbi generally claims to control at least a third of the area of the vast country.

Last year, even as economic sanctions were being voted against South Africa, hardliners in both houses of Congress were successful in getting the law prohibiting American involvement in the Angolan civil war repealed. Savimbi's American backers believe that Angola is a place where the United States can stand up to the Soviet Union. It is on the strength of these conservative hopes—that America can get back into the fray as a player in Angola—that Savimbi is winging to Washington.

But before Savimbi is allowed to leave town triumphantly with a chunk of the American treasury, it would be a good idea to take a realistic look at the man who would be our newest African client.

Savimbi does not have the credible record as a moderate, democratic, pro-American figure that is so often cited on his behalf by his supporters in both parties here.

On the contrary, he built his reputation during the late 1960s and early 1970s as a fervid anti-capitalist, anti-American revolutionary. "No progressive action is possible with men who serve American interests . . . the notorious agents of imperialism," he said at the time of his break with Roberto. Among his leading supporters in the years that followed were Mao Tse-tung, Che Guevara, and Gamal Abdel Nasser.

During those same years, Savimbi drew a distinction between his own movement and the MPLA on the basis of their racial composition, denouncing the MPLA for its inclusion of, and alleged domination by, white radicals and mestizos (people of mixed race) who had accepted Portuguese citizenship.

Roughly one-tenth of the million people who live in the capital city of Luanda are white or mestizo, and the MPLA regime, whatever its other flaws, is multiracial in composition. "Given Savimbi's past statements on racial issues (the whites and mestizos), all quiver at the thought of his coming to power," says Gerald J. Bender, professor of international relations at the University of Southern California and an advocate of American diplomatic recognition of the Angolan government.

Although Savimbi has been wise enough to alter his pro-Marxist, antiwhite rhetoric when it is expedient to do so, the UNITA slogan remains "Socialism, Negritude, Democracy, and Nonalignment." No one really knows what his policies would be if he were to come to power. As the Washington Post's Leon Dash reported in 1977 after spending seven months with UNITA forces in the bush, "Savimbi is an enigma, a man on whom many labels can stick—brilliant, charismatic, affable, unyielding, forgiving, temporizing, Machiavellian, opportunistic, lying, nationalistic, Marxist, Maoist, pro-Western and socialist."

Savimbi is miscast as a "freedom fighter" defending Western ideals against a harsh Marxist regime.

UNITA has in fact been criticized for its brutal tactics in the Angolan countryside. In classic guerrilla fashion, its acknowledged goals are to grind the Angolan economy to a halt, prevent development, and destroy agriculture—all to stir up discontent with the government.

Among the foreigners taken prisoner during UNITA attacks in recent years have been many missionaries and church workers. Just last month, in an incident reported by the Brazilian Embassy in Angola and three religious organizations, five Baptist church workers were killed, three wounded and two women carried off by Savimbi's men.

And one of the sharpest ironies of the situation in Angola is that the MPLA government finds that it needs the Cubans to help protect Gulf Oil rigs and storage tanks from threats by the South Africans and the allegedly pro-American UNITA forces.

Savimbi is not the popular pan-African politician that he often claims to be.

It is true that in the period just after independence the Organization of African Unity (OAU) was sharply divided on the issue of whether to recognize the MPLA or some FNLA/UNITA coalition as the legitimate govenment in Angola. But as soon as the nature of Savimbi's connections with South Africa became known, he lost much of his support elsewhere on the continent.

Savimbi travels to and from Angola primarily through South Africa and South-African-controlled Namibia; his headquarters in Jamba are only 18 miles from the Namibian border. The government in Pretoria is proud of its connection with UNITA, claiming that it proves South Africa's ability to work with the "right" kind of black African leader. In fact, Savimbi was an honored guest at the inauguration of State President P. W. Botha in 1984. To this day, most African governments depict Savimbi as a South African puppet.

Further American assistance to Savimbi, overt or covert, will not lead to withdrawal of the Cuban forces in Angola.

On the contrary, every South African intervention on UNITA's side in the past has caused an increase in the number of Cubans. There is no reason to think that American aid would produce a different result. In recent meetings, Angolan President Jose Eduardo dos Santos has reportedly warned Chester A. Crocker, assistant secretary of state for African affairs, of that fact, and he has frankly asked the Reagan administration not to push Angola into a greater dependence on the Soviet Union.

The Angolan leadership claims it would like to send the Cubans home gradually and take a more truly non-aligned posture in foreign policy. But the regime insists that this is impossible so long as UNITA continues its military efforts and South Africa continues to invade Angolan territory at will.

Savimbi is not on the verge of winning the power struggle in Angola, and few outside observers, including the American intelligence community, believe he has any chance of doing so at any time in the near future.

Then-CIA director William Colby estimated in the mid-1970s that it would take some $100 million in outside aid for the "pro-Western" forces to prevail in Angola, and the United States put in about $14 million before the Clark amendment took effect.

Today, U.S. officials estimate that if the MPLA were strengthened and substantially greater Soviet-funded Cuban assistance were offered, even $200 or $300 million—far more than anyone is suggesting the United States might be able to provide—would probably not do the job. With or without an infusion of U.S. funds, the Angolan civil war is locked in a stalemate.

Jonas Savimbi's visit to Washington, then, has little to do with the real prospects for peace in southern Africa, and a great deal to do with American politics.

Two significant forces are arrayed on Savimbi's side: liberal Democrats who believe they have to demonstrate their ability to support a tough, anti-Soviet foreign policy; and conservative Republicans who, having voted last summer for economic sanctions against South Africa, have been under pressure to take some other persuasive, anti-communist steps in the region.

An example of the former is 85-year-old Rep. Claude Pepper (D-Fla.), who has an increasing number of anti-Castro Cuban exiles in his district demanding he take a tougher stand.

An example of the latter is 50-year-old Rep. Jack Kemp (R-N.Y.), who was warned by some of his bedrock conservative supporters that his vote for South African sanctions could cost him the GOP presidential nomination in 1988.

Pepper and Kemp make an interesting coalition, but they are crafting bad foreign policy. To be wary of some of what the MPLA has done and to wish for an end to the Cuban presence in southern Africa does not require support for a harsh and unprincipled guerrilla leader about whom the American government and people actually know very little. To be skeptical and cautious with Savimbi does not imply endorsement of the regime in Luanda.

It is fine to treat Savimbi to some good, old-fashioned, all-American hospitality; we have done as much for many unsavory types from all over the world in recent years. But if we offer him new aid—either "overt" or "covert," however it is packaged—the people of Africa, as usual, will be the biggest losers of all.

EASING THE FINANCIAL BURDEN OF ADOPTION

HON. CARROLL HUBBARD, JR.

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 30, 1986

Mr. HUBBARD. Mr. Speaker, I have received an excellent letter from one of my constituents, Mr. Mike Northern, a member of OURS (an adoptive parent group in Kentucky) from Providence, KY., advising me of his support for H.R. 2793, the Fairness for Adopting Families Act.

Mr. Northern highlights the financial difficulties adoptive parents are confronted with, and discusses pending legislation which would offer some relief. I strongly support efforts to assist with the adoption of children and encourage my colleagues to read Mr. Northern's informative comments. His letter to me followed:

PROVIDENCE, KY.,
January 8, 1986.

Congressman CARROLL HUBBARD,
2244 Rayburn House Office Building, Washington D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN HUBBARD: I am writing to ask for your support of house bill HR 2793 as introduced by Florida Representative William Lehman.

This is a much needed piece of legislation which would ease the burden on many adoptive parents. Also it would lift a restrictive barrier making adoption possible for many families who are currently deterred by large adoption expenses.

The bill as written would allow a tax deduction for adopting a child of $5000 for a U.S. adoption and $7000 for a foreign adoption.

As we progress toward the adoption of our child, we are finding that adoptive parents are discriminated against much more than we realized. From the large expenses which are currently non-deductible to the problems of health insurance coverage, we face problems that birth parents don't.

I would also like to ask your help in monitoring legislation regarding foreign adoptions. As an adoptive parent and a member of OUR in KY., an adoptive parent group, I would like to see the doors of the U.S. remain open for legal adoptions. I am currently watching for this type of legislation through a group called IMPACT for OURS.

I hope you can be of assistance of these matters. I believe the easier we can make it for parents to adopt, the more children will have homes.

Thank you for any help you can give.

Sincerely,

MIKE NORTHERN.

STUDENT AID AND EDUCATIONAL OPPORTUNITY

HON. WILLIAM D. FORD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 30, 1986

Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, last month Secretary of Education William J. Bennett made headlines by challenging an audience of New York business leaders and educators to write him if they found a way to motivate students to stay in school or to go on to college. During the same speech he surmised that personal encouragement and support motivated kids much more strongly than Federal financial assistance and provided an example to substantiate his reasoning. Unfortunately, Mr. Bennett's view is shortsighted and ignores some very painful realities that currently exist in Federal assistance which undercut confidence in the student aid programs and undermine their potential to serve low-income students.

On December 22, 1985, a Washington Post editorial analyzed the Secretary's comments and underscored the fallacies in his logic. Even more importantly the article emphasized the need for stabilized student financial assistance programs which provide adequate funding for low-income students. I encourage my colleagues to read that editorial, which follows, and to seriously consider its implications as we begin the fiscal year 1987 budget process:

MR. BENNETT AND ENCOURAGEMENT

William J. Bennett, secretary of education, asked 100 business leaders and college presidents recently to help him figure out how to keep kids in school. "Write me," said Mr. Bennett to his New York audience, "if you have found a way to motivate students to stay in school and go on to college, or if you know someone who has." As an example, he praised Eugene Lang, the millionaire who inspired a sixth-grade graduating class in Harlem by promising to pay full tuition for their college educations. Five years later, every child in that class who is still in the New York area is still in school—a dramatic contrast to the area's 40 percent dropout rate.

Mr. Bennett told the audience he found it "striking" that Mr. Lang's promise motivated kids so much more strongly than federal financial aid does, even though "the actual money orignially offered to these students is approximately the same as the amount students from low-income families can receive from the federal government's Pell Grant and other aid programs." The difference, he concluded, was Mr. Lang's "personal encouragement and support."

Mr. Bennett is right that encouragement is important, but there are-problems with his broader diagnosis. First, Mr. Lange's hugely successful arrangement with the sixth-graders is hardly comparable to federal aid programs. Contrary to Mr. Bennett's assertion, Mr. Lang did not just offer each student "$2,000 toward their education" but the whole thing. (The maximum Pell or direct grant is $2,100—toward annual expenses that averaged $4,881 at public colleges and $9,027 at private ones last year.) To get full tuition from the federal government, by contrast, a student supplies family financial information. Colleges then calculate, based on standard formulas, the maximum amount they expect the family to contribute; the maximum they expect a student to contribute through student loans, summer jobs and government-aided "work-study" jobs; and Pell and other grants for the rest.

More important, the guarantees of even that much aid are precarious and getting more so. Mr. Bennett will not have forgotten that he himself led the charge against them last March, calling for a $4,000 "megacap" on federal aid per student per year, and saying that full aid based on need was "unreasonable." Efforts to cut will be redoubled in 1986, with the whole Higher Education Act up for reauthorization and the Gramm-Rudman balanced-budget legislation mandating cuts across the board.

Mr. Bennett's stance on all this will be crucial—which brings us back to the matter of encouragement. Low-income high-schoolers now certainly realize that, no matter how much somebody encourages and believes in them, their chances of paying for college are getting dimmer. That the general climate of opinion on aid does affect poor and minority kid's aspirations became clear after the 1982 cuts, when the numbers of college applications from such kinds dropped sharply. Since last year, Mr. Bennett has moderated the sharp tone in which he called for "stero divestiture." Now would be a good time for him to focus serious attention on one very rational cause of student discouragement—the growing chasm between rising college costs and shrinking aid sources. Money without personal encouragement, as he told the audience, may not be enough to keep kids in school. But for those not visited by a Eugene Lang, all the encouragement in the world is useless without money.

PROTECTION FOR WHISTLEBLOWERS

HON. PATRICIA SCHROEDER

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 30, 1986

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to your attention a recent editorial in the Denver Post concerning H.R. 4033, the Whistleblower Protection Act of 1986. The Post focuses on the problems with our current system and the need for change. Their position reflects the desire of Americans to encourage those who witness waste and wrongdoing to step forward.

[From the Denver Post, Jan. 28, 1986]

PROTECTION FOR WHISTLEBLOWERS

Federal whistleblowers—those few government workers bold enough to report waste and protest abuse—were supposed to have been given shelter from reprisals and a forum for their complaints in 1978 when the Office of Special Counsel was created.

But the OSC today is more concerned with protecting bureaucratic posteriors than the American taxpayers. When it doesn't ignore employee complaints entirely, it sometimes targets whistleblowers for the very abuse it was created to forestall.

That's why Denver Congresswoman PAT SCHROEDER and a bipartisan group of cosponsors have introduced the "Whistleblower Protection Act of 1986."

Schroeder cited a General Accounting Office survey for the 1984 fiscal year showing that only 8 percent of 1,383 complaints alleging prohibited personnel practices survived initial OSC screening. And of the cases in which whistleblowers complained to the OSC of reprisals—transfers, demotions, harrassment, even firings—80 per cent were discarded with no corrective action. Even granting a certain number of kooks and crank complaints, that record suggests an inexcusable inattention to duty and detail.

Schroeder's proposed reforms would define prohibited personnel practices more carefully, give employees direct access to the Merit System Protection Board, broaden that broad's authority to impose sanctions against bureaucrats and set more reasonable standards of proof in appeals. The OSC would be more clearly defined as a protector for whistleblowers, in a relationship similar to a lawyer and client.

We wish Schroeder's bill well. Whistleblowers can be potent antidotes to bureaucratic arrogance, waste and corruption. It is time to harness their knowledge.

A BILL TO REGULATE WATER DEVELOPMENT FACILITIES IN NATIONAL PARKS

HON. RICHARD H. LEHMAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 30, 1986

Mr. LEHMAN of California. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation to regulate water development facilities within national parks and monuments. The need for such Federal law became evident to me this year as I worked with the Department of the Interior to get an agreement prohibiting further expansion of water development facilities within Yosemite National Park which I represent. We still do not have an agreement, and I am convinced that a cohesive statement of law is needed to regulate water projects in national parks and monuments throughout the country.

My bill would accomplish four objectives:

First, prohibit new water development contruction within the boundaries of national parks and monuments.

Second, require congressional approval to expand any existing water development projects which lie within national parks or monuments.

Third, require permits from the Secretary of the Interior to operate any existing water development projects which lie within national parks or monuments.

Fourth, require any major maintenance, repair, or reconstruction of water projects lying within national parks or monuments to be subject to regulations developed by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. Speaker, regulation of water projects in national parks is long overdue—not just in my backyard—not just in Yosemite National Park. For example, I understand there was recently a proposal to retrofit a water development project in the Grand Teton National Park in Wyoming and add transmission lines and conduits. In Olympic National Park in Washington, the National Park Service's objection to the relicensing of existing hydroelectric facilities in the park has been questioned by the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission.

Regulation of water facilities and hydroelectric projects in national parks is the job of the Department of the Interior, but it is the job of Congress to give it strong legislative tools. In the past legislation authorizing specific projects within national parks has given carte blanche to water development to the detriment of the values for which our national parks were created. According to the Congressional Research Service, 18 national parks contain 108 dams.

My bill does not turn the clock back; it does, however, determine that water development projects in national parks will be unacceptable in the future. National parks represent the very best of our American landscape. Therefore, we must preserve and enhance these irreplaceable natural resources. I urge my colleagues to support this legislation.

A REMINDER OF THE GOVERNMENT'S BOUNTY

HON. TONY COELHO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 30, 1986

Mr. COELHO. Mr. Speaker, reactionaries on the right continue to present government as the No. 1 public villain. You and I know that is not the case.

Fortunately, there are many dedicated public servants who have the courage to stand up and defend government. Lane Kirkland, the great union leader, who has done so much to help improve the quality of life for American working people wrote a very moving article in Sunday's New York Times in which he challenged the enemies of government.

It is very thoughtful and anecdotal, yet a futuristic defense of government's proper role in society.

The article follows:

[From the New York Times, Jan. 26, 1986]

A REMINDER OF THE GOVERNMENT'S BOUNTY

(By Lane Kirkland)

COLUMBIA, S.C.—A state embodies and magnifies the frailties of man and his capacity for good or ill. Unchecked and unopposed, it can be an engine of oppression, sweeping hordes to concentration camps or Gulags. Held within democratic bounds by free citizens, it is an indispensable instrument of progress.

I am reminded of the capacity of government to do good whenever I return to my native state, South Carolina. I remember a South Carolina that was too poor to paint and too proud to whitewash. Nothing in my experience has contradicted what I absorbed in my youth in South Carolina, and I remember it well.

And the more fiercely the current national debate rages about the appropriate role of the Federal Government and its various programs, the more clearly I remember a South Carolina before there was such a role, when states' rights ruled and enterprise was free to do as it pleased.

I remember when the destitute aged were sheltered not in the bosom of a warm and loving family but in county poorhouses. Then Social Security came and tore those poorhouses down, freeing young and old alike of that specter.

When I note the now-flourishing institutions of higher learning spread across this state, I remember when some fine little colleges were one jump ahead of the sheriff, were hard-pressed to put meals on the students' tables and couldn't meet their payrolls. They were rescued and made solvent by the National Youth Administration, wartime training programs and the G.I. Bill of Rights.

When I see the clear waters of our rivers, I remember when the Broad, the Wateree, the Bush and the Saluda ran brick-red from the erosion of farms and deforested uplands. The Soil Conservation Service and the millions of trees planted by the 30 or so Civilian Conservation Corps camps placed in South Carolina had something to do with the improvement. Free enterprises, such as the paper and forest products industries, shared abundantly in the benefits of those Government initiatives.

I remember when kerosene lit the farms until the Rural Electrification Administration electrified and humanized them, bridging the cultural gap between town and country—and, incidentally, creating new markets for the appliance industry.

When I hear complaints about affirmative action, I remember things that used to happen in this land, the treatment of people by people. While we still have a way to go, does anyone think we would have approached our present level of equity and civility without the intervention of the Federal Government? I have met no South Carolinian who has expressed to me any desire to return to the old days of racial cruelty and exclusion.

When I hear it said that Southern working people have some cultural aversion to the exercise of the right of freedom of association, I cannot help but remember the old days when cotton mills sometimes bristled with National Guard bayonets and machineguns to enforce that alleged aversion. Still today, the question returns to my mind: If Southern workers don't want their own unions, why have states and corporations found it so expedient to collaborate in forging measures to thwart the effective pursuit of that aspiration?

Lest it be thought that these reflections are just another expression of outmoded "liberal" balderdash, let me point out that such stout conservatives as Senators James F. Byrnes, Olin Johnston and Burnet R. Maybank were among the authors of the larger Federal role that helped bring this state into the modern age.

I do not counsel worship at the altar of government for its own sake, for I share fully the wholesome antipathy to government—Federal, state or local—unrestrained by strong free and private institutions, for one of which I speak.

I do suggest that the citizens of a modern Republic should not go too far in support of those who would dismantle or ruin the benign capacity of their Government, for they may need it badly some day. When it happens to you, you'll know it's true.

As for those terms, "liberal" and "conservative," as one who has been afflicted by both labels, depending on the stance of the afflictor and the foreign or domestic nature of the issue, I doubt their utility in this day and age for anyone except slap-dash journalist.

Real meaning has surely been drained from a term when the clammy hand of fashion appears in the form of a hyphen preceded by "neo," as in "neo-conservative" and"neo-liberal." In all areas of human discourse, "neo-hyphen" is a sure sign of something that is not long for this world.

If, as has been said, a modern "liberal" is someone who believes that his country's adversaries are probably right, I strongly reject that label.

And what is the objective meaning of the word "conservative" when its leadership has brought us a $200 billion annual deficit, put forward a measure that will mindlessly gut our defense forces year after year, and now, in the wake of Geneva, escorts clamoring hoards of businessmen east in pursuit of Moscow gold, exposing to that "evil empire" the soft underbelly of freedom, the stateless avarice of capital?

We ought not waste too much time worrying about which category they ought to fit. There may be a few pure liberals and pure conservatives about who march in lockstep, but I don't really know any.

The great rank and file of the American people are liberal about some things and conservative about others, and the shifting distribution of such impulses depends largely upon circumstances and interests.

That is the way it should be, because there really are things one ought to be conservative about and things one ought to be liberal about, and they do change.

For example, it is true, as Santayana said, that those who cannot remember the past are doomed to repeat it.

Yet it is equally true that those who do remember the past may not know when it is over.

UNITED NICARAGUAN OPPOSITION DOCUMENT

HON. BOB STUMP

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 30, 1986

Mr. STUMP. Mr. Speaker, the United Nicaraguan Opposition has issued a document of great importance—the Principles and Objectives for the Provisional Government of National Reconciliation. This historic document displays the democratic future which awaits Nicaragua when the United Nicaraguan Opposition prevails in the struggle for freedom in Nicaragua. I am inserting the document in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD so that all Members may have the opportunity to review it in light of the upcoming vote to continue full American support for UNO:

UNITED NICARAGUAN OPPOSITION—PRINCIPLES AND OBJECTIVES FOR THE PROVISIONAL GOVERNMENT OF NATIONAL RECONCILIATION

Under the protection of God and interpreting the hopes of the great majority of people in Nicaragua, who with heroic patriotism shook off the yoke of the previous dictatorship and now suffer the repression by force of arms of new tyrants and foreign intervention;

Giving Homage: To the noble sacrifice of the democratic resistance forces which have shed their blood and continue to offer their lives in an unequal war against an army in the service of Soviet imperialism, from which it receives direction, training, weapons and supplies;

To the civic courage and democratic vocation of the political parties, labor and social organizations, ethnic minorities and individuals who have maintained a firm attitude against the abuses of the military tyranny of the Sandinista Front;

Affirming: That the people of Nicaragua have demonstrated their will to free themselves from the totalitarian regime which oppresses them with the support of foreign forces and the so-called internationalists, carrying out a painful defensive war and a war of liberation which have witnessed heroic actions inspired by the highest degree of patriotism on the part of the combatants of the Nicaraguan Democratic Resistance and of broad sectors of the population;

Recognizing: That the courage and sacrifice of different sectors comprising the nation have created, in the face of repression, the conditions for the liberation of Nicaragua, faithful to the historic tradition that has led them to rise up in arms when their freedom and democratic aspirations have been snatched away from them;

Considering: The historic democratic determination of the Nicaraguans, translated in the past struggles against the Somoza dynasty and in the present struggle against the totalitarianism of the Sandinista Front, the firm belief in a juridical order and respect for the constitution of the country and the sacrifices for the full exercise of its precepts;

Committed: To the unrestricted observance of the human rights of all Nicaraguans without exception, the establishment of a State of Law which permits the full development of the individual and the promotion of social justice;

Recognizing: That the tragic situation of Nicarauga, embroiled in chaos as a consequence of the present dictatorship, requires the adoption of special and urgent measures in the political, economic and social arenas which guarantee the quick and orderly transition toward a democratic State, by means of a Provisional Government of a duration strictly limited by the needs of the transition;

Reaffirming: Our commitment to peace and democracy contained in the Pronouncements of San Jose of March 1, 1985, of San Salvador of June 12, 1985, and our support for the calls for National Dialogue demanded by the Democratic Coordinator and the Nicaraguan Bishops Conference;

Taking into account: The civil war of Nicaragua, which threatens the peace of the region and of the American continent, brought about by the failure of the military tyranny of the Sandinista Front to fulfill the resolutions of the XVII Council of Foreign Ministers Meeting of the Organization of American States of June 23, 1979 which, in an action which set a precedent in our continent, explicitly withdrew its recognition of one of the member governments in order to grant it to an insurgent force, which committed itself to establish democracy and respect the human rights of all Nicaraguans without exception;

Convinced: That the solidarity and reconciliation of all Nicaraguans, as well as the support and understanding of the peoples and governments of the free world, will contribute effectively to the creation of the indispensable conditions so that a democratic and pluralistic process is established which guarantees peace, sovereignty and freedom to our people;

Therefore: On behalf of the Directorate of the United Nicaraguan Opposition and with the full support of its Permanent Advisory Committee, we propose to the Nicaraguan people and inform our sister Latin American nations and the democratic governments of the world, while at the same time requesting their support and solidarity, the Principles and Objectives of a Provisional Government of National Reconciliation.

PRINCIPLES AND OBJECTIVES

I. Regarding the political system

1. To democratize Nicaragua, guaranteeing and promoting political pluralism and the participation of all citizens at the local and national level, through the exercise of representative democracy, respecting their ethnic, cultural and religious values;

2. To establish a political system which guarantees the separation and independence of the powers of the government;

3. To establish a rule of law which assures the equality of the citizens before the law; respect for, the full exercise of, and effective development of Human Rights through the independence of the Judicial Power; giving guarantees to national Human Rights organizations, and adhering strictly to international obligations deriving from written agreements;

4. To guarantee the strictest respect for freedoms, especially those of speech, association, worship and unions with respect for agreements numbers 87 and 98 of the International Labor Organization, such as the undeniable right to strike;

5. To recognize the primacy of Civil Society over the State and the achievement of the common good as its principle objective;

6. To create an autonomous electoral system which guarantees representative democracy and respect for the popular will, freely expressed in periodic elections, assuring alternability in office, through the principle of non re-election;

7. To promulgate a Civil Service Law, establishing the administrative career. There will be created the National Comptrollership Commission to guarantee the efficient and honest use of public funds and State resources;

8. To abolish any and all types of capital punishment and to eliminate permanently and unequivocally the special tribunals which have been abusively created by the Sandinista Front;

9. To decree a General Amnesty for political and related common crimes, as an expression of the process of rehabilitation and reconciliation, without exception;

10. To recognize the historic rights of the indigenous peoples of Nicaragua, adopting special administrative and developmental measures in order to accelerate the progress of the Atlantic Coast; fostering the participation of its people in matters affecting the region, preserving their cultural identity and strengthening the nationality and territorial integrity of the Nation;

11. To demilitarize society by subjecting the military to the civil authority, proceeding to dismantle military, para-military and security organizations and the organizations of repressive nature of the Sandinista regime;

12. To create a National Army in the service of the Nation and the defense of its sovereignty, of adequate proportions for those objectives and composed principally of those Freedom Fighters who wish to serve professionally and loyally in democratic institutions, and by other Nicaraguans who also meet the conditions of moral character. No person with a record of human rights violations will be able to become a part of the new National Army.

II. Socioeconomic affairs

1. To recognize the family as the basis of society, making its protection a fundamental objective of the Government of Reconciliation;

2. To give preferential use of state resources to satisfy basic human needs: especially employment, food, health, education and housing;

3. To assure that education responds to the fundamental principles of freedom of instruction and the right of parents to select the best for their children. The preservation and the development of culture and sports will be an important part of the programs of teaching, outreach and information.

4. To carry out an integral agrarian reform, which responds to the natural right of private property, taking into account efficiency in the utilization of resources and the utility of giving land to those who work it;

5. To establish a new social contract, democratically adopted, which recognizes the equitable participation of all sectors of civil society, both in effort as well as in benefits;

6. To provide immediate assistance to the victims of the civil war, providing programs which permit their rehabilitation and economic security;

7. To adopt measuers which facilitate full participation in productive civilian life by combatants who do not join the new army and national police;

8. To promote and facilitate the return of exiles through programs to finance the creation of jobs and the adoption of legal, economic and customs measures and other incentives;

9. To formulate and execute an immediate program of action and the securing of resources for the reordering and reactivation of the national economy and the providing of jobs for the Nicaraguan people;

10. To abolish state centralism and return to the private sector all those productive, commercial and service activities which said sector is able to carry out more efficiently for the common good;

11. The Government of Reconciliation, as guarantor of the common good and social peace, will observe and promote the principles of: social justice, freedom of association, work as a source of well-being and wealth, the indispensable contribution of laborers and peasants to the development of the country, as well as solidarity with the less favored sectors of the population, private property as the expression of a natural right and the sovereignty of Nicaragua over its natural resources;

12. To consolidate and perfect the Central American Common Market and to promote foreign investment as important measures to bring about socio-economic development.

III. Foreign policy

To adopt a foreign policy which protects the peace and strengthens the independence and sovereignty of the Nation, founded on the principles of the inter-American system; supported in the fulfillment of international accords, cooperation and friendly relations, especially with those countries which practice representative democracy, and in the permanent determination to contribute to the economic, social and political integration of the Central America fatherland.

IV. Plan and program

A program of Government will be presented for the consideration of a consultative body in which will be represented the various democratic, political, social and labor organizations which will implement these principles. It will establish the procedures so that, by the eighth month after the installation of the new Government of Reconciliation, it will hold elections for a Constituent Assembly. After eighteen months it will hold general elections with guarantees to assure the free participation of all citizens and the integrity of the elections.

Among the preferred objectives to be considered by the consultative body should be the following: Reorganization of the Judicial Power; Municipal Autonomy; reorganization and integrity of Public Administration; health and social security; education; culture; housing; transportation; infrastructure; sports; policies of incentives for the various productive sectors; the financial system; agrarian reform; commerce; foreign investment; reduction of the foreign debt; fiscal, monetary and credit policies, giving special attention to the development of cooperatives and the balanced action of the State.

We reiterate that the liberation of our fatherland requires the participation of all the democratic sectors of the Nicaraguan people, as well as the solidarity and support of the peoples and governments of the countries of the Americas and the other free peoples of the world.

At the same time, we pledge ourselves to respect the consensus of Nicaragua's democratic spectrum in the selection of those who will implement the initial task of national reconstruction. Furthermore, we pledge ourselves to assure that it shall be the people, by means of an electoral process in full enjoyment of their rights and freedoms, who will elect the Constituent Assembly and, later, the national authorities.

DISCOUNT BROKERAGE—BANKERS BEWARE

HON. FERNAND J. ST GERMAIN

OF RHODE ISLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 30, 1986

Mr. ST GERMAIN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues an article written by Prof. Daniel T. Seymour of the University of Rhode Island. Amidst the cries for further deregulation, and in a period where advantage-seeking loophole specialists are becoming increasingly in vogue, Professor Seymour sounds a cautionary note to those banks seeking to jump, head first, into the discount brokerage field.

The incessant demands for expanded bank powers by bank lobbyists obscure the basic public policy objectives which led to the adoption of the Glass-Steagall Act of 1933, separating investment banking from commercial banking. Professor Seymour's well-reasoned article raises a number of questions which should be of concern to banks as they seek to maintain the trust and confidence of the public at large.

Discount brokerage is merely the camel's nose under the tent. It already has led to a number of devices wherein. In fact, discount brokerage activities have been combined with investment advice. Making markets and underwriting corporate securities, with the obvious devastating impact on the policy of separating banking from commerce, will inevitably be the next demand.

Professor Seymour raised the issue of risk well when he stated:

The major attributes of commercial banks—stability, confidence, low risk and passivity—do not relate to the stock market. For many investors the money they invest in the stock market is "play money." The basic rule is that the investor must be in a position to lose all of it. Such a rule is in direct conflict with the historical view of what banks are and, in many people's should be.

Many commercial banks have responded to deregulation with a modern-day, financial version of Pickett's Charge. There has not been an appropriate amount of internal assessment, integrated with knowledge of the competition and information on customer needs.

I commend Professor Seymour's article to the attention of my colleagues.

[From the Magazine of Bank Administration, September 1985]

AN ARGUMENT AGAINST DISCOUNT BROKERAGE

(By Daniel T. Seymour)

The discount brokerage bandwagon has been in high gear for more than two years now. Most of the enthusiasm is based on several logical appeals: Capital requirements are negligible; it represents a source of fee income and it strengthens relationships with "upscale" customers. Since 1977, the discount brokerage business has been the fastest growing segment of the brokerage industry and future growth also looks good. A 1983 survey by Market Facts, Inc. estimates that 39% of current customers of nonbank discount brokers and 85% of those brokers' potential customers are "interested" in shifting alliances to banks or thrifts.

In the face of such accolades and acclaims it is difficult to resist the trend, to simply say "I don't think discount brokerage is for us."

THE STRENGTH OF BANKS

Through all of the hoopla it has been difficult to find a discouraging word. Most of the positive, upbeat feeling comes from the general notion that commercial banks are the kingpins of the financial industry. This is an egocentric perspective which relates strength to size.

The fact is that banks do have strengths. But such strengths are not based on asset size or number of depositors or return on assets. Those strengths are fragile and, as was seen during the money market exodus, potentially fleeting. Real strength is more deeply rooted in the values and history of the institutions.

When the issue of new products and services is raised within this context, it should be evident that a business should leverage its strength. Growth or new product development should not be reactive or random. Instead, growth strategies should build on, draw strength from and enlarge some central strength or competence. The question remains as to whether the concept of the financial supermarket and the current rush into discount brokerage is a logical extension of the core strength of commercial banks.

A QUESTIONABLE MIX

If we were to look at individuals' investment portfolios, we would find an imposing number of different vehicles—from real estate, to equities, to municipal bonds, the list is long and varied. Each investment opportunity has its own risk/return characteristics, its own liquidity/return characteristics. The choice of an investment is also directly related to the specific objective which the investor has in mind. People may choose an investment for income, capital appreciation, tax reduction, security or simply cash availability.

A third element to be factored in is the institution. While the investment chosen is related to the objective, the objective, in turn, is related to the institution. Several examples may illustrate. Government and agency issues (e.g., U.S. Treasury bills, notes and bonds) are usually related to a "security" objective. The risk is limited, and cash availability, continuing income and capital appreciation are not key factors. The psychological link between the objective behind government issue purchases and an institution is obvious. Commercial banks signify "a safe place to put your money." They evoke images of bank vaults and conservation. Government issues, security and commercial banks are a natural connection.

Municipal bonds are somewhat different. The most common objective attached to them is related to tax exemption. For people in higher tax brackets, they represent a means to generate income without being taxed by federal, state and local agencies. Such municipal bonds are issued by state and community agencies and are usually held for safekeeping by the institution. Again, municipal bonds are related closely to the image of commercial banks—safe, low-risk investments. They are also a low-involvement investment. Since the rates are fairly stable and the maturity dates set, they require only that banks be efficient in crediting interest to investors' accounts and notifying them of maturity.

Now let us look at the purchase of equities. The stock market is most often linked to a capital appreciation objective. There is greater volatility than the other investments mentioned and, usually, greater risk. It requires attention in a dynamic environment. The major attributes of commercial banks—stability, confidence, low risk and passivity—do not relate to the stock market. For many investors the money they invest in the stock market is "play money." The basic rule is that the investor must be in a position to lose all of it. Such a rule is in direct conflict with the historical view of what banks are and, in many people's eyes, should be.

NOT FOR EVERYONE

A number of commercial banks have decided to be discount brokers in a very physical way. By installing telephones and self-service counters with microcomputers for obtaining securities prices, they have chosen to become associated with the stock market image. For some banks with specific customer bases, in particular retail trade areas, this may be a prudent strategy. But for others, and there are many, the limited number of trades and resulting fee income generated through a discount brokerage service are decidely not worth the trouble.

The discount brokerage appeals are solid. But a short-run focus on such things as fee income may be at the expense of a longer-run, negative association. Perhaps it is better to forego the fees and the opportunity to move toward being a "financial supermarket." Perhaps it is better to maintain a healthy distance from an investment service in which your customer can lose a very large amount of money in a very short time.

Many commercial banks have responded to deregulation with a modern-day, financial version of Pickett's Charge. There has not been an appropriate amount of internal assessment, integrated with knowledge of the competition and information on customer needs. The current environment requires banks to be more competitive, more aggressive. But it also requires them to pick and choose, to assess their own strengths and to avoid being reactive. Simply put, discount brokerage may not be for everyone.

SISTER GOERING—CARING AND DOING SOMETHING ABOUT IT

HON. JIM ROSS LIGHTFOOT

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 30, 1986

Mr. LIGHTFOOT. Mr. Speaker, not long ago I informed my colleagues of how the volunteer "care and share" project has worked in Iowa's Fifth Congressional District to provide a way for caring neighbors to help those less fortunate than themselves by donating food, time, and money to help restock food pantries throughout the district. As I said before, the response was tremendous and exceeded all our hopes and expectations. "Care and share" showed that in hard times people do care and are willing to help, and we can help them help one another by providing the leadership and organization that it takes to implement such a project.

Other efforts to alleviate the problems related to the depressed farm economy continue, and today I would like to call my colleagues attention to one in particular. Sister Jean Goering has coordinated a project funded by the Volunteers in Service to America Program to help victims of the depressed economy by providing food, clothing, and emotional support groups for dislocated farmers. With the help of volunteers, many of whom have been through the trauma of being dislocated from their farms, Sister Goering helps supplement other local programs to address the needs of dislocated farmers who need help. The program was organized only 3 months ago, but has been so successful thus far that the number of counties covered has been increased from 8 to 10 and it is being used as a model for other projects in the State of Iowa.

Mr. Speaker, Sister Goering and everyone involved in helping her have been outstanding in their demonstration of genuine care for their neighbors who are suffering hardships. I'm sure my colleagues join me in extending my sincere thanks to Sister Goering for everything she has done.

HONORING CONGRESSMAN PARREN J. MITCHELL

HON. STENY H. HOYER

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 30, 1986

Mr. HOYER. Mr. Speaker, the Maryland delegation will be losing half of its members after this session. No one will be more sorely missed than our delegation's dean, PARREN J. MITCHELL of Baltimore's Seventh Congressional District.

Next week many citizens from Prince George's County will be gathering at my Fifth Annual Congressional Breakfast in honor of Black History Month. During the course of the breakfast, we will pay tribute to Congressman MITCHELL, who is truly a historic figure in Maryland. He is the first black citizen of our State to be elected to the House of Representatives. Since 1970, when he was first elected by the citizens of his district by a margin of only 38 votes, Congressman MITCHELL has been reelected with overwhelming support.

Perhaps PARREN did not always have a career in politics in mind, but as a member of the Mithcell family, he certainly was destined to be an activist. The Mitchell family is one of the premier political families in Maryland and in the Nation. Members of the family have changed the face of our State, and are responsible for a vast array of State civil rights laws and actions which have brought equal opportunity and justice to black citizens in our State. One of our greatest national civil rights leaders, the late Clarence Mitchell, Jr., who was often referred to as the 101st Senator, was PARREN'S brother.

Upon his graduation from Morgan State in 1950, PARREN MITCHELL sued the University of Maryland to become the first black graduate student at that institution. He earned his graduate degree in sociology in 1952, and returned to Morgan State to teach. His career has always been marked by public service. From 1963–65 he was head of the Maryland Human Rights Commission, and later, in the 1960's, he became head of Baltimore's anti-poverty program. This activism culminated in a first campaign for Congress in 1968, and a successful campaign in 1970. Since that time there has been no stopping him. Today, I would venture to guess that there is no Member more popular among his constituents than is PARREN. He is truly revered by his friends and neighbors.

In his distinguished congressional career, he has made his mark on a wide array of issues. His has been a career of dedication to furthering the rights of all Americans and speaking out to protect and help the less fortunate of our land. Perhaps his greatest impact has been on small business issues. Congressman MITCHELL currently serves as Chair of the House Committee on Small Business. He is the author of three major legislative initiatives over the past decade to encourge the growth of minority owned businesses. The first requires State, county, and local governments receiving Federal grants to set aside a percentage of those grants for contracts for minority firms. In 1978 he was successful in amending the Small Business Act to increase Federal efforts to direct business toward minority owned firms by requiring that Federal contractors set forth plans to reward subcontracts for minority businesses. When Congress adopted major legislation in 1982 to repair our Nation's infrastructure with a massive road rehabilitation program, Congressman MITCHELL authored an amendment to include a 10-percent set-aside for minority business firms. Together, these visionary measures have resulted in billions of dollars of business for minority-owned firms.

In the 95th Congress, he served as chairman of the Congressional Black Caucus, and was one of the most effective and articulate spokesman ever to hold that post.

When Congressman MITCHELL leaves this House, we will lose part of our conscience and a singular voice for justice for the poor and for the disadvantaged. Maryland will lose one of its most effective Congressmen. Thankfully, our State's citizens will not lose the energy and commitment that PARREN MITCHELL has brought to all of us. He has already announced his intention to organize a new project in which members of the community would make regular contributions to fund self-help projects in the black community.

When we gather next week to mark Black History Month and to honor Congressman PARREN MITCHELL, we will recall that he has not only been an outstanding Representative of the people of his own district, but that he has made the people of my own congressional district proud. He has been a true friend to all of us.

ANOTHER VOICE ON OIL IMPORTS

HON. BARBARA B. KENNELLY

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 30, 1986

Mrs. KENNELLY. Mr. Speaker, the Washington Times ran a commentary by Warren Brookes on the economic and foreign policy impact of a crude oil import fee. The article comes at the issue from a different angle, and I am inserting it at this point in the RECORD for the benefit of my colleagues.

BEWARE OF OIL TAX SOOTHSAYERS

Earlier this month President Reagan implicitly promised Mexico's President Miguel de la Madrid to keep the U.S. credit pipeline open to prevent Mexico's economy from totally unraveling.

The most important thing President Reagan could do for both Mexico and the United States is to veto any oil-import tax Congress might pass. Any such tax could push Mexico into bankruptcy—and force the United States to construct a 1,400-mile wall on our border from Brownsville, Texas, to San Diego, Calif., to stem the potential refugee tide.

Since Dec. 16, when the OPEC nations effectively signaled the end of their worldwide oil-pricing cartel and announced "every man for himself" in the pursuit of their dwindling share of the world market, Capitol Hill has been abuzz with talk about its being "time for an oil-import tax."

Now when the U.S. economy and consumer are in line for the added stimulus of as much as $20–30 billion in lower crude oil prices from a deregulated oil market, Congress wants to take it away.

Many of the same politicians who helped give OPEC its cartel power, by holding down the price of domestic oil and gas, are now eager to "hit OPEC while it's down" with a $5, $10, or $15 levy per barrel, whatever would push the domestic price back up to $27.

And, with Gramm-Rudman-Hollings in the offing, politicians are justifying this tax increase with lots of "economic" reasons.

The theory behind this "revenue enhancer" is that a $5-plus drop in crude oil prices would be "bad for the economy" because it would cut into already weak domestic oil exploration and development, and encourage consumers to stop conserving.

By imposing a tax on imported oil to keep it at a market price of about $27, not only would U.S. producers be insulated from falling world prices, but consumers would never miss what they never got and would continue to conserve.

There are many flaws in this logic. But the most obvious is that this tax would fall most heavily not on OPEC (from whom we get less than 9 percent of our oil) but on our friendly neighbors, debtors, and allies—and on American industry, which would be further priced out of world markets, which would enjoy an even greater relative price cut.

Today the United States gets less than 2 percent of its oil from Persian Gulf nations. It gets more than 56 percent of its imports from Mexico, Venezuela, Canada, and the United Kingdom. The first two are heavy debtors and friends—the latter two are among our most valued trading partners and allies.

More important, virtually all of our imported oil comes from countries that are in the weakest position to deal with a real price collapse. Our chief suppliers have little excess production capacity. Almost none of our oil comes from those "swing producers" in OPEC, Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Libya, Qatar, and the United Arab Emirates, who can easily offset falling prices with rising production out of excess capacity.

This essentially is the message of an insider report by its economist Steve Hanke to the clients of Friedberg Commodity Management. Mr. Hanke says the effort to hold the line on prices by cutting back production means "the swing producers (the ones who have cut production deeply to keep prices up) . . . will increase output as prices decline," contrary to normal market response. This is because it is the only way they can maintain or increase their revenues.

Mr. Hanke told us that an oil-import tax would actually accelerate this process, forcing prices down further and faster, and "when OPEC collapses, world crude production will reach about 65 million barrels a day . . . and prices will range from $5.38 to 16.39 a barrel.

"Producers without excess capacity will be hit hardest by an OPEC collapse." Such producers, including Mexico, would experience not only a drop in prices but a matching drop in total income.

Mr. Hanke says Mexico will begin to "hurt" when oil falls below $25.77, Venezuela at $20.72—but Saudi Arabia can get the same level of revenue as now with oil as low as $14.30.

"This means that a U.S. oil-import tax is likely to push the swing producers much faster to their breakeven point, with even greater damage to our debtor-nations, especially Mexico.

"More important, this would give our major trading competitors, Japan, Germany, France, a huge oil-cost windfall even as American manufacturers continued to pay high prices—and this would make our trade deficit much worse."

In other words, an oil-import tax would be a bonanza for Japan and Europe, but a trading catastrophe for U.S. industry, and would mean certain collapse for our big debtor-neighbor, Mexico. Yet, exempting Mexico would cut our oil-import tax revenues by nearly 40 percent, and force an even more punishing tax rate.

It's called shooting yourself (and your neighbor) in the foot.

MARTIN LUTHER KING DAY

HON. JIM COURTER

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 30, 1986

Mr. COURTER. Mr. Speaker, with the first observance of the Federal Martin Luther King holiday behind us, many Americans are reflecting on the meaning of this national holiday and the impact of this unique man.

The following editorial from the Asbury Park Press is a fine tribute to Dr. King and the holiday created in his honor. I commend this editorial to the attention of my colleagues. It will help us remember what the Martin Luther King holiday is really all about.

[From the Asbury Park (NJ) Press, Jan. 11, 1986]

A BRAND-NEW HOLIDAY—MARTIN LUTHER KING DAY A TIME FOR RESOLVE

His admirers doubtless feel that it has taken far too long to commemorate the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. with an annual federal holiday. But compared with other national holidays, the slain civil rights leader's birthday achieved that status with breathtaking speed. Observances of Thanksgiving Day and Columbus Day, for example, took many years to evolve into national commemorations.

In three months, the 18th anniversary of King's assassination in Memphis will be observed; perhaps that is insufficient time to judge any individual's historical impact on his nation and his times.

In any case, Martin Luther King Jr. would have become 56 years old on Wednesday if he were still living. There can be no doubt that during his brief time in the forefront of the national civil rights movement, he arrested the conscience of the nation. The racial discrimination that existed in both the North and South before he first came to prominence in the late 1950s is unthinkable today. It is surprising to think that it survived until so recently.

Wednesday is not the holiday his supporters sought, however. In its infinite wisdom, Congress in recent years has rescheduled every federal holiday except Thanksgiving Day and Independence Day on a Monday, so that weary workers can enjoy more three-day weekends. So the Rev. Dr. King will be honored henceforth on the third Monday in January.

Let us hope, however, that Americans will not continue to quibble over honoring the Rev. Dr. King the way the U.S. Senate did when it considered the legislation that created the holiday. The debate there was acrimonious in the extreme; Sen. Jesse Helms, R-NC, characterized King's role as "action-oriented Marxism" and decried his opposition to the Vietnam War. But overwhelming majorities eventually voted for the bill in both houses of Congress in 1983, and President Reagan promptly signed it.

We are now on the brink of the first national celebration to honor the life of a black American. The federal commission set up to organize the celebration encountered trouble raising the funds it hoped to obtain, but a wide variety of events has been scheduled. These include the unveiling of a bust of King on Friday in the Capitol rotunda, a parade in his native Atlanta on the afternoon of Jan. 20, and a nationally televised tribute that evening.

The first Martin Luther King holiday is sure to be especially poignant in Virginia, where a black state senator was elected last fall as lieutenant governor. L. Douglas Wilder thus became the first black since Reconstruction to win a major state elective office in the South. It was Wilder who led a nine-year fight to make King's birthday a state holiday.

And, in a bit of irony that seems almost too delicious, Virginia's King holiday also falls each year on Virginia's observance honoring two Confederate Civil War generals, Robert E. Lee and "Stonewall" Jackson.

We probably will not see again a national spokesman for the aspirations of black Americans who achieves the widespread acclaim enjoyed by the Rev. Dr. King. He spoke not to blacks, and not to whites, but to Americans. He warned his oppressed brethren not to descend into hatred and taught white Americans that they could not be truly free within themselves until minorities joined the economic and social mainstreams of American life. He combined the calling of a devout clergyman with the skills of a passionate orator and the courage of a brave man. The struggle he took up has not been won, but great strides were made because of his leadership.

It is not time to end the dissension over honoring him and to unite in resolve to reach the high calling he laid upon all Americans.

J. EDGAR CHENOWETH

HON. PATRICIA SCHROEDER

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 29, 1986

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Speaker, J. Edgar Chenoweth was born in Trinidad, CO, and there he died, 88 years later. He was a true native son. He grew up in Trindad, went to school there, and practiced law there. He represented Trinidad in Congress, serving two stints for a total of 11 terms, a testimony to his industry, his popularity, and the good sense of his constituents.

He had a hand in bringing to Colorado eight major military installations, including the Air Force Academy, Fort Carson, and the Air Defense Command. If he hadn't retired in 1965, the Pentagon would now be in Trinidad.

There are few Colorado public officials as respected and admired as J. Edgar Chenoweth.

UNITED NICARAGUAN OPPOSITION STRUGGLES FOR A FREE NICARAGUA

HON. HENRY J. HYDE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 30, 1986

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Speaker, the United Nicaraguan Opposition and its democratic resistance forces have struggled bravely to bring freedom and democracy to Nicaragua. As repression of the Nicaraguan people by the Marxist Sandinista regime grows, it becomes ever more imperative that the United States continue and expand its support to UNO. If we are to remain true to the principles which our Nation holds dear, the United States must continue to stand beside those who fight for human dignity and self-determination in Nicaragua. The United Nicaraguan Opposition fights for the same inalienable rights for the Nicaraguan people that our forefathers fought to gain two centuries ago.

On January 22, 1986, the United Nicaraguan Opposition promulgated its "Principles and Objectives for the Provisional Government of National Reconciliation." Among the principles and objectives which UNO seeks to advance are:

To democratize Nicaragua, guaranteeing and promoting political pluralism and the participation of all citizens at the local and national level, through the exercise of representative democracy, respecting their ethnic, cultural and religious values.

To guarantee the strictest respect for freedoms, especially those of speech, association, worship and unions.

To create an autonomous electoral system which guarantees representative democracy and respect for the popular will, freely expressed in periodic elections.

To recognize the family as the basis of society, making its protection a fundamental objective.

To abolish state centralism and return to the private sector all those productive, commercial and service activities which said sector is able to carry out more efficiently for the common good.

The Government of Reconciliation, as guarantor of the common good and social peace, will observe and promote the principles of: social justice, freedom of association, work as a source of well-being and wealth, the indispensable contribution of laborers and peasants to the development of the country, as well as solidarity with the less favored sectors of the population, private property as the expression of a natural right and the sovereignty of Nicaragua over its natural resources.

The United Nicaraguan Opposition thus stands for—and fights bravely to establish—freedom and democracy. The contrast with the Marxist Sandinistas could not be more stark.

As the Congress of the United States specifically found in the International Security and Development Cooperation Act of 1985 (Public Law 99-83; section 722), the Sandinista regime "has flagrantly violated * * * the rights of the Nicaraguan people" and "is not a government freely elected under conditions of freedom of the press, assembly, and organization."

Moreover, the Congress has found that the Sandinista regime has taken significant steps toward establishing a totalitarian Communist dictatorship and has committed atrocities against its citizens. The Congress found that, as a result of these abuses, the Sandinista regime has lost the support of virtually all independent sectors of Nicaraguan society who initially supported the removal of the Somoza regime.

Mr. Speaker, the Congress will soon face, once again, the choice between supporting the forces of freedom and democracy in Nicaragua or supporting consolidation of the repressive Marxist Sandinista regime's hold on the Nicaraguan people. Some of my colleagues would undoubtedly object that failing to support UNO is not the same as supporting the Sandinistas, but, as politically comfortable as that position might be to them, it is a fantasy. Freedom and democracy can survive in Nicaragua only if UNO prevails, and UNO can prevail only if the United States and other nations which stand for freedom and democracy support UNO's struggle. If the United States does nothing, if the United States simply averts its gaze and avoids reality, we will abandon our most precious national values and we will endanger our security interests and those of our allies.

The outcome of the struggle in Nicaragua depends upon the outcome of the struggle in Congress. I urge my colleagues to stand with the forces of freedom and democracy and to vote for continued and expanded support to the democratic resistance forces of the United Nicaraguan Opposition.

TRIBUTE TO THEODORE WELLMAN

HON. BARBARA BOXER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 30, 1986

Mrs. BOXER. Mr. Speaker, I am honored to have this opportunity to offer a tribute in memory of Theodore Wellman, one of the finest and gentlest champions of the environment that it will ever be my privilege to know.

Ted Wellman will be lovingly remembered by thousands of people in my district for his efforts to preserve environmental quality. Even at the age of 83, he was a bastion of strength for others wearied by the endless battles necessary to protect the natural resources which sustain us.

Ted Wellman led the way for many northern Californians in the fight against taming wild rivers or harming the bay or the delta. His expertise and influence in water policy issues were respected statewide.

Ted Wellman was beloved not only for what he accomplished, but also for the way he lived his life. A strong and towering figure, Ted was nonetheless a gentle man who gained the respect of his adversaries as well as his followers. The gift he brought to the causes he advocated was the power of gentle persuasion. He offered persuasion graciously, presenting impeccably researched facts in support of thoughtfully constructed positions. Ted's arguments on any issue were invariably so reasonable they were hard to oppose.

Ted Wellman's long labor of love to make Marin a better place came after service as a lieutenant commander in the U.S. Navy during World War II and a full career as a corporate executive. Following his retirement at age 64, Ted dedicated himself to civic responsibilities, including service as present of the Marin Conservation League, the Marin Community College Board, the Marin Boy Scout Council, and the Kentfield Civic League. He served on the Marin General Hospital Foundation and the county's first Solid Waste Management Committee, the latter a commitment of particular importance to Ted, who deeply believed in conservation and recycling as the key to resource preservation.

Ted Wellman was a championship tennis player in his seventies and eighties, winning 11 national seniors competitions from 1969 to 1982. He became a proficient landscape painter as well. Ted's cherished friends recount with delight his skill at playing the piano and ukelele, where his specialty was singing and playing old college songs.

Ted Wellman had a long and inspiring marriage to another wonderful person, Grace, who was equally gifted with success in all the endeavors she shared with Ted. I am grateful that we have Grace with us to carry on Ted's mission. It will take the rest of us a lifetime to live up to the legacy which Ted Wellman has left us, for the magnitude of his accomplishments cannot be equaled with any less devotion and skill and perseverance than that which characterized Ted's achievements. This will be our real tribute to Ted Wellman.

CHANGING TIMES IN MALTA

HON. EDWARD F. FEIGHAN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 30, 1986

Mr. FEIGHAN. Mr. Speaker, last July, along with several of my colleagues on the House Foreign Affairs Committee, I had the pleasure of meeting Dr. Eddie Fenech-Adami, the leader of the pro-Western Nationalist Party and a member of Parliament in the Republic of Malta. Thrown into the international spotlight by the tragic hijacking of an Egyptian jetliner late last year, Malta has been experiencing political changes that deserve our attention and concern.

At the last elections in 1981, Dr. Adami's party polled 51 percent of the popular vote. But despite the island's system of proportional representation, and primarily because of some skillful gerrymandering, the ruling Socialist Labour Party obtained an absolute majority of parliamentary seats and retained control of the Government. Under proportional representation, this should not have been possible, and does not bode well for the future of democracy in Malta.

In late 1984, the controversial Socialist Prime Minister Dominic Mintoff resigned. However, it is generally believed that he is directing his hand-picked successor, Karmenu Mifsud-Bonnici. Mr. Bonnici has never contested a parliamentary election—hence his nickname of "Dr. Zero" among many Maltese.

Besides an unqualified subservience to Mintoff, Mifsud-Bonnici apparently has two other qualifications for the succession: He personally authored the electoral district boundary changes in 1981, and in 1984 he led a heavily armed mob of dockworkers into the capital of Valletta, where they ransacked the law courts and the Catholic Archbishop's curia.

Since the ascendancy to power of the Socialist Labour Party in 1971, democracy and respect for human rights in Malta have suffered severely. The Maltese regime has apparently subverted the democratic safeguards of the Maltese constitution. Radio and television broadcasting have become a state monopoly. Judicial independence has been undermined by a law which enables a simple majority in Parliament to suspend to judge from his duties. The supposedly independent Electoral Commission has been reportedly packed with Government appointees. A so-called "Foreign Interference Act" passed in 1982 requires a Government permit for the activities of foreigners on the island, including politicians, journalists and trade union officials. By virtue of this law, two prominent European Christian Democrats were not allowed to address a public rally of the Nationalist Party last September; a third member was expelled from the island.

Political tensions and extreme divisiveness are characteristic of Malta today. In 1984, Freedom House reclassified Malta as only "partly free," and the May 1985 report from the International Helsinki Federation for Human Rights concluded that "there exist serious violations of human rights, in Malta, which need to be remedied."

It is the growing sense both in Malta and the United States that the present Government is allowing itself to become a surrogate of Libya and the Soviet Union. In 1979, British and NATO naval facilities were removed from Malta, and in 1981, the Soviet fleet was given "bunkering" facilities. In 1982, a secret military cooperation treaty was signed with North Korea, and in 1984, a treaty of friendship and cooperation was signed with Libya. These are two of the five "confederation of terrorist states" outlined by President Reagan in his address to the American Bar Association last July.

In January of 1985, Kim Il Sung of North Korea was bestowed the highest honor of the Republic of Malta and the Maltese President, in her turn, flew to Pyongyang where she received the Order of the Flying Juche. In a formal speech, quoted in the Pyongyang Times, she conveyed the appreciation of the Maltese people:

> For the significant aid and assistance that the [North] Korean people, under your able leadership, have given in the past and are still giving our people to this very day.

Officially, this aid and assistance was supposed to consist of fertilizer. But in November 1983, the truth became known when Eddie Fenech-Adami obtained and publicized a secret treaty that had been signed between Malta and North Korea—widely reported to be almost an exact replica of the former treaty between Grenada and North Korea. Under the treaty, North Korea has given Malta arms that are better suited for internal use than for defense against an outside attack. It has also sent military instructors to train the Maltese security apparatus in riot-quelling and the interrogation of detainees.

In November 1984, the growing ties of the Maltese regime to Libya were crowned by a Treaty of Cooperation which includes a defense protocol that should be of great concern to NATO and the United States. Under the treaty, Libya has undertaken to assist Malta whenever the Government of the Republic of Malta explicitly requests so in case of threats or acts of aggression against Malta's territorial integrity and sovereignty. The two sides also promise to hold consultations aiming at harmonizing their viewpoints on political, economic, security and international issues which affect their interests, and will endeavor to support one another's viewpoints whenever this mutual support is required.

The Maltese regime has already harmonized its views with Libya's on two issues of crucial concern to the United States, namely the Gulf of Sidra and the Middle East. The communique issued when the treaty was signed said that:

The two sides also expressed profound concern at the many provocations by the USA which violate the sovereignty of the Libyan Arab Jamaheriya and its territorial integrity which constitute a threat to international peace and security.

The Maltese side reiterated its support for the Jamaheriya's efforts to resist the various pressures arising from these provocations.

On the Middle East, the joint communique added:

The two sides confirmed their full support and absolute assistance to the armed struggle staged by the Palestinian people to liberate their soil in its entirety and return to their homeland.

These statements further sanction the Malta based activities of the PLO, which has had an active office on the island for several years.

The defense protocol of the Libyan-Maltese treaty has three alarming provisions. The two sides agreed to embark on a continuous exchange of information on matters of special interest to their mutual security and defense purposes. Libya agrees to train Maltese military personnel in Libya or in Malta. And it further agrees to study supplying any military equipment and armaments which Malta may require.

The intentions of the Maltese and Libyan regimes are further revealed by cultural aspects of their relationship, which are truly surprising considering that Malta is overwhelmingly Catholic and has strong British and Italian traditions. As reported in the Wall Street Journal of April 11, 1985:

The largest hotel on the island is owned by and used almost exclusively by Libyans. Arabic is now a required language course in all Maltese schools. There is a new mosque built by the Libyans. Recently, Libyan warships have been regularly putting into the Grand Harbor. Liybans don't need passports to hop across to Malta (just an identification card). Some officials suspect Malta is being used as a jumping off place for Libyan terrorists.

Since 1979, the Maltese Socialist Government has claimed to the international community that it is neutral and nonaligned, a position which the Soviet Union was quick to embrace because it marked a setback for the West. But is Malta really neutral, or is that rhetoric covering a deliberate shift toward the East?

Malta has become part of the almost automatic majority in the United Nations which votes systematically against the West. In the State Department's May 1985 Report to the Congress on Voting Practices in the United Nations it was shown that Malta voted with the United States on only 19 percent of the votes, not far above the average for Communist East European countries, and substantially below the 55-percent average for Western European nations, Is this really nonalignment?

During his visit to Congress, Eddie Fenech-Adami explained that Malta had a serious unemployment problem and expressed his desire for an increase of foreign investment in the island—especially from the United States—which would help generate more jobs for the Maltese and create greater economic and political stability. Although we sympathized with his concerns, we felt compelled to remind him that American investment originated in the private sector, and that the socialist policies of the Maltese Government over the last decade had, if anything, helped to frighten away private investors. In addition, the military alliances of the Maltese Government—with Libya and North Korea especially—would make any rational Western entrepreneur extremely wary of investing new capital on the island. Many American businesses have unpleasant memories of what happened in Grenada under similar circumstances.

Dr. Adami was in an uncomfortable position when he visited with us: As leader of the opposition, he does not agree with the increasingly anti-Western policies of the present regime. On the other hand, he was reluctant to criticize his country's government in an open, foreign forum. He was surprised, however, to see that we were aware of the Maltese situation, including the serious violations of human rights that have been reported in the International Community.

Mr. Speaker, in view of the changing situation in Malta, I believe it is time the United States developed a decisive policy position toward that country. The State Department's attitude of benign neglect toward Malta has seen it turn from a pro-Western, NATO democracy to a so-called nonaligned country that cultivates growing ties with aggressor States. We should be moving away from a policy of passive aloofness and do everything we can to ensure that the democratic values of the Maltese people will not be betrayed. What is at stake is not the survival of the Socialist regime, but the survival of freedom, democracy, and human rights in that strategic Mediterranean island.

I also call upon the Maltese Government to take positive steps to remedy its internal inequities and external policies if it wants assistance or investment from the United States. Rhetoric will not suffice nor substitute for concrete actions. Any consideration of assistance by our country should be preceded by definitive actions by the present Maltese Government to restore full democracy and freedom to its citizens, to correct identified violations of human rights, and to repudiate its military ties to agents of terrorism.

REQUIEM FOR A "CHALLENGER"

HON. MEL LEVINE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 30, 1986

Mr. LEVINE of California. Mr. Speaker, in an incisive editorial, Representative GEORGE BROWN writes that, in tribute to the Challenger astronauts, we must press on with our manned space activities. He suggests that the vision shared by those seven astronauts, their sense of resolve and adventure, should inspire us to continue our search in space.

We shall always remember the sacrifices of the seven men and women who lost their lives aboard the space shuttle Challenger. This disaster reminds us of the great risks all astronauts have taken on our behalf. The previous successes of our manned space program have made it easy for us to dismiss the courage and dedication of the American astronaut, who for more than two decades has proudly answered a call to serve the Nation.

In an aftermath of this national tragedy, let us not forget why we venture into space. We do so to enhance our knowledge of this planet and the universe, and to satisfy our desire to discover what no man has seen before. Our manned efforts in space have enabled explorers to observe directly the secrets of the universe and to react to them with scientific deftness and spontaneity.

I urge my colleagues to read Representative BROWN's Los Angeles Times editorial and ask unanimous consent to place it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

REQUIEM FOR A CHALLENGER—IN TRIBUTE, LET US KEEP MOVING INTO THE LAST FRONTIER

(By George E. Brown, Jr.)

In one instant the explosion of the Challenger united us in grief as we were reminded of the dangers of manned space flight, and at the same time it shook the complacency with which we have viewed recent shuttle flights. Tuesday's accident etches into our memory the sacrifice that seven brave people made in pursuit of a better understanding of the universe.

As the immediate shock wears away we will begin to examine the specifics of the accident and its consequences for our manned space effort. Some of these consequences are already apparent.

The launch facilities will be shutdown for an indefinite period as investigators comb the site for clues to the launch failure. Computerized launch-control programs will be pulled and examined countless times in search of some malfunction. An exhaustive search for every fragment of the spacecraft will be conducted, just as with major aircraft accidents, to aid in the analysis of various potential explanations of the tragedy. Only when the National Aeronautics and Space Administration is completely satisfied that the source of the failure has been found and corrected can we think of a resumption of the shuttle program.

Even as confidence in the launch program and facilities is being restored, the question of crew safety will be raised. The current orbiters, as we learned Tuesday, do not have the ability to separate the crew compartment from the body of the orbiter. Crew-safety concerns may result in changes in launch procedures or an actual physical redesign of the orbiter, the main shuttle engine, the solid rocket boosters or other components of the system. This will cause further delays in a restart of our shuttle-launch program. Even when restarted, with one orbiter lost, more time will be needed between launches as returning vehicles are inspected and prepared for the next flight.

In the short run these delays will cause a shift to our European "competitors" in the commercial space race. The French and German programs use unmanned launch vehicles, and are free of the concern for astronaut safety inherent in our shuttle program. With our space-transportation system temporarily shutdown or running behind schedule, companies wanting to place satellites in orbit will seek out the European space programs.

As we move beyond these immediate consequences we will see a reexamination of our entire manned space effort as we balance future prospects against Tuesday's loss. Will this examination reveal an essential role for men and women in exploring and using space, the last frontier facing mankind, or will it conclude that we should retreat to an unmanned space program? It is my hope that we will glimpse the vision of the future that led those seven heroic people into the cockpit of the Challenger on Tuesday morning.

The vision should lead us to renew our commitment to manned efforts in space and redouble our efforts to solve every problem that stands in the way of those efforts even in times of fiscal restraint. As with the tragic loss of the Apollo 1 astronauts 19 years ago, we will come out of this with a better program.

The first priority after identifying and correcting the problems of Challenger should be an examination of the replacement of Challenger with a fifth orbiter. We should then push the development of the next generation of space vehicles—the hypersonic spacecraft that is now in the conceptual design phase, which will be able to takeoff and land much like current commercial airliner and ascend directly into space. The plans for a manned space station must be continued on schedule. Research into space manufacturing, such as the development of new drugs and new industrial materials, must be pursued along with other commercial space activities.

The Challenger mission was the latest step in a journey that we started nearly 30 years ago. We must view the exploraton of space with the same excitement and sense of opportunity that moved those seven men and women who perished Tuesday to seek the shuttle assignment. There is no other course open to Americans who would say, in the words of President Reagan on Tuesday, "Give me a challenge and I'll meet it with joy."

TRIBUTE TO THE LATE HONORABLE J. EDGAR CHENOWETH

HON. MORRIS K. UDALL

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 29, 1986

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, I join with my colleagues in mourning the passing of a friend and former Member of this House, "Judge" Ed Chenoweth, who died in Trinidad, CO, on January 2.

It was my good fortune to serve with Ed when I came here as a freshman in the early 1960's and we both sat as members of the Interior and Insular Affairs Committee.

The Denver Post said that Ed was probably a man without a single real enemy, and that's surely true in these parts. He was a kind and gracious man who was endowed with both compassion and enormous generosity.

Ed was a country lawyer who became a country judge and he had a real knack for making a point with a good bit of wit. His sense of humor didn't fade with age, and he never used it in an unkind way.

My sympathy goes to Ed's wife, Ruth, and to all the members of his family.

I am sorry that Ed Chenoweth is gone. I am glad he was my friend.

ENVIRONMENT, ECONOMY, AND SECURITY: THE EMERGING AGENDA

HON. CLAUDINE SCHNEIDER

OF RHODE ISLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 30, 1986

Mrs. SCHNEIDER. Mr. Speaker, as we embark on a new year I would just like to take a few minutes to look ahead at a compelling agenda that I hope this body will take up this year: That is, to strengthen United States economic and national security interests by helping developing countries, particularly in Africa, overcome impediments to economic development and become more stable and productive members of the international economic community.

These countries can only find the economic growth they are seeking if they protect the natural resource base that is the foundation for healthy agriculture, forestry, and herding economies. There is much we can do to provide information and training to less developed countries to help them achieve resource conserving development rather than resource depleting development. I have joined with a number of my colleagues in the Developing Country Task Force sponsored by the Environmental and Energy Study Institute to put together a congressional action plan for meeting this need, which will be introduced early this year.

I commend to my colleagues an article by Gus Speth, chairman of the task force, which eloquently lays out the new global environmental agenda that we should all be aware of and a part of. These are issues we cannot ignore, as the economic health of this country is increasingly tied to the world economy.

ENVIRONMENT, ECONOMY, SECURITY: THE EMERGING AGENDA

(By James Gustave Speth, President World Resources Institute, Washington, DC)

Today a new environmental agenda is emerging, and it is just now forcing itself on the attention of policymakers and the public at large. Once fully visible, this agenda will scarcely resemble the environmental agenda of a decade ago. Its concerns are both practical and urgent; they address the survival of human, animal, and plant populations over vast sections of our globe.

These emerging concerns encompass the great life-supporting systems of the planet's biosphere—the atmosphere, oceans, climate, soil, and forests. Today's issues are arising from the spread of deserts, the loss of forests, the erosion of soils, the growth of human populations, the exhaustion of ecological communities, the accumulation of wastes, and the alteration of the biogeochemical cycles of the planet. Today's environmental concerns transcend borders, national laws, and local customs. As a result, the politics needed to meet present and future challenges require a new vision and a new diplomacy, new leaders and new policies.

Of course, the old, predominately domestic agenda will not disappear. It is still important, still much in need of attention. The efforts launched in the 1970s to control local pollution; regulate hazardous substances; curb stripmining and clearcutting; and protect our parks, wilderness, wetlands, and wildlife have been only partially successful. Much more needs to be done to achieve the goals set in a score of major federal environmental laws passed in the 1970s. Nor have we made enough progress toward harmonizing, simplifying, and improving the economic efficiency of the environmental regulations.

But we must also make room for the new agenda. There are many compelling reasons for a high level of concern and response: reasons of humanity, of environment, of science. But increasingly we are seeing that how the new agenda is addressed can profoundly affect U.S. economic and security interests. The new agenda will demand attention in the 1980s and 1990s in part because its concerns are inextricably linked to other pressing international goals:

Expanding international trade and markets.

Improving North-South relations.

Promoting sustainable economic development.

Managing the pressures of population increases, and Ensuring long-term political stability in the Third World.

In a world that is daily more complex and interdependent economically, the economic and security interests of the U.S. must be understood in a broad global context. Economic problems elsewhere in the world—for example, those stemming from food, resource, and population pressures—can affect such U.S. national concerns as economic recovery, hemispheric security, and international political stability. Private and public decision-makers in the U.S. must together attend to these emerging issues.

Starting about fifteen years ago, U.S. leaders in Congress and elsewhere responded vigorously to the environmental concerns prominent then. Today, we face an emerging agenda of environmental, resource, and development issues that, if anything, are even more important to our basic values and long-term interests than the concerns of the 1970s. Granted that these newer concerns are less "in our own back yard" and thus harder to grapple with politically. Still, the emergence of this new set of critical issues presents U.S. leaders, both in government and in the private sector, with a special opportunity and responsibility.

THE NEW AGENDA

Consensus seems to be emerging, within the international scientific community and among other experts, on exactly what are the priority concerns that deserve wide attention:

1. Loss of crop and grazing land due to desertification erosion, conversion of land to non-farm uses, and other factors. The United Nations reports that, globally, farm and grazing land are being reduced to zero productivity at the rate of about 20 million hectares a year. (One hectare equals about 2.5 acres.)

2. Depletion of the world's tropical forests, which is leading to loss of forest resources, serious watershed damage (erosion, flooding, and siltation), and other adverse consequences. Deforestations is projected to claim a further 100 million hectares of tropical forests by the end of this century.

3. Mass extinction of species, principally from the global loss of wildlife habitat, and the associated loss of genetic resources. One estimate is that more than 1,000 plant and animal species become extinct each year, a rate that is expected to increase.

4. Rapid population growth, burgeoning Third World cities and ecological refugees. World population will most likely double by the early decades of the next century, and almost half the inhabitants of developing countries will have in cities—many of unmanageable proportions.

5. Mismanagement and shortages of fresh water resources. It now seems possible to many researchers that water will be to the 1990s what energy was to the 1970s.

6. Overfishing, habitat destruction, and pollution in the marine environment. Twenty-five of the world's most valuable fisheries are seriously depleted today due to overfishing.

7. Threats to human health from the mismanagement of pesticides and hazardous substances and from waterborne pathogens. Waterborne diseases are responsible for about 80 percent of all illness in the world today.

8. Climate change due to the increase in "greenhouse gases" in the atmosphere. The steady build-up of carbon dioxide and other gases in the atmosphere, due principally to fossil fuel burning, is predicted to create a "greenhouse effect" of rising temperatures and local climate change—the question increasingly is not "if?" but "how much?"

9. Acid rain and, more generally, the effects of a complex mix of air pollutants on fisheries, forests, and crops. The "export" of acid rain, for example, harms not only natural resources but also constructive relationships among neighboring states in political and economic affairs.

10. Mismanagement of energy fuels and pressures on energy resources, including shortages of fuelwood, the poor person's oil. Although market forces and government actions have eased pressures, these vital resources are, undeniably, finite in quantity and disparate in locale. Our energy problems may be forgotten, but they have not gone.

These ten problems mainly stem from either excessive poverty and population growth in the developing countries or from the careless and excessive use of certain technologies and resources in the developed countries. The cumulative impact of these threats is far more serious in the poor countries than in the rich. These ten problems are not, by and large, the environmental concerns to which the U.S. and other industrial countries turned priority attention in the early 1970s. They represent a new policy agenda for the United States, one that is more international and global in its scope and implications and is concerned more with management of economically important resources than with traditional pollution control.

COMMON GROUND: A NEW POLITICS

The politics of this new agenda are different from the environmental politics of the past decade. The predominantly domestic environmental causes of the 1970s had little going for them but the people. The environmental movement handed the business community a long string of defeats; it left the scientists anxious in their efforts to keep up. Economists were aghast; ecologists, even lawyers, were lionized. Citizens took on government at all levels, and won. Large majorities of the public were strongly pro-environment—and they still are, as the Reagan Administration learned the hard way.

The politics of the new agenda, on the contrary, must be a search for common ground. Popular support for the new agenda is now weaker than for the old: the issues are more remote, more distant in space and time. Although there are conspicuous exceptions (like acid rain), the new agenda addresses the relationship of environment and development in the Third World, the health of the global commons, and a series of resource and environmental threats that, while serious, are less visible, often slow to develop, or affect the U.S. only indirectly. But, as if to compensate, the new agenda invites strangers and even old antagonists to work together. Economic growth is needed to attack poverty, the worst destroyer of the environment worldwide, so business and labor leaders and environmentalists must make common cause in promoting sustainable growth. Economists and ecologists must cooperate if development strategies are to promote this goal. The development, population, and environmental communities now face the same set of problems. The relevant bureaucracy in national and international agencies—now almost immune from litigation and able to cloak itself in the mysteries of foreign policy and national security—must be wooed on its own terms. Yet, it too will not succeed unless it comes to terms with global-scale resource, environmental and population issues.

THE NEW AGENDA AND THE U.S. ECONOMY AND U.S. FOREIGN POLICY

The emergence of the new agenda has been accompanied by a growing realization that the goals of environmental conservation and economic growth in both developing and industrial countries are more complementary than often depicted.

Beyond economic concerns, there are many ways in which U.S. foreign policy interests are linked to global-scale resource, environmental and population issues.

The history of our country is replete with instances in which "national security" has been interpreted in almost exclusively military terms. Given the linkages among population, resource, economic and political factors, a broader concept of our own long-term security interests is essential for the decades ahead.

Our long-term economic, political, and even military interests depend far more than has been generally acknowledged on the success with which developing country resources can be wisely managed for sustainable development.

MARGERY SANFORD AND ADELE SANDBERG: CHRONICLERS FOR SOVIET JEWRY

HON. WILLIAM LEHMAN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 30, 1986

Mr. LEHMAN of Florida. Mr. Speaker, those of us who have been active in Congress on the issue of Soviet Jewry have in large part relied on accurate and complete information about specific cases of Soviet Jews who have been denied permission to emigrate and who have encountered harsh treatment because of their desire to emigrate. It is due to the efforts of two of my friends and constituents, Margery Sanford and Adele Sandberg of North Miami Beach that congressional offices have received and made use of 12 volumes documenting the case histories of more than 1,100 refuseniks.

When my office became involved in the case of refusenik Ilya Essas back in 1976, it was one of these volumes that provided the information we needed. Now, 10 years later, the Essas family finally received permission to emigrate and arrived in Israel just days ago. I would like to place in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an article from the Miami Herald of January 2, 1986, paying tribute to this very important project. The difficult challenge we face in trying to improve emigration prospects for Soviet Jews is made so much easier than it would otherwise be—thanks to Marge and Adele.

The article follows:

THEIR CRY IS, "LET OUR PEOPLE GO"

(By Bea L. Hines)

For more than 10 years now, Margery Sanford and Adele E. Sandberg have collected tidbits of information about thousands of Jewish families still seeking their freedom from the Soviet Union.

"It's like a giant jigsaw puzzle," said Sanford. "A line from a story . . . a paragraph from a letter . . . things we have put together to help tell their story."

The result of their labor is 12 volumes documenting the case histories of more than 1,100 Refuseniks—Jews who have applied to leave Russia but have been refused permission by the Soviet government.

Their latest volume, "Soviet Jews: Hostages All," was published in September.

"Our simple message to the Soviet Union is, 'Let our people go,' " said Sandberg.

Sandberg and Sanford, both married to doctors, live in the same block in North Miami Beach. They both attend Temple Sinai there. They became best friends after they began volunteer work with the South Florida Conference on Soviet Jewry.

They started documenting the cases of Refuseniks after each had traveled to the Soviet Union.

Since the first volume was published in 1976, Sanford and Sandberg said the books have been used throughout the country by American Jews as references for the Adopt a Family and Twinning programs.

In the Adopt a Family program, American families select a Russian family from the book to correspond with. The Twinning program pairs 13-year-olds celebrating their bar or bat mitzvah in this country with Soviet Jews who are unable to do so because of restrictions on religious activities.

Most importantly, the women say, the books have kept the plight of the Soviet Jews in the spotlight.

"These books are their lifeline," Sanford said. "They want people to know they are alive," she said.

"This is a mass historically important movement. We want the free people of the world to relate to these people who are being held hostage," added Sandberg. "Inside Russia, they are silent. We who are free have to be their voice."

"Hinda Cantor, chairman of the conference on Soviet Jewry, says the books are recognized throughout the world.

"They are important, if for nothing else than moral support," she said.

Last month, in the midst of the Reagan-Gorbachev talks, Ilya Essas, his wife and three children were given permission to leave Russia.

Essas, a prominent mathematician who lost his job when he started giving Hebrew lessons in his Moscow apartment, had tried for 12 years to leave Russia.

Sandberg and her husband, Joel, had fought for Essas for years. They complained when the Essas family was harassed by the KGB and lobbied politicians for help in pressuring the Russians.

The Sandbergs' son, David, was twinned with Essas' son, Iosif, last year in a bar mitzvah ceremony.

There are thousands of other Refuseniks waiting to leave. People like Mikhail and Valya Lerman and their 13-year-old daughter, Julia, who has been ill from birth.

Mikhail Lerman was a mathematician and his wife was a computer programmer. They applied to leave the Soviet Union in 1977 and were refused in August 1978. The Lermans are worried about Julia's condition and are not convinced she is receiving adequate medical treatment.

And like Evgeny and Marina Aizenberg.

Aizenberg, 33, is serving time in prison for "defaming the Soviet State." His crime was teaching Hebrew and celebrating Jewish holidays. Aizenberg's wife, Marina, has a malignant tumor in her breast and faces a mastectomy.

There are other success stories. Mark Markish, his wife and family were allowed to leave the Soviet Union last October. In a letter from Switzerland to Sanford and Sandberg, Markish's father wrote of his thanks:

". . . I am extremely happy to inform you that my son Mark Markish has at last been able to leave the Soviet Union with his wife and children.

"There is no doubt that their emigration would not have been possible without your active support and help. . . ."

While it is encouraging when Refuseniks are allowed to leave the Soviet Union, Sanford and Sandberg said that is the time to work that much harder for the release of those who remain behind the Iron Curtain.

"Since the Reagan-Gorbachev talks the morale of the Refuseniks is very low now," Sanford said. "Their lives are being threatened everyday.

"What we've done is just the tip of the iceberg."

Said Sandberg: "The Russians keep saying all the Jews who wanted to leave have left. Well, our books tell a different story. We believe there are from 2 to 3 million Jews still living in the Soviet Union. That's one out of six Jews in the world today.

"At least 300,000 to 400,000 have already requested visas from the Soviet Union. Their lives are on the line," she said.

What can you do?

"Write to them, keep in touch. Let them know you care," Sandberg said.

Persons who are planning to visit the Soviet Union may contact Sanford and Sandberg at the South Florida Conference on Soviet Jewry at the Greater Miami Jewish Federation for names and addresses of Refuseniks to visit while there.

"We in the free world are their only hope," Sandberg said.

MEDICARE BENEFICIARY PROTECTION ACT OF 1986

HON. EDWARD R. ROYBAL

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 30, 1986

Mr. ROYBAL. Mr. Speaker, yesterday I introduced the Medicare Beneficiary Protection Act of 1986 (H.R. 4065) that continues the current waiver of liability presumption for home health agencies and skilled nursing facilities—a provision the administration is proposing to eliminate.

Today I ask that H.R. 4065 be printed in its entirety in the RECORD along with letters cosigned by the Honorable FORTNEY (PETE) STARK and myself on the waiver of liability issue to Health and Human Services Secretary Otis Bowen and OMB Director James Miller.

The H.R. 4065 follows:

H.R. 4065

A bill to continue the current waiver of liability presumption for home health agencies and skilled nursing facilities under the medicare program in order to protect beneficiary access to home health and extended care services

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Medicare Beneficiary Access protection Act of 1986".

SEC. 2. WAIVER OF LIABILITY PRESUMPTION FOR HOME HEALTH AGENCIES.

The Secretary of Health and Human Services shall, for purposes of determining whether payments to a home health agency should be denied pursuant to section 1862(a)(1)(A) of the Social Security Act, apply a presumption of compliance (2.5 percent) in the same manner as under the regulations in effect as of January 1, 1986. Such presumption shall apply until 12 months after the date on which 10 regional intermediaries have commenced operations to service home health agencies, as required under section 1816(e)(4) of the Social Security Act.

SEC. 3. WAIVER OF LIABILITY PRESUMPTION FOR SKILLED NURSING FACILITIES.

The Secretary of Health and Human Services shall, for purposes of determining whether payments to a skilled nursing facility should be denied pursuant to section 1862(a)(1)(A) of the Social Security Act, apply the same presumption of compliance (5 percent) as in effect under regulations as of January 1, 1986. Such presumption shall apply for the 30-month period beginning with the first month beginning after the date of the enactment of this Act.

SELECT COMMITTEE ON AGING,
Washington, DC, January 17, 1986.

Hon. JAMES C. MILLER III,
Director, Office of Management and Budget, Old Executive Office Building, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. MILLER: It has come to our attention that final regulations are being drafted by the Health Care Financing Administration regarding the medicare waiver of liability for nursing home and home health providers.

In proposed regulations published February 12, 1985, HCFA would eliminate the criteria for a favorable presumption and determine payment on a case-by-case basis. Under this rule, providers would be liable for payment for claims which were judged to be uncovered after HCFA review.

As a part of the conference agreement on H.R. 3128, the Consolidated Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1985, (which, as you know, because of time constraints at the end of the session did not receive full consideration) a provision was adopted that would require the Secretary to maintain the 2.5 percent waiver of liability policy for home health agencies from enactment until 12 months after the consolidation of claims for processing for home health agencies.

In addition, the conference agreement contains a provision which would require the Secretary to maintain the five percent favorable presumption waiver of liability for skilled nursing facilities until 30 months after enactment.

The conference committee reached this agreement based on the potential impact of eliminating the favorable presumption would have not only on providers, but beneficiaries' access to such facilities. We believe that conference will be taken up when the new session begins and we have every expectation that the waiver of liability provisions will remain intact.

Therefore, we would request that you consider the clear intent of the conference agreement in drafting final regulations on this issue.

Sincerely,

FORTNEY H. (PETE) STARK,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Health, Committee on Ways and Means.
EDWARD R. ROYBAL,
Chairman, Select Committee on Aging.

COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS,
Washington, DC, January 17, 1986.

In proposed regulations published February 12, 1985, HCFA would eliminate the criteria for a favorable presumption and determine payment on a case-by-case basis. Under this rule, providers would be liable for payment for claims which were judged to be uncovered after HCFA review.

As a part of the conference agreement on H.R. 3138, the Consolidated Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1985, (which, as you know, because of time contraints at the end of the session did not receive full consideration) a provision was adopted that would require the Secretary to maintain the 2.5 percent waiver of liability policy for home health agencies from enactment until 12 months after the consolidation of claims for processing for home health agencies.

In addition, the conference agreement contains a provision, which would require the Secretary to maintain the five percent favorable presumption waiver of liability for skilled nursing facilities until 30 months after enactment.

WE CANNOT WELCOME SAVIMBI

HON. MAJOR R. OWENS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 30, 1986

Mr. OWENS. Mr. Speaker, it has come to my attention that some Members of Congress and White House staff members will be meeting with Jonas Savimbi, President of the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola [UNITA], to discuss proposals to provide assistance to Mr. Savimbi and his South African backed insurgents seeking to overthrow the Government of Angola. Assistance being discussed includes military and so-called humanitarian aid. Whether the aid being discussed would be supplied overtly or covertly, the practical reality is that it would conclusively ally the United States with South Africa's apartheid regime.

South Africa has a despicable history of attempting to control all of southern Africa. It has raided many of its neighbors directly following a policy which serves to strengthen its own apartheid regime. Supporting UNITA would serve South Africa's policies in that part of the world by assisting their surrogate forces in Angola. This policy is hostile to all of the black people in southern Africa. This policy serves to condone all of South Africa's acts of banditry such as its air raids against Angola from Namibia which it illegally occupies.

It is hard to imagine that we would ever welcome a foreign leader to this country who proudly proclaims that he was a friend of Adolf Hitler. Since the Botha regime in South Africa is the moral equivalent of Hitler's Nazi regime, no decent public official should be extending the hand of welcome to the opportunist, Jonas Savimbi, who proudly proclaims that Prime Minister Botha, the butcher of South Africa, is his friend.

ANGOLA—WHOSE SIDE ARE WE ON?

HON. DUNCAN HUNTER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 30, 1986

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call the attention of the House to an important and insightful article, "Angola—Whose Side Are We On?" written by Maj. Gen. J. Milnor Roberts, Jr. (AUS-Retired), which appeared in the February 1986 issue of the Retired Officer magazine. General Roberts is a former executive director of the Reserve Officers Association and currently is chairman of the board of the Committee for a Free Afghanistan.

With the current visit of UNITA leader, Dr. Jonah Savimbi, to Washington, I commend it to my colleagues as a thoughtful explanation of the stakes and circumstances present in Angola. As we, in the Congress, debate this Nation's policy toward Angola, it is important that we are well informed. There are many misconceptions about the Marxist regime of the MPLA and the UNITA freedom fighters. I believe this article clarifies some of these misconceptions.

Mr. Speaker, I ask my colleagues to read "Angola—Whose Side Are We On?" as we consider the fate of Angola. It is far too important a topic to ignore.

[From The Retired Officer, February 1986]

ANGOLA—WHOSE SIDE ARE WE ON?

(By Maj. Gen. J. Milnor Roberts, Jr., AUS-Ret.)

Q. Where can you find a country with a communist government, kept in power with the aid of 35,000 Cuban troops, supplied with $2 billion worth of current Soviet weapons in the past 18 months, financed by American oil companies and regarded by our State Department as an example of "constructive engagement"? Those last two words are State Department jargon for turning our backs on freedom fighters struggling to throw off communist domination while "negotiating."

A. Angola is the name of this strategically important country situated on the South Atlantic coast of Africa. It has a population of about eight million and an area nearly twice as large as Texas.

Most Americans haven't the slightest idea of the location of Angola unless they happen to reside in Delaware, Indiana, Kansas, Louisiana or New York, all of which have "Angolas." There is a large swamp in North Carolina bearing that name, also.

Why should they care? Angola is a significant portion of the South African continent which has a veritable treasure house of essential minerals as well as major reserves of gold and diamonds. Furthermore, Angola, Namibia and South Africa border the South Atlantic Ocean and the key sea routes connecting Southwest Asia with Europe and the Americas.

The Soviet Union has maintained intense activity in this region for the past 25 years and has succeeded in establishing a "red belt" across the continent from Angola through Zimbabwe to Mozambique. Communist insurgents (SWAPO—which stands for South West Africa People's Organization) have caused turmoil in Namibia for the past decade. Their final objective is communist domination of Southern Africa.

A colony of Portugal for nearly 500 years, Angola was ripe for independence in the early 1960s when most European colonies in Africa were seeking self-government and release from foreign domination. By 1966, there were three nationalist movements (FNLA—acronym for National Front for the Liberation of Angola; MPLA—Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola—the ruling party. And UNITA—National Union for the Total Independence of Angola). The latter was led by Dr. Jonas Savimbi, who proved to be the strongest leader of the three movements. Although he received some training in Red China, Savimbi is not a communist and is a strong advocate of free elections and a pluralist democracy for Angola.

However, the MPLA was Marxist oriented from its establishment, and its policies were guided by the Soviet Union when Portugal agreed to independence for Angola at the Alvor Conference in January 1975. By early March 1975, some Cuban troops were training at MPLA bases, and Soviet weapons were being supplied in steadily increasing numbers.

Guerrilla warfare soon broke out with the MPLA forces on one side and the FNLA and Savimbi's UNITA on the other. Although there were South African forces involved in the early fighting near the border of Namibia (then called Southwest Africa), these were withdrawn by February 1976, which left UNITA to carry on the struggle alone in the southeastern section of the country. The FNLA became ineffective in northern Angola, and its leader, Holden Roberto, vanished. Thousands of Cuban troops were arriving by September 1975, and victory for the Marxist MPLA seemed inevitable.

CLARK AMENDMENT

While there had been limited U.S. assistance to UNITA and the FNLA during this turbulent period, all such support ended when Congress passed the Clark Amendment (named for then Sen. Richard C. Clark of Iowa) in January 1976. This law prohibited all direct and indirect military or paramilitary assistance to any group in Angola. The rationale for this action, which amounted to delivering Angola to the communists on a "silver platter," was the alleged threat of "another Vietnam."

But all was not lost. As the Soviets have discovered in Afghanistan, courageous people—given strong leadership—will fight for indefinite periods for their homes and their freedoms. During the past nine years, UNITA forces under the leadership of Savimbi, have gained control of more than one-third of Angola and are operating a government which is concerned with all aspects of civic and educational affairs. Thus, UNITA is no longer just another guerrilla operation. It has a regular army of 25,000 men and militia forces totaling 30,000 additional personnel.

POLITICAL-MILITARY SITUATION

Jeremias K. Chitunda, UNITA Secretary of Foreign Affairs, puts the political and military situation in perspective through the series of questions and answers which follow:

Q. Were the Cubans invited by the Angolan government to help repel the South African invasion?

A. Absolutely not. It is totally inaccurate for anyone to assert that "the Cubans came to Angola at the request of the Angolan government to repel a South African invasion," as the MPLA and its friends allege ex post facto. The indisputable chronology of events shows that the South Africans intervened precisely in response to the Cuban moves. And the only government in place in Angola at the time of the Cuban arrival was the interim government composed by the three Angolan parties and Portugal. The Cubans were invited by an Angolan faction; they came to torpedo the Alvor Agreement and to install the Soviet protege (MPLA) in power.

Q. Is the present MPLA regime a legitimate government?

A. No. The regime was installed in power by the Cuban expeditionary force and Soviet guns; it is maintained in power by foreign armies. Legitimacy to a government can be conferred only by the people through a plebiscite or free elections. The Angolan people have never been allowed to exercise this inalienable right to self-determination; they have never been consulted, they have never been allowed to vote. The present MPLA government is illegitimate.

Q. Does OAU (Organization of African Unity) recognition confer legitimacy to the MPLA regime?

A. No. Idi Amin Dada of Uganda came to power by force, by overthrowing a duly elected government. And yet, when Idi Amin was at the peak of his atrocities (endless massacres against the Ugandan people), amidst worldwide dismay and condemnations, he was also the chairman of the OAU! How legitimate was Idi Amin's rule of terror to the eyes of this pan-African organization? Since there are so many atrocious, corrupt and illegitimate regimes in Africa (as elsewhere among Third World countries), it is normal to expect the OAU member governments to protect each other by never criticizing a member country for its internal situation. Were the OAU to act effectively to promote peace, justice and legitimacy in Angola, it would set precedent to the downfall of many regimes.

Q. How did the OAU react to foreign intervention in Angola?

A. The ad hoc extraordinary summit conference by the African heads of state on Jan. 21, 1976, in Addis Ababa (Ethiopia) had recommended the immediate and total withdrawal of all foreign forces from Angola—the Cubans and the South Africans alike. The South Africans withdrew by February 1976, but the Cubans remained and increased their number from 12,000 (in early 1976) to 45,000 (by late 1985).

Q. What are UNITA goals?

A. UNITA seeks (a) the withdrawal of all foreign forces from the country; (b) the formation of a government of national unity; (c) national reconciliation; (d) holding of free elections; and (e) the creation of durable democratic institutions for socio-economic progress and well-being. UNITA wishes to achieve these goals by peaceful means alone. But for the time being, armed resistance has been imposed on it by the refusal of the other side to negotiate.

Q. How successful is UNITA's armed resistance to the Soviet-Cuban occupation?

A. UNITA controls today more than one-third of Angola. Schools, clinics, repair shops, agriculture, trade, road and bridge construction are some of the main social and economic activities that are normally carried out in the UNITA-controlled area to ensure self-sufficiency in food, social services and manpower. UNITA enjoys vast popular support not only in the areas under its control but also in the enemy-controlled portion of the country.

Most of the fighting in Angola actually takes place in the Soviet-Cuban-MPLA controlled part of the country where UNITA has extended its military programs. UNITA has a 50,000-strong army of regular and semi-regular troops with both conventional and guerrilla warfare training.

The remarkable improvement in the fighting capability and overwhelming popular support have now enabled UNITA to achieve overall strategic superiority, notwithstanding the other side's vast arsenal of highly sophisticated weapons, tanks and aircraft. UNITA has popular support, which cuts across all Angola's ethnic groups, in the countryside as well as in urban areas.

Q. Is UNITA an Ovimbundu-based movement?

A. While enjoying the overwhelming support of the Ovimbundu (who make up 43 percent of the Angolan population), UNITA is totally multi-ethnic in its origin, leadership composition and actual presence throughout the country.

UNITA was founded on Mar. 13, 1966, in the village of Mwangai in the central eastern province of Moxico predominated by the Luena and Chjokwe ethnic groups. The founding members included Ovimbundu, Chokwe, Luena, Cabinda, Cuanhama, Bakongo and Kimbundu, integrating Angola's main ethnic groups.

UNITA's penetration and consolidation of its guerrilla bases today in the North (Bakongo and Kimbundu), Centre (Ovimbundu and Kimbundu), South (Ovimbundu, Cuanhama, Ganguela and Humbe), East (Chokew and Luene) and Northeast (Chokwe and Lunda) were made possible only with its multi-ethnic base of support and appeal.

Q. Where does UNITA get its support?

A. From several friendly countries in Africa, Asia, Europe and the Middle East. However, 65 percent of UNITA's weapons are those captured in combat; others are received and/or purchased from outside.

The main source of the movement's strength is the practice of scrupulous self-reliance. Thus, there are no foreign advisors and no foreign camps for training for UNITA. While deeming foreign support indispensable, UNITA is not dependent on such assistance.

UNITA's ties with South Africa are strictly within the context of South Africa's economic dominance in the region where all the countries find it literally impossible not to cooperate with Pretoria, notwithstanding all Africans' sincere commitment to fight apartheid.

CURRENT U.S. POLICY

Despite the obvious progress of UNITA, U.S. policy continues to favor the Marxist puppet government in Angola. About 90 percent of that government's revenue is obtained from the sale of oil to several Western firms, most notably Gulf Oil Corporation, which is now owned by Chevron. This trade amounted to more than $1 billion in 1984. At least $500 million of that amount was paid by Angola to Castro's Cuban government in consideration for the services of Cuban troops. There are also several thousand other Soviet bloc troops in the country.

A consortium of U.S. banks, including the Export-Import Bank, announced in September 1985 a loan of $500 million to Angola for the further development of its oil reserves.

Confronted with the paradox of a U.S. policy, which sustains our opponents and penalizes our friends, Congress repealed the Clark Amendment in July 1985, thus removing the legal barrier to assisting Savimbi's "freedom fighter."

In October, Congressmen Claude Pepper of Florida, with co-sponsor Rep. Jack Kemp of New York, introduced a bill which would authorize $27 million in humanitarian assistance of Angola. To the amazement of many, including House Minority Leader Bob Michel (R-Ill.), the Pepper-Kemp bill was opposed by Secretary of State George Shultz on the ground that it would disturb "negotiations" which have been on-going for a long time!

Meanwhile, the Soviets have supplied the following hardware items to the MPLA in 1984 and much more of the same in 1985 (its value is estimated in excess of $1 billion): 25 armored cars; 34 57mm anti-aircraft guns; 100 other AA guns; 96 T-34 tanks; 34 T-54 tanks; 3 T-62 tanks; 46 personnel carriers (BTR-60); 140 cargo trucks; 30 MiG-21s (Fishbed); 7 MI-8 helicopter crates; 2 MI-24 rotary wing crates; 12 MiG-21 fuselage crates; 5 SU-22 (Fitter) fuselage crates; 5 SU-22 (Fitter) wing crates; 2 MiG-23 (Flogger) fuselage crates; and 6 MiG-23 (Flogger) wing crates.

At the end of 1985, there was growing bipartisan sentiment in Congress to take the following steps with regard to Angola:

Give the Angola "freedom fighters" the same amount of humanitarian aid as authorized for the "Contras" who are battling the Marxist government in Nicaragua ($27 million/Pepper-Kemp bill).

Provide the Angola "freedom fighters" $27 million in military aid, especially anti-tank weaponry (Siljander bill).

Cut off U.S. investments in Angola along with loans and credits until all foreign troops are withdrawn (McCollum bill).

In his Oct. 24 address to the United Nations, President Reagan demanded the withdrawal of Soviet bloc troops and/or support from Angola, Afghanistan, Nicaragua, Cambodia and Ethiopia. With this evidence of White House support and obvious interest by a majority in Congress, which repealed the Clark Amendment, there should be no question as to "whose side we are on in Angola."

THE VERSATILE AND DISTINGUISHED CAREER OF BRADFORD F. MORSE

HON. DANTE B. FASCELL

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 30, 1986

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, the Honorable Bradford F. Morse, a very distinguished American and a former member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, has announced that he will retire this spring after serving for 15 years as Administrator of the United Nations Development Program [UNDP].

Both as Under Secretary General of the United Nations and subsequently as UNDP Administrator, Brad Morse has been the highest ranking American employee of the United Nations. As UNDP chief, Brad performed magnificently—rescuing the agency from near bankruptcy at the time of his appointment in 1974. Because of his success in that area, he was asked in 1985 by U.N. Secretary General Perez de Cuellar to head up the first U.N. office to coordinate global famine relief to Africa, where he also did an outstanding job.

Brad Morse has had an interesting and varied career—as a law professor at Boston University, as head of the Veterans' Administration under President Eisenhower, as counsel to the Senate Armed Services Committee, and as a Member of Congress. A man of bluff good humor, enormous energy, and perpetual optimism—he was not only highly popular among Members of this body—but also the perfect choice for the world body which clearly needs employees of Brad's caliber. He will be sorely missed, but I wish him well in his richly deserved retirement—which I know will be an active one, indeed.

Mr. Speaker, the Christian Science Monitor recently carried an article summarizing the highlights of Brad Morse's remarkable public career, and I ask unanimous consent to insert the full text in the RECORD at this point.

The article follows:

[From the Christian Science Monitor, Dec. 5, 1985]

BRADFORD MORSE: A CAREER IN PUBLIC SERVICE, CAPPED BY GUIDING A UN AGENCY

(By David K. Willis)

UNITED NATIONS, N.Y.—A big, bluff man strides into a conference room 21 floors above Manhattan. A team of secretaries glides in and out of a large conference room as he begins to reminisce to a visitor. Telephones ring. The sun sparkles on the East River below.

This could be the chief executive of a large corporation. But few chief executives can look back on a half-dozen different careers in which:

He is widely credited with helping to save countless lives by setting up the first United Nations office to coordinate global famine relief to Africa.

He served for 15 years as the highest ranking American at the United Nations. A firm defender of the UN dream, he plunged into such diplomatic hornets' nests as Idi Amin's expulsion of Asians from Uganda, and organizing development projects ranging from the construction of thousands of paved roads in Africa's starving Sahel region to studying the migration patterns of red locusts in Africa which destroy maize (corn) crops.

He rescued the UN's largest single agency (the UN Development Program, whose present budget is about $1 billion a year) from near-bankruptcy when he took it over in 1974. He sold the official limousine he inherited, dismissed the chauffeur, and toured the world in tourist-class air seats to drum up cash.

He studied law in Boston, advised senators in Washington, virtually ran the third-largest department in the government of the Eisenhower administration (the Veterans Administration), and won six successive terms in the House of Representatives as a Republican from a previously Democratic area centered around Lowell, Mass.

Bradford F. Morse recalls all of this and more over coffee, breaking off now and then to take urgent calls. Nostalgia hangs in the air: Mr. Morse has just announced that he is retiring from the UN at some point after May next year.

He has a two-year-old daughter from a second marriage and has told friends he would like to spend more time with her. But he intends to stay active in the Inter-Action Council (a private group of about 30 former heads of state including Helmut Schmidt, Takeo Fukuda, James Callaghan, and Pierre Trudeau of which Morse is secretary-general) and the Salzburg Seminar (a private, 40-year-old non-profit group whose officials report contributions from the Austrian government, the United States Information Agency, the Ford, Rockefeller, and other foundations, and more.)

The seminar gathers leaders from West, East, and the third world at ten seminars a year in Schloss Leopoldkron near Salzburg, Austria. Morse has just been appointed the organization's president.

Yet what Morse really wanted to talk about the other morning was global development. The two words sound formidably dull, but in fact they mean trying to enable as many people as possible to lift the quality of their lives through higher incomes, more opportunity, greater freedom.

Morse has tried to do this first in the US and then as a world-traveling UN official. He is much like in the UN system, by people who pay tribute to his human warmth while wondering how he finds time to focus on many different organizations and issues every day.

"Yes, he's taking two different jobs in his 'retirement'," says one longtime associate, "but for Brad, two jobs at a time is just rountine. . . ."

Says another senior UN official: "Here is a kind, decent human being who has always worked hard to help other people."

Comments M. Peter McPherson, head of the US foreign aid agency in Washington: "Brad brought political skills to his job as the first UN coordinator of African famine relief. Those skills were needed to get things done, enabling his staff to concentrate on the daily details. On Africa he has done a fine job."

For years now, Morse has been preaching the UN's role as the supporter and coordinator of what he calls "invisible" development.

"The UN Development Program [UNDP] doesn't have anything that appeals to the heartstrings, like refugees, or children, or disaster victims," he said. "We work instead in a number of different fields: agriculture, food, forestry, fisheries, health care, atomic science, medical research, education, civil aviation, meteorolgy, transport. . . .

"We coordinate. We facilitate. We don't build buildings or dams that you can touch, feel, and see. We provide technical cooperation. . . ."

UNDP, he argues, helps countries develop their "human capacities"—"we help create and release human energy."

Why, he asks, is Japan a great country despite having few natural resources? What makes Switzerland respected? Morse's answer: the abilities of their people.

Only about 10 percent to 20 percent of a country's growth is the combination of labor and capital, he says. The rest is human energy and productivity.

Morse was asked by UN Secretary-General Javier Pérez de Cuéllar to launch the UN Office for Emergency Operations in Africa in early 1985. Critics said it was too late, too powerless, too bureaucratic.

A year later, Morse and his Canadian deputy Maurice Strong receive plaudits from governments and private agencies for providing a central focus to scattered UN efforts, and for coordinating efforts in the field by a number of agencies including the World Food Program and the Food and Agriculture Organization, both based in Rome.

Morse said he had always wanted to work with public affairs.

After teaching law at Boston University from 1949-53, he served as a Lowell, Mass., city councilor and then moved to Washington as counsel to the Senate Armed Services Committee, working on ammunition shortages and Pentagon oversight.

He served on the staff of Sen. Leverett Saltonstall (R) of Massachusetts until 1958 when he become No. 2 man in the Veterans Administration.

In September 1960 the Fifth District Congressional seat in Massachusetts fell vacant when the incumbent passed on 10 days before the Republican primary. Morse jumped in as a write-in candidate and won. Given little chance to defeat his rival Democrat in November with Democrat John F. Kennedy running for president, Morse won by virtually ignoring television, using radio extensively, and concentrating on reaching people in constant touch with the wider public: store owners, barbers, and more.

He kept on winning the seat throughout the 1960s, setting up the Wednesday Group of moderate GOP House members, heading a group of members supporting peace through law and serving on the Foreign Affairs Committee.

In 1972 the Nixon White House asked him if he would replace the late Ralph Bunche as UN undersecretary-general.

On Oct. 3, 1973, Morse hit the headlines by physically separating two General Assembly delegates (from Chile and Saudi Arabia) on the assembly podium as the two men shouted insults at each other.

Since 1974 he has repaired the financial fortunes of UNDP. This year member states pledged $736 million, $36 million above target. A number of other smaller agencies under his command spend another $300 million.

Is he optimistic as he prepares to leave the UN?

"Well," he says, "we haven't had a third world war. The UN has its weaknesses, of course, but it has achieved more than people give it credit for."

Avoiding political issues, he cited the UN's social and humanitarian ones: helping push up life expectancy, cut infant mortality rates, boost literacy, and working to steamline international air travel, mail, radio broadcasts and more.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

HON. GEORGE W. GEKAS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 30, 1986

Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, due to illness I was unable to come to the floor and vote on three measures preceding the final vote on H.R. 4055.

Mr. Speaker, I would like this statement to appear immediately after the vote on rollcall No. 12.

FEDERAL DISTRICT OF CONNECTICUT JUDGE BILL

HON. STEWART B. McKINNEY

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 30, 1986

Mr. McKINNEY. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing with the entire Connecticut House delegation a bill to authorize an additional Federal district court judge for the district of Connecticut. Similar legislation is being introduced today in the other body by my good friend and colleague, Senator LOWELL P. WEICKER, JR.

The U.S. district courts essentially are the trial courts for cases under general Federal jurisdiction. Each State has at least one district court, while some of the larger States have as many as four. Currently, there are 92 district courts, plus one each in the District of Columbia and the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico. Each court has from 1 to 27 judgeships. In total, there are 541 permanent district judgeships in the 50 States.

In Connecticut there is one Federal district court with six permanent judges. Enactment of Public Law 98-353, the Bankruptcy Amendments and Federal Judgeship Act of 1984, created the sixth Connecticut judgeship. Yet while this recent addition to the district court undoubtedly will improve the situation in Connecticut, the case load burden of the court remains unwieldy.

The Subcommittee on Judicial Statistics, comprised of Federal judges, in its most recent national judgeship survey determined that 400 weighted filings per judge per year is the level at which a court deserves consideration for additional judgeships. A weighted filing simply is a mathematical adjustment of case filings which gives heavier count to cases known to be of a more difficult and time consuming nature. The district of Connecticut over the last 6 years has averaged 537 weighted filings per judge. In 1984 the end-of-year figure was 633; and while the 1985 total showed improvement—512—it still is well above both the national average of 453 and the acceptable level of 400 filings.

In addition, within its Federal circuit, comprised of six districts and encompassing Connecticut, New York, and Vermont, our State has had the most weighted case filings per judge in each of the last 6 years, except in 1983 when New York's northern district totaled 572 to Connecticut's 569. Given these compelling statistics, I believe that the need for an additional district court judge in Connecticut is evident.

It is important for my colleagues in the House to understand that my intention in introducing this measure is not to diminish in any way the needs of those district courts in analogous circumstances. In fact, I encourage representatives from these districts to undertake similar initiatives. However, the situation in Connecticut is critical, and I believe it is essential to recognize that fact.

A question also may be raised over the cost of this legislation, especially now in light of the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings spending cuts which lie ahead. According to the Administrative Office of the U.S. Courts, each additional Federal district judgeship costs $542,000 during the first year and $406,000 for each additional year. For Connecticut, these modest costs will translate into large benefits.

An investment in our Nation's judicial system is an investment in our society. The costs attributed to providing an additional judgeship for the district of Connecticut would be minuscule compared to the increased ability of that court to meet its responsibilities to society.

Therefore, I thank my colleagues n the Connecticut delegation for joining with me today in introducing this measure. And I am sure that I speak for all of them when I urge the House Committee on the Judiciary to expedite proceedings on this legislation.

BIG CYPRESS NATIONAL PRESERVE ADDITION

HON. TOM LEWIS

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 30, 1986

Mr. LEWIS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing the Big Cypress National Preserve Addition. This legislation offers a unique opportunity to acquire a major land area in Collier County, FL, for an important addition to the Big Cypress National Preserve.

With the conversion of Alligator Alley—State Road 84—to Interstate 75, access to private property north and south of the alley in the Big Cypress Swamp will be served, and damages paid to affected property owners. Under this innovative legislation, Federal and State transportation severance damage moneys would be utilized to pay a portion of the cost of acquiring approximately 128,000 acres of privately owned land located immediately north of the Big Cypress National Preserve. Of the remaining balance, 80 percent would be paid by the U.S. Department of Interior and 20 percent by the State of Florida.

By enabling the acquisition of this land to take place in conjunction with the Alligator Alley and I-75 conversion, fee title to the land could be obtained by paying landowners the difference between the severance damages and the actual value of the land. This would result in the public acquiring this land for far less than what it would otherwise cost.

An exciting, cost-saving feature of this proposal is the possibility of compensating private property owners through land exchanges with the Department of Interior. Utilization of existing Department of Interior lands will become increasingly necessary in this era of fiscal belt-tightening, and "land swaps" would allow this land to be obtained without large Federal expenditures.

Although this bill is an important piece of environmental legislation, it is also vital to recognize that it is much more. For as surely as wildlife in the Glades are linked to the wetlands for survival, so are the growing urban populations of southern Florida dependent upon these same wetland areas as recharge sources for their drinking water. In my view, this legislation is needed to help insure that south Florida's water supply will have a chance to keep pace with its population increases.

Securing passage of this bill will prove to be a difficult task; however, because of the significant public benefit associated with the acquisition program, it is a task which must be vigorously pursued. Therefore, I urge the support and participation of my House colleagues as together we labor in this important undertaking.

DEWEY KNIGHT: OUTSTANDING PERFORMANCE IS A DAILY ROUTINE

HON. WILLIAM LEHMAN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 30, 1986

Mr. LEHMAN of Florida. Mr. Speaker, Dewey Knight has been a great natural resource in Metro-Dade County government for almost 30 years—16 of those years as an assistant county manager. He knows Dade County, its people, its problems and its government. he brings people together and makes things happen and is a political treasure whose sound judgement, knowledge and commitment are an almost indispensable part of Metro-Dade government.

By choice, Dewey Knight doesn't often make headlines. He is truly powerful because he does not seek power, and he enjoys great confidence because he only cares about results, and not who gets the credit. We are fortunate to have such a fine public servant working for our community.

The publisher of the Miami Herald recently wrote an article about Dewey Knight, and I would like to share it with my colleagues:

The article follows:

A CARING SPIRIT WATCHES OVER DADE

(By Dick Capen)

"A great champion of the downtrodden."
"A brilliant administrator."
"A model public servant."

When it comes to public-service role models, Dewey Knight is one of South Florida's best. Many consider this 27-year veteran of Dade County government to be a key conscience of our community. As an assistant county manager since 1970, he has been a highly valued deputy to three Dade County managers—Porter Homer, Ray Goode, and Merrett Stierheim. Now he is breaking in his fourth boss, Sergio Pereira, who succeeded Stierheim earlier this month.

"Dewey is a great champion of the downtrodden, with compassion for the refugees and a particular sensitivity to the problems of the black community here," says Stierheim, who relied on Knight as his principal deputy for almost 10 years. Former Manager Porter Homer, who hired Knight in 1959, says that "Dewey was a person I spotted early on as one with a lot of talent and a willingness to work hard." Ray Goode, who worked with Knight for six years before giving up his county post in 1976 to become president of the Babcock Co., describes him as "Mr. Dependable, with a penetrating social consciousness. Dewey's bottom line was always to serve the citizens of Dade County."

Known for hard work and fairness, Knight credits Porter Homer for opening equal-opportunity doors for him. "Porter was key in bringing blacks and Latins into significant policy and administrative positions," Knight says.

He looks up to the three former managers as his mentors. "Porter taught me tenacity. Ray was one of the fairest men I have ever known, and Merrett made me realize you need to constantly have a fire boiling in your stomach." All three mentors clearly played key roles in Knight's phenomenal career achievements, culminating in his selection in 1984 for the Outstanding Leadership Award from the Conference of Black Administrators.

Given the hazardous nature of public service in this part of the world, Porter probably gave Knight his best advice: "In this job you'll have millions of opportunities to keep your mouth shut. Take advantage of every one of them."

Despite success and celebrity, Knight never has lost his sense of humility. The Knights, who have two sons, live in Edison Center area of Liberty City. "He could have moved to another area," says his wife, Clara, "but he chose to stay in the ghetto. The people in our neighborhood love him because he's always doing something for them."

Son of a domestic and the only black mailman in Daytona Beach, Knight followed his mother's footsteps as a graduate of Bethune Cookman College. After a tour in the Air Force, he obtained his master's degree in social work from Atlanta University and then moved to Bridgeport, Conn., for his first job.

Knight reluctantly moved to Miami in 1959; his wife was eager to return here, where she was born and reared. At that time Miami was a segregated city with few opportunities for professional blacks. Knight's first job here involved counseling at the Kendall Children's Home. Eight years later he was appointed county welfare director. The rest became history as he turned in one first-class performance after another.

In all his years as a key public servant, Knight's proudest accomplishment came with the 1977 opening of the Caleb Center in Liberty City. The facility offers one-stop service for thousands of local residents: a county court, state services, day-care facilities, a library, private-agency offices, the Black Archives, and a neighborhood auditorium. Today the center's conveniences epitomize the caring spirit of Dewey Knight.

At home, Knight enjoys family time, good food, classical music, and almost any book (he wishes that he could read a thousand words a second). He also enjoys close friends, including his favorite golfing companion, Jesse McCrary, a local attorney and former secretary of state. "Jesse's my continuous supply of spending money," Knight says.

McCrary disagrees: "Hell, he's responsible for looking out for millions of dollars of public money, but he can't even count. I was with him when he shot a hole-in-one, and he put a zero on his scorecard!"

Offering encouragement to young blacks is high on Knight's priority list. "Give your job your best shot," he tells them. "There are outlets for every interest imaginable in this community." One person who clearly is in the Dewey Knight fan club is Broward County Administrator Floyd Johnson, a fast-rising public servant who recently was a finalist in San Diego's nationwide search for a county manager. "Dewey is a person who has nationwide respect as a black administrator."

"Over the years, Knight has remained a consistently reliable, admired pubic servant. Such are hard to find in South Florida. His dedication to this community is well known and deeply admired. "We can do anything here," he says, "but we have a responsibility to give something back in return."

Dewey Knight gives something back to South Florida every day, and we're a better place for it.

NEW USDA GUIDELINES FOR CROP YIELDS UNFAIR TO FARMERS

HON. ARLAN STANGELAND

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 30, 1986

Mr. STANGELAND. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues a serious problem that exists for the farmers in their districts who produce wheat and feedgrains.

The problem lies in the way the Department of Agriculture [USDA] is proposing to determine yields for the 1986 and 1987 crops. Briefly, in 1981 only 3 years' data was needed to assign a proven program yield. But beginning in 1982, 5 years' data was required.

Thus, under the newly announced program, you would need proven yields for individual seasons as far back as 1977 and every year thereafter through 1984 to have a full set of five proven program yields for crop years 1981 through 1985.

Also, under the Department's proposed program, an average would be taken of this 5-year period, dropping the high and low yields, and the most recent actual yields entering the equation would be those from the 1984 crop which helped establish the 1985 program yield.

Some farmers relied on the past rules and began proving their yields during the period between 1981 and 1985.

For example, a farmer may have begun proving his yields for 1983, honestly believing that by 1985 he would be able to use his proven yields for his ASCS yield determinations. (It takes at least 3 years of proving yields to be assigned a proven program yield for payment purposes. Two of the required 5 years' worth of data can be the county average yields.)

Under the Department's new guidelines, this farmer would not be allowed to use these proven yields. As the rule now stands, it does not make any difference what his proven yields for individual years were, because he had not been paid on any of them yet. He was merely accumulating data toward his first proven yield program in 1986.

As the calculation now stands, for wheat, the farmers in my area stand to lose at least 10 bushels per acre in their ASCS yield calculations. This is a very serious loss given the difficult times out on the farm.

During the conference on the 1985 farm bill, it was my understanding that the intent of the yield calculation was to protect the producer's right to utilize proven yields, frozen at the current levels. Also, the yields would not increase for 1986 and 1987, but they would not be less than the 1985 program yields.

Presently, I am working to make the Department of Agriculture's yield calculations reflect the fair and actual production of our hard-working farmers. I invite my colleagues to join me in my efforts to correct this calculation before any farmer is treated in a manner that is unjust and unfair.

TRIBUTE ACCORDED KEN BRANCHEAU FOR OVER 40 YEARS OF DEDICATED SERVICE

HON. BOB CARR

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 30, 1986

Mr. CARR. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to honor a longtime resident of my home State, Mr. Kenneth W. Brancheau, of Pontiac, MI.

Ken Brancheau will close a chapter in his life which has spanned more than 40 years. As a cable splicer for Michigan Bell Telephone for almost half a century, Ken has provided an invaluable service to the residents of southeastern Michigan. The occasion of his retirement gives us the opportunity to thank Ken for his many years of dedicated service.

Ken has held many jobs in and around the city of Pontiac. Many will remember him from his work with the Madison Heights Fire Department. Others will remember him from one of the various other jobs he has held in the Pontiac community. But it is his years with the Bell Telephone that most will recall. It takes a special type of person to perform admirably in a job with uncertain hours, often with little gratitude from those he serves. This is why it is a special honor to take this opportunity to thank Ken, on behalf of the residents whom he has served but may never have known him, for the years he spent in their service.

I am sure my colleagues will agree that it is an honor and a privilege to have this opportunity to join with Ken's wife, Janavice, and their 11 children, in adding our congratulations and best wishes as he begins a new chapter in his life.

THREE HIGH SCHOOLS OF SIXTH DISTRICT OF NORTH CAROLINA WON STATE FOOTBALL TITLES

HON. HOWARD COBLE

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 30, 1986

Mr. COBLE. Mr. Speaker, the Sixth District of North Carolina is blessed in many ways. The three counties which make up the Sixth District are rich in history and natural beauty. The citizens who live in Alamance, Davidson, and Guilford Counties are justifiably proud of their counties, and so am I. Now, there is another reason for all of us who live in the Sixth District to be proud.

On December 13, 1985, a school from each county won a North Carolina State high school football title. Schools from Alamance, Davidson, and Guilford Counties won separate titles in three different classifications. How many other congressional districts can boast that three different high schools won statewide football crowns in the same season? The Sixth District surely can.

In the State's 4-A high school football championship, Walter Hines Page High School of Greensboro defeated Fayetteville Sanford 26-20 when Wayne Brame picked up a blocked field goal attempt with 7 seconds remaining and ran 75 yards for the winning score. It was the third straight statewide title and the 35th consecutive game without a loss for the Pirates. Congratulations are in order to Page High School Principal Robert Clendenin, Pirates' football coach Marion Kirby, the faculty and staff, and students of Page High School for their outstanding victory.

In the 3-A title game, Walter M. Williams High School of Burlington defeated Forest Hills High School in a defensive struggle 7-3. It was the Bulldogs' third State crown in six seasons. In the only touchdown of the game, quarterback Robert Ward connected with Mike Faucette on a 70-yard pass play with ony 8 minutes left in the game. The people of Alamance County can be proud of the winning effort displayed by Principal Clinton Legette, football coach Sam Story, the faculty and staff, and the students of Williams High School. It takes a combined effort to produce a winner, and at Williams, that effort has paid off.

Davidson County is the home of this year's 2-A State high school football champions. Lexington High School used its potent wishbone attack to roll over previously unbeaten Fuquay-Varina 42-12. The Yellow Jackets were led by halfback Ronnie Beverly, who ran for 209 yards and one touchdown, and fullback Joe Littlejohn who scored four touchdowns while piling up 148 yards.

Lexington High School completed an outstanding season by winning the 2-A football title, thanks to the support of Principal Johnny Phillips, coach Gary Whitman, the faculty and staff, and the students of Lexington High.

The Sixth District of North Carolina is known for many reasons throughout the State. It is home of High Point, the furniture capital of the world. It is known as one of the Nation's leading producers of quality textiles and apparel, and boats, as well, one of the Nation's most modern cigarette manufacturing facilites. It is also known for the quality of the hard-working people who live there.

After December 13, 1985, the Sixth District of North Carolina became known for another reason. It is now the place where champions live. Congratulations to Page, Williams, and Lexington High Schools for their football championships. Now, bring on the basketball season.

A LITTLE KNOWN DISEASE

HON. STEWART B. McKINNEY

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 30, 1986

Mr. McKINNEY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct attention to a serious, though little known, national illness. I am referring to chronic Epstein-Barr virus infection (CEBV).

Those afflicted with this illness are unable to perform basic daily tasks, such as going to the grocery store. They often are unable to work—even part time. Minimal physical exertion actually worsens the symptoms.

The most distressing aspect of CEBV is that so little is known about it. Many physicians are not familiar with it, thus it is not uncommon for people struck by CEBV to be misdiagnosed.

I am pleased to say that CEBV research has been federally funded through the National Institutes of Health's Institute of Allergies and Infectious Diseases for the past few years. However, a great deal of work still must be accomplished before an effective treatment is formulated.

Fellow Members, I urge your continued support of federally funded research into chronic Epstein-Barr virus infection.

NUCLEAR WASTE

HON. BILL HENDON

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 30, 1986

Mr. HENDON. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing legislation which many of us in Western North Carolina feel is necessary to carry out the original intent of Congress when it approved the Nuclear Waste Policy Act of 1982.

My bill, the Nuclear Waste Policy Improvement Act of 1986, will effectively provide for regional balance in the national effort to safely and permanently store high-level radioactive nuclear waste.

As you all know, the Department of Energy last week announced its intention to continue studying 12 sites in the eastern part of the country for possible location of a second permanent repository. In addition to its efforts to locate and build a second nuclear waste dump, the Energy Department is developing plans for a monitored retrievable storage [MRS] facility which it feels could process, package, and temporarily store high-level nuclear waste. The Department has picked a preferred site and two alternates in Tennessee for the MRS.

The 1982 Nuclear Waste Policy Act, now codified in title 42 of the United States Code, stresses the critical importance of regional balance in the management of nuclear waste. When the 1982 law was working its way through Congress, the Senate Committees on Energy and Natural Resources and Environment and Public Works prepared a report which clearly stated that "no single State or region of the country will bear the full burden of civilian nuclear waste disposal." As approved by Congress, the 1982 law specifically prohibits location of the MRS facility and a permanent repository in the same State—obviously an effort to spread the burden of nuclear waste disposal around.

My legislation, Mr. Speaker, further clarifies this important protection for public health and safety by prohibiting the Energy Department from building a permanent repository for nuclear waste within 400 miles of an approved MRS facility.

An arbitrary State boundary is not sufficient to implement the important goal of regional balance with regard to management of nuclear waste.

TEL-MED PROGRAM

HON. JOHN G. ROWLAND

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 30, 1986

Mr. ROWLAND of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, I wish to inform my colleagues about the Tel-Med Program, a public service which provides recorded health information over the phone at no cost to listeners.

Tel-Med was founded in 1972 in San Bernadino, CA, by a group of doctors, nurses, and nutritionists who saw a need to increase public awareness of illness as a first step toward practicing preventative medicine. Since its inception, this program has grown to include 360 branches in virtually every State and many foreign countries. Last year a total of 725 million people benefited from this service world-wide. In Waterbury, CT, the largest city in the Fifth Congressional District, a total of 36,469 residents took advantage of this service last year alone and many more are expected to benefit from the program in the future.

Each Tel-Med is completely autonomous. Sponsors are responsible for administration and selection of the scope and selection of the topics made available to the public. They are also solely responsible for raising the moneys needed to keep the program in operation. As such, it is vitally important that we increase public awareness with the hope that we will also increase public support.

I am presently involved in promoting the Tel-Med Program in my district and would urge my colleagues to join me so that together we can spread the message nationwide. I can think of no better service that we, as Members of Congress, can provide than to promote the health and well-being of our constituency.

BONNIE STRICKLAND, NEW PRESIDENT OF THE AMERICAN PSYCHOLOGICAL ASSOCIATION

HON. SILVIO O. CONTE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 30, 1986

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, this week marks the midwinter meeting of the American Psychological Association's council of representatives at which time Bonnie Strickland, Ph.D., will become president-elect of the 76,000 member association.

Dr. Strickland is a clinical psychologist and a professor of psychology at the University of Massachusetts in Amherst, MA. As the 95th president of APA, Dr. Strickland joins a line of distinguished psychologists to undertake this leadership role, extending back to G. Stanley Hall, William James, and John Dewey at the turn of the last century. She will be the seventh woman to hold the office.

A leader in gender and health research, Dr. Strickland has been particularly interested in the interrelationship of health and behavior. According to Dr. Strickland, today's discoveries of how behavioral factors influence disease and premature death are as important for us as was the identification of bacterial and viral causes of infectious disease for earlier generations. Much of Dr. Strickland's research, practice, and writing has also centered on women's health and on gender differences in health, illness, and mortality.

Dr. Strickland is also vitally concerned with women's and minority issues. She has said that she hopes that psychology "can be a model of how we can include all of the diverse interests of those who have not had a strong voice in the past."

Dr. Strickland has been Chair of the psychology department and associate to the chancellor at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst. She is a member of the National Advisory Mental Health Council and a diplomate of the American Board of Professional Psychology. She has been Chair of the Council of Graduate Departments of Psychology and APA's Board of Professional Affairs. She is currently Chair of APA's Policy and Planning Board, which oversees the professional, scientific, and educational programs of the association. She is a former president of the Clinical Psychology Division of APA and is a fellow of the divisions of clinical psychology, social psychology of women, and health psychology, and serves on the editorial board of five professional journals.

APA is the major organization representing psychology in the United States and is the world's largest association of psychologists. Its membership includes more than 60,000 clinicians, college and university professors, researchers, and consultants and about 20,000 high school teachers and students and foreign affiliates. The association publishes Psychology Today, the American Psychologist, and 18 specialized journals. Through its divisions in 42 subfields of psychology and affiliations with 53 State and Canadian provincial psychological associations, APA works to advance psychology as a science, a profession, and as a means of promoting human welfare.

It has been my honor and privilege to work closely with Dr. Strickland in matters of legislative concern to the field of psychology, including funding for mental health research and biomedical research in general, as well as assuring a role for behavioral research within these activities.

In addition, we have worked closely together over the past several years to provide continued funding for mental health clinical training, in order to help meet demonstrated professional shortages in such areas as the treatment of children, the aging, and rural populations, and to encourage minorities under-represented in the profession. And we have worked to assure a balanced distribution of those clinical training funds among the disciplines eligible for such funding.

Dr. Strickland is a strong and dedicated leader in her field. She has never hesitated to speak up on behalf of those who might not otherwise be heard, and she has used her energies to move the field of psychology forward in a most progressive way. I was very proud when Dr. Strickland received her appointment a couple of years ago to the National Advisory Mental Health Council, which oversees the National Institute of Mental Health, and I am just as proud to see her take over the reins of the American Psychological Association. Massachusetts, even if it is her adopted home, can claim another national leader among its citizens, and the APA can be congratulated on electing as talented and as worthy a President as Dr. Bonnie Strickland.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Monday, February 3, 1986

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James David Ford, D.D., offered the following prayer:

We pray, O God, for the people who labor in this place, for staff and for the Members of this assembly. May they see in what they do a holy calling, the opportunities for contributing to justice and to the common good. Bless them, O God, and listen to the secret petitions of their hearts and minister to them in the depths of their being. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Pursuant to clause 1, rule I, the Journal stands approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Sparrow, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill of the House of the following title:

H.R. 4027. An act extending the waiver authority of the District of Columbia Revenue Bond Act of 1985 to certain revenue bond acts of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 2036. An act to make certain technical corrections to amendments made by the Food Security Act of 1985, and for other purposes.

CRISIS FOR THE HOMELESS

(Mr. VENTO asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Speaker, CBS "60 Minutes" program last night, February 2, 1986, telecast reporter/investigator Ed Bradley's review of problems with the New York City homeless program and how outrageously and inappropriately Federal and local dollars are being spent. This is a direct result of the administration policy with no dollars for repair, no dollars for modernization, just pay the money for the slum landlord without any standards.

This should be all the reminder that Congress needs to increase, correct the abuse, and refocus the tax dollars available. There simply isn't enough housing to meet the needs of sheltering low-income people today. The emergency shelter programs for the homeless which have been provided are certainly not an adequate answer to the continued cutbacks of the Federal Housing Program for the poor. The Reagan administration has advanced these housing cuts for the poor in spite of the increasing number of homeless and increased need and demand for housing the low-income poor.

In 1981 the National Government initiated over 300,000 units of new housing. Today in 1986 the Congress provided less than 100,000 units of new housing. The Reagan administration sought a moratorium in the 1986 budget and seeks the same in fiscal year 1987. In fact, President Reagan, incredible as it may seem, seeks to rescind or defer most of the 1986 housing units that are currently appropriated.

The American people and surely many in the U.S. Congress are concerned about the homeless and the plight of those reported by this startling CBS telecast, but we haven't seen anything yet. This sad report of our Nation's homeless is about to turn into a national housing crisis, a disgraceful return to shanty towns and shacks that only exist in history books for most U.S. citizens or the urban poor of the Third World nations, squatting in some corner next to opulence and indifference.

Mr. Speaker, this surely cannot be permitted to occur. Meeting the shelter needs of our people will take the combined effort of National, State, and local governments as well as the private sector, especially the nonprofit groups. We cannot permit this sad page in history to be repeated; housing is fundamental to the basic human needs and we as a national government have a key role to ensure its availability.

ALL 10 MOONS OF URANUS MAY BE NAMED FOR ASTRONAUTS

(Mr. McCANDLESS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. McCANDLESS. Mr. Speaker, last week, after the space shuttle Challenger disaster, our colleague, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. NELSON] suggested that it would be appropriate to name 7 of the 10 newly discovered moons of the planet Uranus after the members of the Challenger's crew. As the moons were discovered by a product of our space program, a program for which the crew gave their lives, I thought that Mr. NELSON's idea was an excellent one and one that I strongly support.

In the wake of this tragedy, we have been reminded that 19 years earlier, almost to the day, three other brave American astronauts died in a launch pad fire during a training exercise for the first Apollo mission. One of my constituents, Teresa Seipel, of Riverside, CA, suggested that we name the remaining three newly discovered moons after Gus Grissom, Ed White, and Roger Chaffee, the three astronauts who perished in the 1967 fire. I believe that, too, is an excellent idea and today I am introducing legislation for that purpose. I invite my colleagues to cosponsor this fitting memorial.

BREAK WITH LIBYA DEMONSTRATES LEADERSHIP IN ANTI-TERRORISM

(Mr. BONIOR of Michigan asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, the civilized world has become increasingly alarmed and outraged by the threat of terrorism. The terrorist obeys no rules of law, shows no respect for the lives of the innocent.

Any government that would provide protection and encouragement to such villians must be severely sanctioned by the international community. President Reagan has taken decisive leadership in making a complete break in economic relations with the Government of Libya.

We all know this will not be enough, but it is a step toward the forceful policy we need.

The President deserves the support not only of the American people but of all nations. Qadhafi and his kind must know that their actions have made them outcasts and outlaws in the eyes of the world.

DEMOCRATS MEET AT THE GREENBRIER, REPUBLICANS IN BALTIMORE

(Mr. BLILEY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BLILEY. Mr. Speaker, when I was a Democrat, Democrats were the party of the working people. Republicans were elitist, country clubbers with no ideas or initiatives except those ideas and initiatives beneficial to their special interest—the wealthy. This past weekend is a perfect example of how times have changed and the tables have turned.

Republicans were in Baltimore. Baltimore is a working-class town with a strong ethnic tradition. We were there to percolate all sorts of new ideas and initiatives. Gramm/Rudman has changed government dramatically and Republicans are determined to make it a change for the better.

It was the Democrats who chose the country club environment of the Greenbrier. It was the Democrats who had no new ideas or initiatives. Instead, it was the same old song—raise taxes from the American family, use that revenue to fill up the Government trough and invite the special interests over for a feast.

I hope Americans take note of this past weekend. There are two ways to the promised land of a balanced budget. The Democrats will raise taxes and cut defense. Republicans will privatize, reform, and set priorities.

My values haven't changed but my party affiliation has, like I said, I used to be a Democrat, and the reasons for my change are very clear.

THEME OF DEMOCRATIC CONFERENCE IS PROFAMILY AND PROWORKING CLASS

(Ms. OAKAR asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, I was not going to take the floor to talk about the issues conference that the Democratic majority had at the Greenbrier in West Virginia, a State that has double-digit unemployment—no thanks to the other side of the aisle and the President's policies—but I cannot allow that kind of an attack to take place without talking a little about our conference.

In contrast to the conference that my colleagues on the other side of the aisle had, we were there the entire weekend, but I understood they had 30 Members who showed up and they left at 3 o'clock. We not only invited all the Members, of whom 110 Democratic Members who were trying to address the problems of this Nation showed up, but we invited the Members' families, and there were 106 children who also showed up accompanied by their mothers and fathers.

We are a party that believes in including the families of the Members, and we needed a place that would accommodate families and children. So I think that it is kind of a cheap shot to attack our conference in that way. I feel very strongly that the Democratic Party, being a profamily party, is proud of where it went. We feel a commitment to the State of West Virginia, just as we do to the working class, and the public knows that we are a party of the working class, not a party of the rich.

REQUIEM

(Mr. STRANG asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. STRANG. Mr. Speaker, like so many of us, I have been searching for the appropriate way to express the sorrow I feel—and those whom I serve—for the sacrifice of the Challenger 7. At a town meeting last Saturday in Pueblo, CO, a high school student approached me and asked if he could read to the meeting a poem he had written in memory of the astronauts. Brad Ritter, an 18-year-old senior at Central High, read his poem, entitled "Requiem," and we were all moved. Here is what he wrote:

REQUIEM

(JANUARY 28, 1986)

I saw them shining in the sky, and I wished that I could touch them.
Once,
to touch the stars.
And so I reached to them,
high above the dreams
I had dreamt—
for this was the greatest dream of my heart.
. . . and I did touch the stars.
I took them,
and held them,
. . . and I never let them go.
Do not look upon my life,
and call it tragedy,
For I died not in vain;
I took the reins of my wildest dream,
and rode it to the stars.
Remember me not as one who stood and died alone and for nothing, attempting the impossible. . .
but remember us—
all of us who have died this day—
As dreamers who lived and died for their dream. . .
. . . and won it . . .
And no matter the cost,
never be afraid to dream. . .

INTERNATIONAL TERRORISM

(Mr. CLINGER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. CLINGER. Mr. Speaker, how many more innocents must be brutally murdered before we, as a nation, and civilized people everywhere draw together to combat the threat of terrorist violence? It will take a concerted cooperative effort of actions, not just words, to stop this incessant threat.

This past Saturday, February 1, the United States took another step in battling the criminal networks of international terrorism. The final stages of President Reagan's sanctions against Mu'ammar Qadhafi's outlaw regime in Libya went into effect. These sanctions prohibit U.S. citizens and corporations from transacting business with Qadhafi's Libya. Tough criminal penalties are now the price for doing business with Qadhafi's terrorist haven.

Mr. Speaker, the senseless deaths in Rome last December and our Government's sanctions in response should have been enough for most Americans who enjoy the benefits of peace and freedom to cut the ties of commerce with Qadhafi—the barbaric exporter of terror.

But it apparently is not. Like many Americans, I was shocked last week to hear reports that four U.S. oil companies were looking for ways to circumvent the Libyan boycott. Amerada Hess, Conoco, Marathon, and Occidental were reported to have transferred their share of Libyan oil production to various non-American firms and were examining ways of continuing to operate their installations in Libya. This would negate the intended effects of the sanctions and prevent the punishment they were intended to inflict on the Qadhafi regime. There is no doubt that fully complying with the sanctions would be of some cost to these corporations, but if we are to stand up and say "Enough" to criminals who threaten the lives of innocents, we must all pay a price. I submit that the financial cost is far less than the life of one unsuspecting bystander at an airline counter.

When I learned of the apparent hesitation of these U.S. firms to comply with the sanctions, I immediately contacted them to urge their swift and complete cooperation. Americans must stand in steadfast opposition to the outrageous actions of terrorist violence and the burden must fall on corporations and individuals alike.

Mr. Speaker, I include here my letter to these four oil companies for insertion in the RECORD and I hope it will persuade these and other corporations to isolate Qadhafi's Libya wherever the arms of American commerce extend.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, DC, January 31, 1986.

GENTLEMEN: The spectre of international terrorism looms greater and greater over the free world and over United States nationals particularly, throughout the world. Your apparent reluctance to comply with the President's sanctions against Muammar Quaddafi's Libya is shocking and of serious concern to all Americans who abhor the Quaddafi regime's support of criminal international terrorists.

The alleged transfer of your share of Libyan oil production to oil companies of other nations would negate the intended effects of U.S. sanctions by allowing Libya to maintain its oil output of approximately 1.2 million barrels per day. In imposing the sanctions, President Reagan noted that "Americans will not understand other nations moving into Libya to take commercial advantage of our departure." Even more, Americans will not understand U.S. companies making it easier for other nations to do so. Though such transactions may not violate the letter of the Libyan sanctions, they do violence to the spirit and to the intended punishment of Libya's outlaw regime.

In addition, I would urge swift and complete divestment of your Libyan operations. Though there is no doubt of your duty to stockholders for the value of Libyan assets, I would note that the decline of oil prices and the increasingly high risk of doing business with Quaddafi's Libya militate in favor of cutting losses and pulling out now. Do not mistake the resolve of Congress and the Administration to enforce the latest round of sanctions against Libya.

As Americans who enjoy the individual and institutional freedoms of a free society, we cannot afford to carry on business as usual with those who seek to disrupt and destroy those freedoms. You are now in the spotlight of world opinion and I urge you to take immediate and responsible action to terminate your dealings with Libya.

Sincerely,

WILLIAM F. CLINGER, Jr.,
Member of Congress.

STUDENTS SUPPORT SMOKELESS TOBACCO BILL

(Mr. SILJANDER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SILJANDER. Mr. Speaker, many people assume that writing letters is a futile effort in attempting to gain the attention of their Members of Congress. It is not so, when Coloma Junior High School, 60 students wrote to me regarding smokeless tobacco and the need to support a bill that they thought was very important. After speaking with all 60 of them, I now am a cosponsor of a bill which is on the floor today.

The bill develops educational programs and public service announcements. It encourages States to adopt a minimum age for the purchase of smokeless tobacco. It requires smokeless tobacco products to carry a warning label and, last, makes unlawful to advertise on television or radio.

This is a bill that begins a step forward in educating the American people.

I want to thank the 60 junior high school students at Coloma Junior High School for bringing this bill to my attention and I hope the rest of the Members of this body will realize the importance of supporting this bill today.

INVITATION TO ATTEND PRESENTATION OF SYMBOLIC FIRST COPY OF BIBLIOGRAPHY OF SPEAKERS OF THE HOUSE

(Mr. FRENZEL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, for the Capitol Historical Society, the distinguished gentleman from Texas, Mr. JAKE PICKLE, and I invite all the Members of the House of Representatives to a special event on February 5, Wednesday, at 1:30 p.m. in the Rayburn Room. The Capitol Historical Society has finally completed its bibliography of all the Speakers of the House. This has been a glaring hole in some of the historical data about the House. It has recently been completed through the resources and under the aegis of the society.

The first copy, the symbolic first copy, will be presented to the current Speaker, THOMAS P. O'NEILL of Massachusetts.

We hope that you will attend and that you will get a better idea of some of the things the society is doing for the Capitol and the historical remembrances of what has taken place here.

THE CRISIS IN HAITI

(Mr. RICHARDSON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, a familiar story this weekend has hit the news. A corrupt dictator, bogus elections, theft, massive corruption, peasants that do not have a chance for bread and the daily life; no, it is not the Philippines, it is Haiti.

Mr. Speaker, the situation in Haiti is reaching crisis proportions, but I do think the Congress has acted properly in the past by imposing economic and military conditions to improve human rights in Haiti. We must use these levers constructively. We must try to pave a way for a democratic transition.

In this case, however, there are no Communists. There is corruption versus poverty.

I hope that the Congress continues to monitor the situation, as it has in the past. I know through the leadership of the Foreign Affairs Committee, this will continue.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER

The SPEAKER. Pursuant to the provisions of clause 5 of rule I, the Chair announces that he will postpone further proceedings today on each motion to suspend the rules on which a recorded vote or the yeas and nays are ordered, or on which the vote is objected to under clause 4 of rule XV.

Such rollcall votes, if postponed, will be taken on Tuesday, February 4, 1986.

(d) Section 63 of the Arms Export Control Act is amended—

(A) by striking out "adoption of concurrent resolutions" and inserting in lieu thereof "enactment of joint resolutions"; and

(B) by striking out "such resolution" and inserting in lieu thereof "such joint resolution".

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MOAKLEY). Pursuant to the rule, a second is not required on this motion.

The gentleman from Florida [Mr. FASCELL] will be recognized for 20 minutes and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROOMFIELD] will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Florida [Mr. FASCELL].

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the Senate bill now under consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of S. 1831. At the outset I would like to commend the gentleman from California, Mr. [LEVINE], who has an identical bill, H.R. 3875, pending before the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and has asked for passage of the companion Senate bill.

S. 1831 is a technical measure which provides for joint rather than concurrent resolutions of disapproval for third-country arms transfers, government-to-government and commercial arms sales, and leases of defense articles required to be notified to Congress under the Arms Export Control Act. This action has become necessary in light of the Supreme Court decision Chadha versus INS, which struck down the constitionality of legislative vetoes.

S. 1831 also applies the expedited procedure provisions of existing law for consideration in the Senate to joint rather than concurrent resolutions of disapproval for arms sales.

Mr. Speaker, this legislation is a legislative fix to the concurrent resolutions of disapproval that have been rendered unconstitutional by the Chadha decision. It makes no other substantive changes in the congressional review period for arms sales, nor is it aimed at any particular sale. It only provides for expedited procedures for consideration of unconditional joint resolutions of disapproval. Mr. Speaker, this resolution received unanimous approval in the Senate and is supported by the ranking minority member, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROOMFIELD]

I urge the adoption of S. 1831.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I support the legislation before us.

According to the Arms Export Control Act, letters of offer for major U.S. arms sales cannot be issued if the Congress adopts a concurrent resolution objecting to the sale during its review period. However, these legislative veto provisions have been considered to be unconsitutional in light of the Supreme Court's Chadha decision. By substituting joint resolutions for concurrent resolutions, this legislation allows the Congress to again be more involved in arms transfer policy.

As a result, I urge my colleagues to support the bill.

Mr. LEVINE of California. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of S. 1831 to provide for expedited procedure of joint resolutions of disapproval introduced pursuant to section 36(b) of the Arms Export Control Act. This bill, which was passed by the Senate in December, is identical to legislation I introduced on December 6 and which has 21 House cosponsors.

Mr. Speaker, the AECA provides for expedited procedures for concurrent resolutions. However, since the 1983 Supreme Court Chadha decision, which declared the legislative veto unconstitutional, Congress has employed joint resolutions of disapproval to oppose particular arms sales. While concurrent resolutions are subject to expedited procedure, joint resolutions are not. This is not a special problem in the House because the Rules Committee can bring to the floor legislation in an expedited manner. However, there is a problem in the Senate because there is no Rules Committee and consideration of important joint resolutions related to arms sales can be subject to delay through filibuster.

This legislation would clarify and tighten procedural safeguards to ensure that the Senate can act in a timely manner, and includes expedited procedures for resolutions introduced pursuant to the AECA which effect leasing and private arms transfers as well.

This is a reasonable bill which would enable both bodies to act in a responsible, timely fashion on a very important matter. I urge its passage.

Ms. MIKULSKI. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise in support of S. 1831, the Arms Export Control Act Amendments.

This legislation could not have come at a more appropriate time. As you know, last November Congress suspended the administrations' proposed sale of $1.9 billion in weapons to Jordan. Now, hoping to salvage two victories from one defeat, the Reagan administration proposes to sell advanced weapons to both Saudi Arabia and Jordan.

Arms sales to Middle East nations encounter intense opposition from Congress not because of negative feelings toward Arab States, but because of appreciation for the positive role that Israel plays for the United States in that volatile region of the world.

Israel is a crucial actor for the United States in the Middle East. Tel Aviv offers the only stable, democratically elected government that reflects American values in the region. To jeopardize the security of Israel with excessive arms sales to hostile neighboring states is to undermine any hopes of achieving a lasting peace in the Middle East. Every policy must have a solid base and for the United States, Israel provides the needed foundation in the Middle East.

History does not offer an encouraging precedent for American arms sales to Middle East regimes. Providing sophisticated armaments to the Shah of Iran in an effort to develop his country into the "Policeman of the Persian Gulf" has made that nation a sworn enemy of the United States. In addition, advanced American weapons such as the F-14 fighter plane and long-range Pheonix air-to-air missile that were provided to Iran are now reported by intelligence sources to be in Soviet hands, allowing Moscow a firsthand look at several of our front-line armaments. If the F-15 warplanes and AWAC's previously sold to Saudi Arabia were to be lost, the Soviet Union would enjoy an intelligence bonanza and Western security would be gravely damaged. The American technicians and support personnel that accompany U.S.-made weapons to dangerous lands are easy hostages for terrorists groups.

There is no logical reason to sell Saudi Arabia and Jordan additional weapons. Each nation has ample resources to deal with any domestic uprising and the major external threats of Iran and Syria are bogged down in other conflicts. If United States weapons are provided to Saudi Arabia and Jordan, the probable target for their usage in a future conflict will not be Iran or Syria, rather Israel as it has been in previous wars. Once in the control of the purchasing state, weapons are used however that country's leaders see fit, regardless of the seller's protests.

Saudi Arabia already has more weapons that it can use and spends more per soldier than any other nation in the world. Armaments purchased by Saudi Arabia supply other Arab States, many that directly threaten Israel. British-supplied Centurion tanks allowed Jordanian armored units to punch through Israeli lines during the 1973 Yom Kippur War and threaten the Golan Heights. Under present conditions, there is no reason to assume that Saudi Arabia and Jordan adopt a neutral or pro-Israeli posture in future conflicts. If Saudi Arabia and Jordan desire to receive the benefits of American aid as Egypt does, then let each sign and adhere to a peace treaty with Israel, recognize its right to exist, and refrain from arming Israel's avowed enemies.

The proposed arms to sales to Saudi Arabia and Jordan total more than the annual military aid the United States provides Israel. Yet neither state provides a fraction of the value Israel does to the United States. If American forces go to war in the Middle East, it will be the Israeli Air Force that provides cover and the use of its bases. Units of the Rapid Deployment Force will find Israeli bases strategically located and the most secure, politically and militarily. No other bases in the region under consideration or contract for use by the United States have these features.

This legislation is critical to ensure the role of Congress in foreign policy and in controlling our arms sales policy. I urge my colleagues here in the House to join me in supporting this vital legislation.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. FASCELL] that the House suspend the rules and pass the Senate bill, S. 1831.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof)

the rules were suspended and the Senate bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

COMPREHENSIVE SMOKELESS TOBACCO HEALTH EDUCATION ACT OF 1986

Mr. BLILEY. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. the gentleman from California [Mr. WAXMAN] will be recognized for 20 minutes and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLILEY] will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California [Mr. WAXMAN].

Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks, and to include extraneous material, on the Senate bill now under consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of Mr. DINGELL, Mr. SYNAR and myself, I am pleased to present a legislative proposal to the House that responds to concerns about the adverse health effects of using smokeless tobacco and the growing use of this product by young people. The legislation is the result of a lengthy negotiations between representatives of the public health community, smokeless tobacco industry and Members of the House and Senate.

Mr. Speaker, the legislation represents a carefully crafted compromise between provisions of H.R. 3510, currently pending before the Energy and Commerce Committee, and S. 1574, which passed the Senate on December 16. These proposals demonstrate broad concern in the Congress and the public about the adverse health effects of smokeless tobacco. Although the Committee on Energy and Commerce was prepared to formally report the compromise legislation, the pending actions of several State legislatures to enact potentially conflicting labelling requirements require swift, preemptive action by the Congress.

Support for the legislation is broad. It enjoys the support of organizations such as the American Cancer Society, American Heart Association, American Lung Association and American Dental Association as well as the members of the smokeless tobacco industry. At this point I would like to place in the RECORD letters of support for the legislation from the Coalition on Smoking or Health and the Smokeless Tobacco Council.

SMOKELESS TOBACCO COUNCIL, INC.,
January 27, 1986, Washington, DC.

Re Comprehensive Smokeless Tobacco and Health Education Act.

Hon. HENRY A. WAXMAN,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Health and the Environment, Committee on Energy & Commerce. U.S. House of Representatives, Washington, DC.

DEAR CHAIRMAN WAXMAN: You will recall that I appeared before your Subcommittee on July 26, 1985, to express the position of the smokeless tobacco manufacturers regarding proposed federal legislation concerning the labeling of smokeless tobacco products. I advised you that it was the position of the smokeless tobacco manufacturers that health warnings relating to their products were unwarranted in view of the unresolved scientific controversy regarding smokeless tobacco and health. The position of the smokeless tobacco manufacturers on this issue has not changed.

I also advised you, however, that the smokeless tobacco manufactureres recognized that when an issue is raised with respect to a product such as smokeless tobacco which is marketed and used nationwide, it is an issue that should be resolved at the Federal level. I further stated that if there were to be warning labels on smokeless tobacco products, a nationally uniform labeling program was essential in order to avoid the myriad of problems attendant with warning labels promulgated by various state legislatures or federal or state agencies. The position of the smokeless tobacco manufacturers on this issue is also unchanged.

We recognize the difficulty in meeting the often disparate needs of the various groups interested in legislation as important as this, and we believe the Amendment to S. 1574 which you sought to offer in the House on December 19, 1985, addressed many of the serious concerns of the smokeless tobacco manufacturers.

Consistent with the foregoing, if it is the will of Congress that there be Federal legislation on this subject, then we believe that your Amendment is the appropriate method to resolve the smokeless tobacco labeling issue on a national, uniform basis. The smokeless tobacco manufacturers will support this effort.

Respectfully yours,
MICHAEL J. KERRIGAN,
President.

COALITION URGES PASSAGE OF SMOKELESS TOBACCO EDUCATION ACT

On Tuesday, January 28, 1986, you will be asked to vote on an amendment in the nature of substitute to S. 1574, "The Comprehensive Smokeless Tobacco and Education Act of 1985." The amendment will be offered by Representatives HENRY WAXMAN and MIKE SYNAR. This bill represents the successful culmination of months of careful negotiation between all parties directly affected and is supported by both the Coalition on Smoking OR Health and the Smokeless Tobacco Industry.

The Coalition on Smoking OR Health and its member organizations, the American Cancer Society, the American Lung Association, and the American Heart Association urge you to vote for this compromise bill without amendments. It must be stressed that any amendments will destroy the carefully crafted compromise.

Mr. Speaker, on July 26, 1985, the Subcommittee on Health and the Environment conducted a hearing on the health effects of smokeless tobacco. Scientists representing the National Cancer Institute, the American Dental Association, the American Cancer Society and the American Academy of Otolaryngology—Head and Neck Surgery testified to the fact that these products can cause life-threatening diseases of the mouth and oral cavity. In addition, the hearing documented an alarming increase in the use of smokeless tobacco by young people.

We also heard chilling testimony from the mother of a young high school track star. Betty Ann Marsee told of her son's courageous struggle against mouth cancer caused by his use and addiction to smokeless tobacco. Until Sean Marsee's cancer was diagnosed, he, like many young people today, didn't believe smokeless tobacco could be harmful. He believed there could be little harm from a product promoted by athletes, advertised on television and sold without a health warning.

Mrs. Marsee's testimony underscores public concern over the increased use of smokeless tobacco in our primary and secondary schools. Surveys conducted in the State of Texas discovered that 88 percent of the users of smokeless tobacco began before the age of 15. In a statewide study of Oklahoma students, 13 percent of third grade males, and 22 percent of fifth grade males used smokeless tobacco. Among 11th grade males, the study found that 39 percent used smokeless tobacco. These figures contrast sharply with the lower incidence of smoking among these same age groups. The increased use by young people of a product known to be a cause of cancer presents a serious risk to public health.

The efforts by manufacturers to promote the sale of smokeless tobacco to youth have been aggressive, sophisticated and successful. Through the use of television and radio, the smokeless tobacco industy has developed advertising themes and promoted celebrity spokesmen with special appeal to young people. These efforts have opened up the Nation's secondary schools as a major and growing market for smokeless tobacco products.

Mr. Speaker, smokeless tobacco is not a safe alternative to cigarettes. It is not another version of bubble gum. Smokeless tobacco products, like cigarettes, are inherently dangerous products. They should not be sold to children and should not be advertised on television or radio.

To date, State and local efforts to place restrictions on the sale of smokeless tobacco have been insufficient to restrict the availability of these products to young people or to educate the public about the dangers of smokeless tobacco use.

Less than half the States have enacted laws to prohibit the sale of smokeless tobacco to those under 18 years of age. Although an estimated 26 State legislatures are expected to consider legislation requiring warnings on smokeless tobacco products in 1986, only the State of Massachusetts has completed action. The Massachusetts label requirement will take effect on April 1, 1986, but will not apply to advertising and only affects tobacco snuff.

Swift enactment of Federal legislation at this time will assure a more timely and comprehensive dissemination of health information. States will continue to be free to restrict smokeless tobacco sales to those 18 and over; consider the need for a State smokeless tobacco excise tax to finance health education efforts in the schools; and prohibit or restrict promotion practices such as the free distribution of smokeless tobacco samples.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to briefly elaborate on the major provisions of the legislation.

The purpose of the legislation is to make the public aware of the adverse health consequences of using smokeless tobacco products. The bill provides a comprehensive public health strategy including the random display of three health warning labels on smokeless tobacco packages and advertising; the development of Federal and State educational activities; and a prohibition on TV and radio advertising.

The warning labels required by section 3 of the bill state the following:

First. Warning: This Product May Cause Mouth Cancer.

Second. Warning: This Product May Cause Gum Disease and Tooth Loss.

Third. Warning: This Product Is Not a Safe Alternative to Cigarettes.

The warning statements will be displayed randomly on smokeless tobacco packages in accordance with regulations promulgated by the FTC and a plan submitted by the manufacturer and approved by the FTC. An approved plan must provide for the display of the warning statements an approximately equal number of times during each 12-month period and that the warnings will be randomly distributed in all parts of the United States in which the product is marketed.

Section 3(b)(1)(A) of the legislation requires that the warnings be located "in a conspicuous and prominent place on the package . . ." Smokeless tobacco products come in a variety of sizes ranging from circular cans to paper pouches. In issuing regulations under this section, the FTC should be sensitive to differences in packaging. For example, it may be possible to place a warning on the top of a smokeless tobacco can but it may not be possible on a pouch which may not have an identifiable top. It is not intended that regulations require conformity in package shape or material. Rather, it is intended that regulations assure that the placement of the warning on different package styles reflect a conspicuous and prominent place relative to the respective package style. The location and size of the warning on smokeless tobacco packages will vary due to the variety of package styles currently in use. The FTC will determine the format for displaying the waring statements on smokeless tobacco packages.

Mr. Speaker, section 3(b)(2)(B) of the legislation requires manufacturers to display the three warning statements on advertising in a circle and arrow format. In developing this proposal the Congress recognized that a major deficiency of warning statements is that few people notice or read them. The circle and arrow format was selected to display the warnings in smokeless tobacco advertising because studies conducted by the Federal Trade Commission staff in 1981 concluded that this format significantly improved the visibility and effectiveness of warning statements. In fact, the circle and arrow format was found ". . . superior to all other shapes . . . in prompting mentions of the contents of warning messages." Overall, the circle and arrow format was determined to be significantly more effective in disseminating information than the rectangle format that has been used for warnings on cigarettes.

In implementing this authority, it will be necessary for the Federal Trade Commission to issue regulations utilizing a concept of proportionality. Such regulations must take into account that the size of the format and corresponding size of warning letters will necessarily vary depending upon the variety and size of the advertising to which they will apply. For example, the format on a single page advertisement in a magazine such as Time will be smaller than in a two-page advertisement in the same magazine. The format on a full page in a newspaper such as the Washington Post will be larger than the format that might appear on a matchbook or leaflet promotion.

With one exception, all advertising of smokeless tobacco is required to display one of the three health warnings. Smokeless tobacco advertising on outdoor billboards is exempted from the labeling requirements and the preemptive sections of the bill due to the recognition by the Congress that, at the present time, there is very little, if any, advertising of these products. Further, there is strong feeling on the part of some that the display of warnings on outdoor billboards now approved for cigarette advertising has been ineffective and that to extend that same requirement for smokeless tobacco would be similarly ineffective. Rather than impose any requirements under this section to outdoor billboards, it was our view that the subcommittee will monitor the use of outdoor billboards by the smokeless tobacco industry as well as the feasibility and effectiveness of requiring warning statements that can be displayed in a conspicuous format for this advertising media. In the event outdoor billboards are utilized in the future to advertise smokeless tobacco, the rights of manufacturers, importers or packagers to voluntarily place warnings on their advertising are not restricted or abridged by this legislation. The authority of the Federal Trade Commission and the various State and local governments, regarding the placement of warning statements on outdoor billboards remains unchanged and are not preempted or otherwise affected by this act. Should decisions by the States or Federal Trade Commission in this regard become burdensome on interstate commerce or cause other problems in the future, the Congress reserves the right to revisit this matter.

Section 3(a)(2) of the legislation provides that smokeless tobacco advertising must bear one of the required health warnings in the required format and displayed in manner consistent with FTC regulations. The FTC is intended to be sensitive to the differences between different forms of advertising, including advertising that may evolve in the future. For example, if radio advertising was not prohibited under section 3(f), the Congress would not expect an advertisement disseminated via sound to display a visual symbol. In the case of radio, the FTC would be expected to issue regulations requiring the warning statement to be read by the principle narrator in the ad. Such a provision might be applicable in the future if advertising was disseminated through prerecorded audio cassette tapes. With respect to video advertisements, such as prerecorded video tapes which utilize both a visual and audio format, the FTC would be expected to issue regulations requiring that the advertisement bear the circle/arrow format during the pendency of the ad and that the warning be read by the principle narrator in the ad. While both television and radio advertisements of smokeless tobacco are prohibited under the legislation, they provide examples of the sensitivity and discretion the Congress expects the FTC to utilize in issuing regulations to assist manufacturers, packagers, and importers in complying with the requirements of the law affecting advertising.

Mr. Speaker, in my view the most important feature of this legislation is its prohibition upon advertising of smokeless tobacco on radio and television. Anytime the Congress considers restrictions on advertising it mut approach limitations such as an advertising ban with the utmost caution. But, smokeless tobacco, like cigarettes, are inherently dangerous products. These unique characteristics have historically prompted Congress to treat regulation of tobacco products differently than other consumer products.

In 1970 the Congress banned television advertising of cigarettes due to concern about the impact of such advertising upon youth. In fact, the unique impact of television advertising on youth was acknowledged in 1969 by none other than the chairman of the Philip Morris Tobacco Co. in testimony before the Consumer Subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Commerce. In his testimony, Joseph Cullman stated:

I think further that broadcast is quite different from print media. We think that the print media appeals to a more adult person and as such is a more appropriate place for cigarette ads.

Mr. Speaker, there is little doubt that the recent growth in television and radio advertising of smokeless tobacco ads has closely paralleled the steep increase in smokeless tobacco sales and its use among youth. If the Congress is to prevent growing numbers of young people from using this inherently dangerous product, it must, as it did with cigarettes and little cigars, ban their advertising on television and radio.

The committee has considered alternative means of educating the public about the health effects of this product. In the case of magazine or newspaper advertising the use of a clear, and prominent, health warning will provide a minimum level of information concerning the health risks associated with the advertised product.

Health warnings would be less effective on television or radio advertising. These advertising forms are generally regarded by media experts as the most persuasive forms of advertising. TV and radio advertising are particularly effective means for reaching large audiences of young people.

It is generally recognized that there is a close relationship between the age of an individual and that individual's reliance upon the written word. In its decision affirming the 1970 cigarette advertising ban, the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia commented in Capital Broadcasting Company versus Mitchell:

. . . Congress knew of the close relationship between cigarette commercials broadcast on the electronic media and their potential influence on young people, and was no doubt aware that the younger individual, the greater the reliance on the broadcast message rather than the written word. A pre-school or early elementary school age child can hear and understand a radio commercial or see, hear and understand a television commercial, while at the same time be substantially unaffected by an advertisement printed in a newspaper, magazine or appearing on a billboard.

On March 27, 1972, the Supreme Court refused to hear a request for appeal of the Capital Broadcasting Co. case and thereby let stand the lower court's judgment. In 1973, Congress expanded the ban on television and radio advertising of cigarettes to include "little cigars."

Mr. Speaker, the phrase "put a little pinch between your cheek and gum" has become a familiar phrase in American conversation. It refers to a common instruction for the use of smokeless tobacco. It is an advertising theme widely circulated on television and radio by active and former sports personalities. Just as many Americans can still remember cigarette jingles played on radio and television, advertising themes for smokeless tobacco have a pervasive effect upon our society and impact disproportionately upon those too young to make informed decisions about whether to use a product. For this reason, section 3(f) of the legislation prohibits television and radio advertising of smokeless tobacco products effective 6 months after the date of enactment.

I am pleased to report that the U.S. Tobacco Co. agreed, as a reflection of its commitment not to encourage young people to use smokeless tobacco products, that it would withdraw plans to advertise on the Super Bowl that occurred on January 26. In addition, the Smokeless Tobacco Council recently revised its voluntary advertising guidelines to prohibit the use of current or retired athletes who have competed since 1975. I want to commend the U.S. Tobacco Co. and the Smokeless Tobacco Council of this gesture of cooperation and hope it reflects a long term commitment to prevent and discourage young people from using smokeless tobacco products.

Mr. Speaker, section 2 of the legislation authorizes the Secretary of Health and Human Services to work closely with States in the development of educational programs and public service announcements to complement the new health warnings. These efforts are especially critical at the primary and secondary school levels where young people are most vulnerable and the pressure to being smokeless tobacco use is strong. The Secretary should work closely with broadcasters to assure the widest possible dissemination of public service announcements. The legislation calls upon the Secretary to encourage and assist States in establishing 18 as the minumum age for the purchase of smokeless tobacco.

Section 4 of the legislation requires ingredients in smokeless tobacco to be disclosed to the Secretary of Health and Human Services. Such disclosure will permit more precise evaluation of the health effects of smokeless tobacco products and will enable the Secretary to warn of specific ingredients contained in smokeless tobacco that may increase the health risks of the product.

Section 5 (Enforcement, Regulations, and Construction) gives the FTC clear authority to promulgate regulations pursuant to section 553 of the Administrative Procedure Act (5 U.S.C. 553) to govern the implementation of all aspects of section 3. With respect to packages, the FTC will promulgate regulations that prescribe the size and shape of the format and the size type, layout, and color of the warning statement and the background on which they appear. With regard to advertisements, the FTC will promulgate regulations that prescribe the size of the format, and the size type, layout and color of the warning statement and the background on which they appear. The FTC will also promulgate regulations to govern compliance with section 3(c). The primary concern for the FTC in developing these regulations should be the effectiveness of the warning.

The FTC shall promulgate regulations for section 3 under 5 USC 553 rather than section 18 of the Federal Trade Commission Act. The requirements of 5 USC 553 will ease the administrative burden on the agency, give the agency clear authority to seek a cease and desist order or injunction for any violation of these regulations, and to make clear that it is Congress' intention that the civil penalties provision for violation of a section 18 trade rule regulation not be used as the penalty for violation of these regulations.

Section 7 (Preemption) of the legislation preempts the Federal Trade Commission and State and local statutes or regulations from requiring warning labels which differ from those required by section 3. The scope of the preemption includes the wording of the warnings as well as the format in which they are displayed. This act does not address the question of product liability and is not intended to alter the duties and rights of manufacturers with respect to their product liability responsibilities.

Section 10 (Effective Date) of the legislation requires that the warning statements appear on smokeless tobacco packages and advertising 1 year after the date of enactment. In order to provide for an orderly transition and to enable the issuance of regulations necessary to implement the labeling requirements, subsection 10(b) provides that sections 2, 3(b), 3(c), 3(d), 3(e), 4(b), 7, 8, and 9 shall take effect on the date of enactment. While the provisions of section 3(d) permit the submission and approval of a label rotation plan prior to the effective date that applies to section 3(a), this should not be construed to require a manufacturer to display the required health warnings prior to the appropriate effective date, 1 year after the date of enactment.

Mr. Speaker, while the amendment now under consideration is similar to H.R. 3510, there are several provisions not included in the amendment to S. 1574. In order that their omission not be misconstrued, I would like to make several brief comments.

The substitute to S. 1574 omits references to the presence of nicotine in smokeless tobacco and the addictive properties of nicotine. These omissions are not a comment on either the presence or pharmacological properties of nicotine. The omission of a warning relating to addiction and the delegation of congressional findings can only be interpreted as a casualty to compromise.

Similarly, the scientific information contained in the health warnings were not intended to represent the final, all inclusive summary of the health effects of smokeless tobacco known today or in the future. The Congress recognizes that science is a constantly evolving process. Later this year the Surgeon General will complete a comprehensive report on the health effects of smokeless tobacco. Undoubtedly, with the completion of this report, the public, and medical and scientific community will know more about the health effects of smokeless tobacco than was known today. As research is analyzed and new research undertaken, additional information will be learned about the extent and variety of adverse health effects associated with smokeless tobacco.

Mr. Speaker, there is an additional, unrelated technical provision contained in the legislation that I would like to draw to Members' attention.

Section 10 of the bill contains a technical amendment having to do with confectionery. Under section 402(d)(2) of the Federal Food, Drug and Cosmetic Act, confectionery is adulterated, and therefore cannot be distributed in interstate commerce if it contains liqueur or other alcohol, except for marginal amounts derived solely from the use of flavoring extracts. States are free, however, to permit the marketing and sale within their own borders of chocolate and other confections containing alcohol and numerous States have done so.

Under current Federal law, confectionery that contains alcohol may not be produced in one State and sold in another, even though such goods may conform to all applicable laws of the States involved. Current law in this regard is an unnecessary barrier to interstate commerce. Section 10 of the bill would allow those States that permit higher levels of alcohol in confectionery to be sold within their borders, to ship their products to those other States that also permit higher levels of alcohol in confectionery. The bill would not permit shipment in interstate commerce to States that do not permit higher levels of alcohol.

Mr. Speaker, S. 1574 is vital to the goal of alerting the American public to some of the hazards of smokeless tobacco. Passage is, as one cancer physician testified to our subcommittee, an "opportunity to practice preventive medicine." This is legislation that can make a difference in stopping young people from responding to the "siren-like appeals" of smokeless tobacco television and radio advertising.

Mr. Speaker, our colleagues Mr. DINGELL, Mr. SYNAR, Ms. COLLINS, and Mr. STRATTON deserve special recognition for their commitment to the health of our young people and for their leadership in developing this important legislation. I also want to commend representatives of the Coalition on Smoking OR Health—perhaps one of the most effective interest groups committed to the prevention of disease and promotion of health—for their foresight and willingness to reach a cooperative and amiable resolution of this matter.

I urge every Member to join with us in passing this important health legislation.

Mr. BLILEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this bill in its present form. Yet, in the interest of public policy, I will not ask my colleagues to oppose it, nor will I ask them to oppose the irregular procedure under which this legislation is being considered.

The Waxman substitute which we are considering today will require smokeless tobacco products and their advertising to carry three different warning labels. I am concerned about these labels in content and format.

I am concerned about the content in two regards. First, there is no substantive scientific evidence to support the causal link indicated by the labels. Second, the labels do not bear any attribution. I think it is inappropriate for Congress to require any label on tobacco products which is unattributed.

As for format, the circles and arrows on advertising required by this bill are unjustified. Current evidence indicates that label format has little to do with public awareness of potential health hazards.

I am also concerned about the constitutional validity of banning television and radio advertising. Personally, I believe this provision infringes on the constitutional guarantee of free speech. I believe this provision deserves, indeed, demands further scrutiny.

Why, with these concerns am I not asking my colleagues to oppose this bill. To go straight to the point, Mr. Speaker, what is going on in various State legislatures throughout the country concerning smokeless tobacco labeling is an abomination. Actions being contemplated or being taken are without justifiable scientific basis. The Constitution confers on Congress the power to regulate commerce. Power always carries with it responsibility. A chaotic labeling situation in 50 States and 50 different labels is far more injurious to commerce than inappropriate and ill-advised uniform labeling requirements of the Congress. The bill contains not only labels, but an important and necessary preemption of State and local actions in this area, as well as Federal actions not specifically provided for in this legislation. This is essential to the industry, and it is an essential and proper exercise of congressional authority.

Mr. Speaker, I am also concerned about the procedure being employed today, which in effect bypasses the full Energy and Commerce Committee. While I will not oppose this procedure today, I hope that it does not become the modus operandi of the committee. I do, however, understand the reasons that led the chairman of the committee to decide that this was the best manner in which to proceed.

□ 1225

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to yield 3 minutes to a very distinguished member of our subcommittee, the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. RICHARDSON].

Mr. RICHARDSON. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of S. 1574, the smokeless tobacco education bill. While I am happy to lend my support to this much-needed legislation, I would like to point out to my colleagues a major—and important—difference between this bill and the bill passed by the Subcommittee on Health and the Environment.

Smokeless tobacco products include snuff and chewing tobacco. These products currently are not subject to Federal regulation and—unlike cigarettes—are not required to carry health warning labels. The National Institutes of Health estimates that some 10 million Americans—of which about 3 million are under age 21—currently use smokeless tobacco products regularly. According to the Health and Environment Subcommittee, there is evidence that the use of smokeless tobacco is increasing among young people who may believe that the product is a harmless alternative to cigarettes.

The bill requires these warnings to be rotated and randomly distributed and to be conspicuously placed on product packages. The same warnings would also have to be included in any printed advertisement of smokeless tobacco products—except on outdoor billboards. Radio or television advertising of such products would be prohibited.

The measure also requires HHS to establish a program to inform the public of any dangers to human health resulting from the use of smokeless tobacco. In carrying out the program, the measure requires HHS to develop education programs and public service announcements and to make information available to the States, and to conduct and support research on the health effects of smokeless tobacco. The bill also allows the Department to provide technical assistance and grants to States to assist in the development of educational programs, and to help States set a minimum age of 18 for the purchase of smokeless tobacco if a State chooses to do so. The bill authorizes no funds for these activities.

Manufacturers of smokeless tobacco products would be required by the bill to provide HHS with a list of chemicals added to tobacco in the manufacture of smokeless tobacco, and to tell the Department how much nicotine the product contains. This information would be regarded as a trade secret or confidential information and would be safeguarded by the Department.

Finally, the measure preempts any different warning labels that States may require on smokeless tobacco product packages.

During the subcommittee markup of H.R. 3510, I offered a successful amendment which recognized the special nature of outdoor advertising—the circle and arrow format found in the bill we are considering today would take up so much space on a billboard, it would make billboards virtually useless as an advertising medium. My amendment did not exempt outdoor advertising from carrying warnings about the potential hazards of smokeless tobacco—it merely changed the format in which this information was to be presented. My amendment also exempted outdoor advertising from the provision in H.R. 3510 which allowed the FTC to revise the label formats for advertising.

It is my understanding that the bill we are considering today excludes outdoor advertising from its provisions entirely. It is my concern that this exemption not be construed as a signal to the FTC, State and local agencies to step in and make requirements of outdoor advertising that are inconsistent with the intent of my amendment.

Nonetheless, I wish to thank the gentleman from California [Mr. WAXMAN], the ranking minority member, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLILEY], for their work on this subcommittee, the gentleman from Ohio, the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. SYNAR], for their leadership on this important health issue, but also to the industry, to those involved in the regulation, the Representatives from tobacco States who worked very closely together on this issue, to provide a bill that makes sense, that should pass, that I believe is equitable, and that I believe deserves the support of this House.

Mr. BLILEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Utah [Mr. NIELSON].

Mr. NIELSON of Utah. I thank the gentleman for yielding time to me.

Mr. Speaker, I want to make it clear that I was a cosponsor of the bill as it was introduced in the House and I do support the legislation. However, I am opposed to what has happened in this particular case.

When the legislation was considered, I tried to eliminate the circle and arrow warning. I felt that it was unfair to have a different warning format than we had for the cigarette industry. That was ignored. However, there were two amendments passed, one of which has been alluded to and another which I am going to mention, which were passed in the subcommittee and the committee.

One had to do with the outdoor advertising. The amendment offered by the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. RICHARDSON], which has just been mentioned, has been left out of this bill. I think it was important and I am going to extend my remarks in that regard.

The other amendment was the one offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. ECKERT] which exempted the newspapers from having to show the ads in color, since they use black and white in most of their advertising.

I do not know why it is necessary to bring a bill up on suspension which has been altered without the participation of the full committee. The bill would pass on its own merits and the two amendments which we supplied in the committee were very fine amendments. I think they would strengthen the bill and make it more fair to the industry and make it more meaningful to everyone concerned.

Therefore, I oppose that particular aspect. I will not call for a vote on the bill, nor will I oppose the bill, but I do object to the way it has been handled and I hope it will not be a pattern for such issues in the future.

Mr. Speaker, you will note that the subcommittee elected not to include outdoor advertising of smokeless tobacco products within the comprehensive warning label requirements which this bill would impose on advertising in other print media. During the subcommittee's deliberations leading to enactment of the Comprehensive Smoking Education Act of 1984, we carefully considered the imposition on outdoor advertising of a circle and arrow warning format like that required in this bill. At that time, the subcommittee became convinced that such a warning format was simply not adaptable to the unique constraints of outdoor advertising. The subcommittee determined that this format would usurp so much space on a billboard that it effectively would operate as a prohibition on advertising in this medium. The alternative billboard warning format ultimately adopted in the 1984 bill was found by the subcommitte to be equally effective in achieving the policy goals of that legislation.

For these reasons, outdoor advertising is not included within the provisions of the House amendment to S. 1574 which would require a circle and arrow warning format in print media. As a practical matter, the exemption for outdoor advertising will not have a significant impact on the effectiveness of this bill since at present there is very little, if any, outdoor advertising of these products. In this regard I wish to make it clear that the present exemption for outdoor advertising of smokeless tobacco is not to be construed by the Federal Trade Commission or other State or local agencies as an invitation for them to occupy this field. However, if the committee finds, on advice of the FTC that there is a significant shift of smokeless tobacco advertising from other media to the outdoor medium after enactment of this bill, the subcommittee will promptly consider amendments to establish a separate warning format for outdoor advertising of smokeless tobacco products based on the format required for cigarette advertising in that medium.

Under these circumstances, the manufacturers of smokeless tobacco are presented with the opportunity to demonstrate to the Congress their desire to act responsibly by adopting a voluntary program which incorporates health warning statements required by this bill in any future outdoor advertisements using the format now required for cigarette advertisements on billboards. Certainly such action would be an important factor in any future consideration of further regulation in this area.

I also object to the elimination of the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. ECKERT] to exempt the newspapers from the requirement that color be used.

While I am a cosponsor of the legislation and support it, I do object to the manner in which all of the committee amendments were ignored and I hope this does not become a pattern for other health legislation.

Mr. BLILEY. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time.

Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ECKART].

Mr. ECKART of Ohio. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Speaker, as a cosponsor of Public Law 98-474, the Comprehensive Smoking Education Act of 1984 and a supporter of today's efforts, I have been a consistent and strong advocate of health warnings on tobacco advertising. For me, the link between tobacco use and serious illness is clear, but must be made more clear to the public at large.

I support the statement of the gentleman from California [Mr. WAXMAN] and was especially happy to support his bill, H.R. 3510, as it was reported from his subcommittee. That bill would have provided for similar treatment of both cigarettes and smokeless tobacco products in various forms of the media.

The new cigarette warnings have been in effect since October 1985. Extensive analysis in the press since then suggests, and I know of no contrary arguments, that the new warning systems have served their purpose of increasing public awareness and I hope that we will achieve similar results with the various combinations of new warnings and bans on advertising concerning smokeless tobacco.

We, of course, are delighted that various media forms already contain little if any smokeless advertising, and the bill and the chairman take note of that. The bill before us takes the proper approach by mandating warnings on those media forms which currently carry such advertising.

Since there can be as long as a 6-month delay before this resolution becomes law, I would urge even more prompt consideration by various media forms of voluntary restraints as well.

The record for me is clear. The current format for cigarettes is working, needed, and necessary, and the same format for smokeless tobacco is long overdue.

Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. SYNAR] the original author of the legislation to deal with this problem, who has taken the leadership in trying to get a Federal solution to what is a growing problem all around the country.

Mr. SYNAR. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Speaker and my colleagues, it is with a great amount of honor that I stand here today, after months of negotiations on this very important legislation. It is very rare that we get the opportunity to come to the well of the House to talk about legislation that is going to benefit people by and large, and save thousands if not millions of lives in the future.

Today's legislation gives us an opportunity to all go home, both Republicans and Democrats alike, and say that we have made a major step toward protecting the health of young people throughout this country.

I think I would be remiss in my responsibility if I did not extend a very special thanks to the gentleman from California, HENRY WAXMAN, for the outstanding job and leadership that he has exemplified on this very important issue. All through the negotiations, which have gone on for the last 2 or 3 months, his strength, his understanding and his compassion have been really the principles by which we have been able to fashion a piece of legislation which will benefit so many Americans.

I would also like to give special thanks to Ripley Forbes, the staff director, who has done an excellent job in bringing together all the various opinions and ideas which we have had to formulate in these negotiations.

Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the gentleman from California for his hard work on this issue. His diligence and commitment have resulted in a bill to provide strong warnings on smokeless tobacco containers and prohibits their advertising on radio and television.

Many of us in Congress were abruptly confronted with the dangers of smokeless tobacco after the tragic death of 19-year-old Sean Marsee. Sean had dipped snuff daily for nearly 7 years. He developed mouth cancer which his doctors said was caused by his heavy snuff use. He died a painful death less than a year after his initial diagnosis.

Smokeless tobacco use has reached epidemic levels among young people. A recent consensus conference conducted by the National Institutes of Health concluded that 3 million young people used smokeless tobacco last year. Numerous studies, which I need not summarize here, have documented the growing and widespread use of smokeless tobacco among young people—some as young as 5 years old.

Other studies have found that young people believe these products are a safe alternative to cigarettes. This perception is strongly reinforced by industry advertisements which tell users to "take a pouch instead of a puff," and which feature successful professional athletes touting the pleasures of dipping. And lest young users be discouraged by the initial gum irritation accompanying snuff use, Walt Garrison assures them that "you could feel a slight irritation around the gum * * * but learning is part of the fun and things pass with practice." Little wonder that young, impressionable males conclude that smokeless tobacco use is consistent with good health.

The dramatic increase in smokeless tobacco use coincides with increased advertising aimed at young people. According to the NIH consensus statement:

> Production declined steadily from 1930 until the late 1960's. Subsequently, there has been a resurgence of production, with a steady increase in smokeless tobacco output totaling about one-third since 1970, but in just the last 5 years, from 1981 to 1985, the production of moist snuff, the form often used by youth, has increased by one-third.

Last year the smokeless tobacco industry spent $20 million advertising various snuff and chewing tobacco products.

While smokeless tobacco use has increased, the evidence linking the product to mouth cancer also has grown dramatically. One study found that nonsmoking snuff-dippers had for times the risk of mouth cancer as nonusers. The risk increased fiftyfold for those who dipped over several decades.

Smokeless tobacco contains two classes of powerful carcinogens which have been found to produce cancer readily in rats and hamsters.

After reviewing volumes of scientific data on the link between smokeless tobacco and cancer, the NIH consensus panel concluded that "the use of smokeless tobacco, particularly snuff when started in childhood, increases the risk of oral cancer."

The NIH panel also concluded that smokeless tobacco is addictive. To again quote the consensus statement: "in studies of teenagers who attempted to stop using smokeless tobacco, only a small percentage were able to do so, suggesting that tobacco by the oral route has substantial addicting properties. The continued use of smokeless tobacco even by those who experience serious adverse health consequences attests to its addicting powers." The statement concludes: "The primary behavioral consequence of regular use of smokeless tobacco is long-term nicotine dependence and its associated health risks."

Witnesses at a hearing conducted by the Subcommittee on Health and the Environment testified to the strongly addicting nature of smokeless tobacco. Dr. Elbert Glover, associate professor at East Carolina University in Greenville, NC, reported these findings from two "quit smokeless tobacco clinics" he conducted.

> The two clinics had a total of 41 subjects . . . with a 2.3 percent success rate, meaning only 1 out of that 41 was able to quit. Incidentally, I do quit smoking clinics with cigarettes, and my success rate is about 38 percent over the past 9 or 10 years. The complaints associated with the abstinence syndrome of smokeless tobacco were typical withdrawal symptoms experienced by smokers, but of greater intensity.

H.R. 2950, which I introduced, and H.R. 3510, introduced by Representative WAXMAN, both would have required that smokeless tobacco products and print advertisements carry this label: "Warning: This Product Contains Nicotine and Is Addictive." I strongly believe that this warning is warranted given the state of scientific knowledge on smokeless tobacco. However, in negotiating an overall agreement on this legislation, this label was substituted for one which reads: "Warning: This Product Is Not a Safe Alternative to Cigarettes." The parties involved in negotiating this agreement felt that such a warning was necessary given the widespread impression that smokeless tobacco use is safer than smoking.

The substitution of warning labels should in no way be interpreted as an acknowledgment of ambiguity in the evidence on the addictive nature of smokeless tobacco. That evidence is clear and irrefutable.

The amendment before us prohibits the advertising of smokeless tobacco on radio and television. There are several reasons why this provision was included.

Smokeless tobacco advertisements are aimed exclusively at potential new users. The vast majority of electronic media advertising is purchased by one company—U.S. Tobacco. That company holds over 90 percent of the moist snuff market. Obviously, U.S. Tobacco has little to gain by promoting brand switches, as opposed to encouraging nonusers to start.

Official statements by industry officials make clear their intent. A 1983 article in Advertising Age quoted U.S. Tobacco's marketing services director as saying, "What we're doing is directing oral tobacco at an entirely new demographic group." Another industry official said in an interview that, "I feel there is a genuine opportunity to expand the numbers and types of people who are using smokeless tobacco."

The content of the advertisements put this philosophy into effect. As I stated before, Walt Garrison provides lessons for the fainthearted nonuser. The slogan accompanying the advertisement of Skoal Bandits suggests to smokers that smokeless tobacco is a safe alternative to smoking—"Take a pouch instead of a puff." One brochure tells new users that, "It's as easy as 1-2-3."

When these advertisements feature prominent, successful athletes, the result is a powerful enticement for young people to begin using snuff and chewing tobacco. One only needs to visit any junior high or high school in America to see how successful the smokeless tobacco industry has been at cultivating this new market. The familiar circular bulge in the rear pocket has become an indispensable status symbol for teenage males.

Witnesses at the hearing conducted by the Subcommittee on Health and the Environment testified to the misleading impact of these advertisements. Ron Freeman, a high school football coach at Muskogee, OK, forcefully addressed this issue:

> Advertising on TV presents the image of being macho, that it is an alternative to smoking . . . Our kids that I coach and deal with on a daily basis still have role models. They still have people who are more or less heroes in their life, and then they see these heroes on TV advertising smokeless tobacco . . . then they feel like it is all right for this particular athlete, they have made it to the top, they have been very successful, so, therefore, it must be all right for me. If I want to attain the level they have attained, then I need to do the same things that they are doing.

It is my strong belief, and I believe I can speak for other members of the committee, that a prohibition on smokeless tobacco advertising is essential to achieving the purpose of this bill—discouraging the use of smokeless tobacco products and adequately warning users of its dangers. To continue to allow the advertisement of these products would imply a safety that does not exist, and would allow the continued display of misleading advertisements.

From the statements made by the smokeless tobacco industry, as well as those representing the broadcast industry, it appears that any type of restriction on smokeless tobacco television and radio advertising would result in a de facto ban. H.R. 2950, which I introduced, would have required a health warning label to be read once during radio and television advertisements present for the duration of television advertisements. This provision is comparable to the warning label requirements for print advertisements that are included in the amendment before us.

The National Association of Broadcasters stated that the provisions of H.R. 2950 addressing electronic advertising would force smokeless tobacco advertisers to "withdraw from broadcast advertising altogether." The Smokeless Tobacco Council has repeated this statement on numerous occasions. In fact, they have stated that any label requirement for television advertising would be a de facto ban. From these statements it is clear that Congress is faced with two alternatives: to exempt electronic advertising from any warning label requirement; or prohibit electronic advertising outright. Given the massive amount of data we now have on the harmful effects of these products, this is no choice at all.

As a final point, I would like to briefly address the issue of product liability. I believe the amendment could not be more clear as to our intent. This measure is not intended to have any impact on product liability suits. It is not to be construed as relieving any person of his liability at common law.

Again, I want to thank Mr. WAXMAN and the members of the Subcommittee on Health and the Environment who helped secure the passage of this bill. I am hopeful that the Senate will take up this measure quickly and defeat any weakening amendments.

NATIONAL INSTITUTES OF HEALTH—CONSENSUS DEVELOPMENT CONFERENCE STATEMENT: HEALTH IMPLICATIONS OF SMOKELESS TOBACCO USE, JANUARY 13-15, 1986

INTRODUCTION

Smokeless tobacco includes both chewing tobacco and snuff. These products contain tobacco leaf plus a variety of sweeteners, flavorings, and scents. In chewing tobacco, the leaf may be shredded (looseleaf), pressed into bricks or cakes (plugs), or dried and twisted into rope-like strands (twists). A portion is either chewed or held in place in the cheek or lower lip.

The two categories of snuff, dry and moist, are made from powdered or finely cut tobacco leaves. In some countries including the United Kingdom, dry snuff is sniffed through the nose, but in the United States, both dry and moist snuff are taken in the mouth or "dipped." A small amount, a "pinch," is held in place between the lip or cheek and the gum.

Although smokeless tobacco was widely used in the United States in the past, during this century its use declined sharply. There is evidence that this trend has reversed, and smokeless tobacco is regaining popularity. Market data show marked increases in manufacturing and sales, especially in the category of moist snuff, and total annual sales of smokeless tobacco are close to $1 billion. Reports from schools in different regions of the country indicate that smokeless tobacco—principally moist snuff—is being used by very young people, especially adolescent males.

Serious questions have been raised regarding health and behavioral effects from use of smokeless tobacco. Most notably, it has been linked to oral cancer.

If smokeless tobacco use does produce adverse health effects, then the use of smokeless tobacco by a large segment of the population could have long-term public health consequences. It is important at this time that the available information be assessed, both to provide the scientific community with a synthesis of current knowledge and a framework for further research, and to provide the public with the information it needs to make informed decisions regarding the use of smokeless tobacco.

To accomplish this end, the National Cancer Institute, the National Institute of Dental Research, and the NIH Office of Medical Applications of Research convened a consensus development conference on Health Implications of Smokeless Tobacco Use on January 13-15, 1986. After a day and a half of presentations by experts in relevant fields, a consensus panel including representatives of epidemiology, cancer, dentistry, psychology, pediatrics, psychopharmacology, education, and the public considered the evidence and agreed on answers to the following questions:

What are the current trends in the use of smokeless tobacco in the United States?

Does the use of smokeless tobacco increase the risk of oral or other cancers?

Does the use of smokeless tobacco increase the risk of periodontal disease or other oral and health problems?

What are the behavioral consequences of smokeless tobacco use?

What issue regarding the health consequences of smokeless tobacco use require further research?

1. WHAT ARE THE CURRENT TRENDS IN THE USE OF SMOKELESS TOBACCO IN THE UNITED STATES?

The panel estimates that at least 10 million Americans have used smokeless tobacco within the past year, with 3 million of these users being less than 21 years old. Recent data indicate that significant proportions of teenage boys are current users, and the number of users in this age group is steadily increasing.

Detailed national data on trends in the use of smokeless tobacco are not currently available; however, there are indications of recent significant changes. One such indication is the amount of smokeless tobacco manufactured in the United States. Production declined steadily from 1930 until the later 1960's. Subsequently, there has been a resurgence of production, with a steady increase in smokeless tobacco output totaling about one-third since 1970, but in just the last 5 years, from 1981 to 1985, the production of moist snuff, the form often used by youth, has increased by one-third.

The frequency of use of smokeless tobacco has only recently become a subject for national investigation. In 1985, a national representative study revealed that 16 percent of males between 12 and 17 years of age had used some form of smokeless tobacco within the past year, and of these, about one-third used it one or more times per week. These figures mask wide variations among subgroups. Currently, males over 21 years of age use somewhat less, with use decreasing for the older groups. Only 2 percent of females use smokeless tobacco, whereas blacks and Hispanic youth are intermediate users. Patterns of use appear to be similar in most of the country, with the lowest use in the Northeast.

Some local studies have reported use by 30 to 40 percent of males in high school; even among third graders, 13 percent of males reported use. One study found that use increased for males at each grade level. Significant use by kindergarten children also has been reported in some areas in one state. In a sample of colleges, about 20 percent of the males reported use of smokeless tobacco.

In the one local longitudinal study, covering 1976 to 1982, tobacco chewing doubled and snuff dipping tripled, with peak use amoung boys 12 to 14 years old.

It is of interest that in some schools, the percentage of males reporting regular use of smokeless tobacco was higher than the percentage reporting use of cigarettes.

2. DOES THE USE OF SMOKELESS TOBACCO INCREASE THE RISKS OF ORAL OR OTHER CANCERS?

The human data provide convincing evidence for an increased risk of oral cancer as the result of smokeless tobacco use. Data are insufficient to determine whether cancers at sites other than the mouth and throat are related to smokeless tobacco use.

Human data

With respect to direct human evidence, one North Carolina study of women provides the most compelling data to support a role for snuff dipping in the causation of oral cancers. In this study, among nonsmokers, the risk of oral cancer was 4.2 times greater for those who used snuff than for those who did not and for users over several decades the risk was much higher. These data are particularly striking in that (1) the oral cancer risks were greatest for cancers located in the buccal mucosa and gingiva where the snuff was placed; (2) the risk increased with increasing duration of snuff use; (3) factors such as diet, dental hygiene, alcohol intake, and cigarette smoking were found not to be responsible for the association between snuff and oral cancer; and (4) the risks were so large that it would be difficult to postulate alternative explanations for the association between oral cancer and snuff other than a causal one.

These findings are supported by other epidemiological studies, primarily of the case control type, and by clinical case series. However, most of these studies did not specify the type of smokeless tobacco product, i.e., snuff or chewing tobacco. Thus, it seems prudent to recognize the carcinogenic potential of all smokeless tobacco products, acknowledging that the adverse effect of snuff has been more fully documented.

Although this relationship has been most clearly demonstrated for elderly, rural women residing in the Southeastern United States, there is no reason to believe that snuff would also be carcinogenic in women and men in all geographic locations. In fact, men using smokeless tobacco experienced a 3.9-fold increased risk for oral cancer in a study based on the Third National Cancer Survey. Youngsters, starting the use of snuff in grade school and continuing its use through adult life, are likely to experience a similar risk.

Our conclusion with respect to oral cancer is supported by multiple studies showing a relationship between oral cancer and chewing of betel quid containing tobacco in Indian and Southeast Asia. Furthermore, this view is consistent with the judgment of a recent working group of the International Agency for Research on Cancer (IARC), which reported that the evidence associating snuff with oral cancer is "sufficient" to indicate a causal relationship.

Carcinogens in smokeless tobacco

Chemical analysis of various types of smokeless tobacco has revealed the presence of polonium-210, a radioactive alpha-emitter and known radiation carcinogen, and representative of two classes of powerful chemical carcinogens, the polycyclic aromatic hydrocarbons and the nitrosamines.

Of the 19 nitrosamines identified in smokeless tobacco, the carcinogenic nitrosamines present the highest concentration are NNN and NNK, both of which are related chemically to nicotine. Snuff contains 1.6 to 135 mg per kilogram (mg/kg) of NNN and 0.1 to 14 mg/kg of NNK. For comparison, U.S. foods and beverages may not contain more than 0.01 mg/kg of nitrosamines. U.S. looseleaf and plug tobacco contain 0.2 to 8.2 mg/kg of NNN and 0 to 1.0 mg/kg of NNK.

Both NNN and NNK readily produce cancer in rats and hamsters in organs such as the nose, trachea, esophagus, and liver. Benign tumors (papillomas) of the mouth are induced when NNN and NNK are applied directly to the mouth of rats.

Carcinogenesis tests in animals

Repeated experimental studies in animals have failed to provide adequate evidence that chewing tobacco, snuff, or extracts derived from them induce cancer.

Implications for human health

The risk of oral cancer in the United States is small among those who do not smoke, drink alcoholic beverages, or use smokeless tobacco. The data considered here, however, raise the concern that regular users of snuff, especially children, may develop oral cancer later in life. The panel believes the public should be warned that the use of smokeless tobacco, particularly snuff when started in childhood, increases the risk of oral cancer.

3. DOES THE USE OF SMOKELESS TOBACCO INCREASE THE RISK OF PERIODONTAL DISEASE OR OTHER ORAL AND HEALTH PROBLEMS?

Evidence supports an association of smokeless tobacco use with gingival recession and oral leukoplakia, but there is insufficient evidence of an association of periodontitis or tooth decay. Other potential physical health hazards are essentially unexplored.

Gingival recession, gingivitis, and periodontal diseases

Both case reports and studies of larger samples show an association of smokeless tobacco use with localized gingival recession (receding gums), especially where the smokeless tobacco is habitually placed. One study has reported a significant association of smokeless tobacco use with generalized gingivitis. Data currently are insufficient to support an association of smokeless tobacco use with generalized or advanced periodontal disease.

Tooth decay

There are disparate data on whether smokeless tobacco use increases or decreases tooth decay. The absence of reliable data that take into account the diversity of smokeless tobacco products and the amount and bio-availability of contained sugars and fluoride may contribute to the lack of agreement among the few reports on this topic.

Leukoplakia

Several reports associate snuff use and, in at least one report, chewing tobacco use with the presence of white patches of the oral mucosa clinically described as leukoplakia. Indeed, leukoplakia is a frequent concomitant of smokeless tobacco use. Although multiple studies describe the transformation of leukoplakia to malignancy within the range of 1 to 18 percent over observation periods ranging from several months to 11 years, there are few data on whether snuff-associated leukoplakia per se undergoes similar frequencies of malignant transformation. The studies done to date probably have not been conducted for sufficient time or with sufficient numbers of long-term users to define incidence of malignant transformation. Studies from India and Southeast Asia, involving different smokeless tobacco products and use patterns, suggest that the long-term risk for malignant change of smokeless tobacco-associated leukoplakia may be significant.

Other health risks

Blood levels of nicotine achieved by cigarette smoking, which are similar to those achieved by smokeless tobacco use, cause elevations of blood pressure, heart rate, certain blood lipids, and catecholamines. However, no direct epidemiological data are available on cardiovascular morbidity and mortality in association with smokeless tobacco use.

The complex array of constituents in smokeless tobacco presents a variety of potential health risks for the user as well as for the offspring of pregnant female users. In addition to nicotine, heavy metals such as lead and cadmium have been found in smokeless tobacco at levels that represent potential risks to the fetus and young child.

4. WHAT ARE THE BEHAVIORAL CONSEQUENCES OF SMOKELESS TOBACCO USE?

Tobacco produces psychological effects variously described as relaxing, arousing, and euphoriant. Over the past two decades, laboratory and clinical studies have indicated that these effects are mediated by nicotine and blocked by mecamylamine, a drug that competes for nicotine receptors in the brain. Tobacco use leads to a state of dependence in most regular users; this state is characterized by tolerance, physical dependence, and willingness to expend considerable efforts to maintain individual plasma levels within a range of values bounded by toxic effects and the onset of withdrawal symptoms. Plasma levels achieved by smokeless tobacco use are similar to those of cigarette smoking. Nicotine self-administration patterns are very similar to those of other central nervous system stimulant drugs in both laboratory animal and human studies.

The abuse liability of a substance—the degree of its ability to gain control over the user—is correleated with the delay between administration and brain levels sufficient to engender a psychological effect. Because nicotine from smokeless tobacco is presumed to reach the brain more slowly than that from cigarette smoke, it might be hypothesized that smokeless tobacco would have lower abuse liability. However, in studies of teenagers who attempted to stop using smokeless tobacco, only a small percentage were able to do so, suggesting that tobacco by the oral route has substantial addicting properties. The continued use of smokeless tobacco even by those who experience serious adverse health consequences attests to its addicting powers.

Addicted users of nicotine become tolerant to the drug: that is, despite experiencing initial unpleasant side effects (e.g., tremulousness, dizziness, and nausea), such users increase their dosage until it levels off at one that fulfills their need. Such users seek nicotine continually. Some users of smokeless tobacco use it even while sleeping.

The physical dependence associated with nicotine induces withdrawal symptoms when addicted users abruptly discontinue its use. Thereafter, exusers often experience craving for nicotine, and many become users again.

Other behavioral effects

Tobacco withdrawal produces increased irritability and decrements in several basic cognitive functions. These disruptive effects begin within hours of the last nicotine dose. Such cycles of intake and abstinence are typical of use patterns of youth in school and adults in many employment situations. Thus, the associated cognitive impairments could have adverse effects on academic and job performance.

Behavioral pharmacology and learning studies show that the determinants of the initiation, maintenance, and reduction of substance use result from the interaction between biochemical and behavioral processes. For smokeless tobacco, nonbiochemical factors that are correlated and readily manipulable include advertisements about smokeless tobacco, influence from peers, parental acceptance of smokeless tobacco use, and perception that smokeless tobacco is less harmful than smoking tobacco.

Behaviors can become interchangeable based on their function to the individual. For example, current opinion is that some smokers are switching to smokeless tobacco because the latter is considered a safe alternative for maintaining their nicotine dependence. Others suggest that young people using smokeless tobacco often switch to cigarettes. Use of smokeless tobacco in children is sometimes associated with the use of hard liquor, beer, wine, cigarettes, and marijuana.

5. WHAT ISSUES REGARDING THE HEALTH CONSEQUENCES OF SMOKELESS TOBACCO USE REQUIRE FURTHER RESEARCH?

There is a pressing need for well-designed studies of:

a. Prevalence of smokeless tobacco use based on continuing national probability sample data, including type of product, age, sex, region, and concomitant cigarette smoking. In addition, longitudinal studies should be conducted.

b. Users and nonusers of smokeless tobacco products, to characterize better the prevalence and incidence of periodontal diseases, caries, leukoplakia, and cancer. These studies should identify, as far as possible, the nature and contents of products used, patterns and durations of their use, concomitant use of other substances such as alcohol and smoking tobacco, and occurrence of viral infections. Where appropriate, they should use tissue biopsy as well as critical clinical and laboratory measurements.

c. Cancers of sites other than the mouth carried out in geographic areas with high rates of smokeless tobacco use.

d. Potential role of smokeless tobacco in cardiovascular disease and adverse outcomes of pregnancy.

e. Potential of users of smokeless tobacco to produce nitrosamines in vivo.

f. Research on the relationship between amounts of smokeless tobacco used and plasma levels of lead, cadmium, and other potential toxins.

g. Strategies for the development and evaluation of prevention programs, including school-based programs, taking into consideration regional, ethnic, age, socioeconomic, and other variables.

h. Development and evaluation of early intervention and treatment programs to reduce smokeless tobacco dependence, with special consideration of specific populations, including

1. School and College age.

2. Persons with specific risk or disease conditions, including malignancies, cardiovascular disease, women at risk for pregnancy.

3. Workplace- and industry-specific populations where elevated smoke tobacco use is common. Such programs should include a range of approaches based on pharmacological and behavioral treatments.

CONCLUSIONS

Use of smokeless tobacco has a long history in the United States, but trends in recent years, in particular the increasing use of snuff by children and young adults, have led to concerns about possible health consequences. National data suggest that at least 10 million persons have used smokeless tobacco of one kind or another within the past year. Patterns of use by age, sex, and type of product vary across the country.

The human evidence that use of snuff causes cancer of the mouth is strong. Risk is particularly high for parts of the mouth where the snuff is usually placed.

Data are currently insufficient to come to any conclusion regarding the relationship of smokeless tobacco use to cancers at other sites. Repeated experimental studies in animals have failed to provide adequate evidence that chewing tobacco, snuff, or extracts derived from them induce cancer. However, nitrosamines chemically related to nicotine occur at high levels in snuff and, generally, at lower levels in chewing tobacco. These compounds are highly carcinogenic in animals. The concentrations of nitrosamines in smokeless tobacco are far higher than the levels of these compounds allowed in any U.S. food or beverage.

Smokeless tobacco use increases the frequency of localized gum recession and leukoplakia where the snuff is usually placed, but evidence on its relationship to other diseases of the oral cavity is inadequate. The presence of lead in smokeless tobacco may pose a special risk for the developing fetus. Use of smokeless tobacco releases nicotine into the bloodstream and produces blood levels of nicotine comparable to those produced by smoking tobacco. The primarly behavioral consequence of regular use of smokeless tobacco is long-term nicotine dependence and its associated health risks.

Use of smokeless tobacco is one of a number of health-endangering behaviors which frequently coincide, with the clear potential for long-term and serious consequences.

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SYNAR. I yield to the gentlewoman from Ohio.

Ms. OAKAR. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I just want to compliment the gentleman and the committee. I think this is a real, serious problem that is more subtle than the obvious problems with tobacco smoking, and so on. I think this is a really fine piece of legislation. I want to compliment the gentleman and all the members of the committee for their work on this legislation.

Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, in closing, I do want to thank all of the people who have participated in drafting this legislation and fashioning the compromise that is before us today.

I want to single out the Coalition on Smoking or Health for their diligence in looking after the public health interests of the people in this country. I want to thank our staff, particularly Mr. Ripley Forbes, for his diligent work in seeing this legislation through to this point.

□ 1235

We have before us a bill that will address the problems which are very real for children who had been encouraged to use smokeless tobacco in a misleading way, and who in some cases have died, suffered even the ultimate consequences to their health from this very, very dangerous product.

I hope this legislation will serve as an encouragement all around this Nation that people should not take up this filthy habit, and certainly not think that smokeless tobacco is a safe replacement in any way for the other filthy habit of smoking cigarettes.

I urge adoption of this legislation.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, it is well known that I am a Tennessean and that tobacco is a very important crop in my State. In fact, tobacco was the No. 1 cash crop in Tennessee last year. And my congressional district probably has the greater part of all the tobacco that's produced in Tennessee.

For generations, growing tobacco has been a way of life for thousands of my constituents. Tobacco grows on poor hill land that is good for little else, and has provided a livelihood for many poor Tennesseans who needed the money. It has been a kind of de facto poverty program for people who, quite rightly, preferred hard work to welfare.

But, while tobacco is important to my district, our people, particularly our young people, are far, far more important. And it is their health that is at risk due to smokeless tobacco.

Beginning in 1981, the first substantial evidence was collected which proved that there is a link between smokeless tobacco use and oral cancer. Apparently, you are four times more likely to contact cancer if you use it. Despite that discovery, smokeless tobacco use has risen about 33 percent since then and has become a $1 billion industry. Massive advertising campaigns such as the $1 million spent during the 1984 Winter Olympics have helped fuel the growth.

Somewhere between 10 and 22 million Americans have used smokeless tobacco products. There have been no warning labels to tell them of the danger. Use has skyrocketed, particularly among young people. An estimated 3 million Americans under 21 use smokeless tobacco. Somewhere between 15 and 40 percent of the secondary school students in my State have tried it, and use has been documented all the way down to the kindergarten level.

It is high time that the steps included in this bill be taken. The rough warning labels are long overdue. Advertising or radio and TV of smokeless products should be banned. And thorough studies by the Department of Health and Human Services and a public information program are long overdue.

I congratulate the chairman of the Health Subcommittee for spearheading these efforts and achieving this historic compromise.

Mr. SILJANDER. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in strong support for S. 1574, the smokeless tobacco bill. Recently, I received over 60 letters from junior high school students in Coloma, MI. These young people wrote and told me that they were overwhelmingly in favor of Congress taking action to limit the advertising of smokeless tobacco products, as well as, requiring warning labels to be displayed on smokeless tobacco products and smokeless tobacco advertising.

Their letters to me were in response to an article which they had read in Reader's Digest. This article told of a young high school athlete's struggle against cancer by smokeless tobacco. Despite several traumatic operations, the young athlete died.

I commend the students of Mrs. Sanders' eighth grade English class for their concern and publicminded spirit to write to me about this very serious and important issue. The students are: Ricky Albright, Aaron Carlisle, Paul Mow, Chris Burton, Crystal Sanders, Marty Badt, John Allen Frost, Kelly Moran, Kevin Hester, Stacey Latsch, Jeff Thornton, Tammy Dill, Sherri Miller, John Veit, Michael Steck, Ben Hollerbach, Kevin Wise, Robbie Privett, Curt Johnson, Jacob Krieger, Wendy Sweet, Kerry Krause, Donna Roseman, Derick Snyder, Jason Miller, Pam Johnson, Amy Martin, Bridget Miller, Kelly Siler, Darrin McGee, Corey Leslie, Charlie Rice, Eric Hensel, Leslie Sanders, Sherri Barnes, Kathy Carpenter, Karen Trapp, Jason Renfro, Jeff Nelson, Stephanie Miller, Wendy Stampfly, Pam Kutchinski, Staci Keirman, Scott Riemer, Char Coats, Tim Ishmael, Linda King, Denise Tullio, Tracya Brown, Karen Kniebes, Aaron Denbow, Tijuana Bridgeman, Jennifer Schlipp, Scott Quinn, Nikki Weber, Michelle Enochs, Brenda Brown, Rochelle Clapsaddle, Tiffany Bailey, Denise Rowe, Missi Wheeler, Marinda Bevins, and Joshua Koch.

Because of their efforts, and the efforts of thousands of other students across the country and various public health organizations, Congress is today taking the necessary steps to inform the public of the serious health effects associated with the use of smokeless tobacco.

Mrs. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to join my colleagues in expressing support of the Smokeless Tobacco and Health Education Act. As a member of the Health Subcommittee, which held hearings last year on the dangers associated with the use of smokeless tobacco products, and coauthor of H.R. 3510. I welcome the timely consideration of this important legislation.

I would also like to take this opportunity to thank my good friend and colleague, Representative HENRY WAXMAN, chairman of the Health Subcommittee, for his relentless efforts to develop a strong bill, one which will not only make people more aware of the health hazards associated with smokeless tobacco, but make it more difficult for young people to get their hands on such potentially deadly products.

As the author of legislation designed to dissuade children from using snuff and smokeless tobacco, H.R. 3078, I was proud to be an active part of the subcommittee's efforts to curb its use and promote greater national awareness of the health risks associated with these products. The bill I sponsored addressed the problem in three ways: Education, excise taxes, and a prohibition on deductions of advertising expenses. In my view, education is the key ingredient in the formula for making sure that all users are well-informed of the risks that they are taking in chewing tobacco and dipping snuff.

The substitute measure to be offered by my good friend and colleague and chairman of the Health Subcommittee, Representative HENRY A. WAXMAN, contains important and necessary provisions that will go a long way toward removing the glamour and hype associated with snuff and discourage our youngsters from engaging in an activity that promises to result in serious health problems.

As provided for in the Smokeless Tobacco and Health Education Act, warning labels will be required on smokeless tobacco product packages, radio or television advertising of these products will be prohibited, and the Department of Health and Human Services will be required to develop education programs and public service announcements as a way to inform the public of the health risks resulting from the use of smokeless tobacco. Lastly, manufacturers of smokeless tobacco products would be required to list chemicals added in the manufacture of smokeless tobacco.

I urge my colleagues to join me in putting a lid on the rampant use of chewing tobacco and snuff by our Nation's youth by voting to pass this very needed legislation.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the committee amendment to S. 1574, the smokeless tobacco education bill which passed the House yesterday. I support the version of this bill which was passed by the other body.

First, I think it should be pointed out that this is not a committee amendment. Rather, it is a subcommittee amendment because the full Energy and Commerce Committee has not acted on this bill.

It is irresponsible to make such a bold move without first having full committee action on the bill and time for full debate and amendment in the House. Bringing this measure up under suspension, when the full committee has not even passed it, is not a responsible way to legislate.

Second, I am sure many Members have received concerned calls from radio and television stations in their districts who are suddenly faced with the loss of advertising revenue from a legal product. The House should not take the step of banning advertising without first trying a less restrictive measure, such as requiring that warnings be included in the ads.

Third, I do not agree with the need to go beyond the design of warning labels currently on cigarettes. I believe new warning labels on smokeless products should conform to the precedent Congress established with cigarettes.

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak in support of S. 1574, legislation directing the Department of Health and Human Services to develop a program to educate the public on the health consequences associated with the use of smokeless tobacco. While I believe it is safe to say that the general public is well-aware of the deleterious health affects of smoking—the fact that it increases the smoker's chance to contract heart and lung diseases—many do not know that smokeless tobacco—snuff and chewing tobacco—also poses a significant health risk to the user. By adopting this legislation to facilitate an increased awareness among our constituents to the dangers of smokeless tobacco, we will have made a significant contribution to protecting their continued good health.

In response to the serious health consequences associated with smoking, many individuals, especially our young, have turned to smokeless tobacco. Most recent evidence, however, indicates that the nicotine levels found in smokeless tobacco have been directly associated with high blood pressure, recission of the gums, peridontal bone destruction and tooth abrasion, as well as oral cancer. I am pleased to note that this legislation enjoys the support of trhe American Cancer Society and the American Dental Association, as well as members of the smokeless tobacco industry.

In accordance with S. 1574, all smokeless tobacco products manufactured, packaged or imported for sale or distribution in the United States must bear one of the following three statements: (1) Warning: This Product May Cause Mouth Cancer; (2) Warning: This Product May Cause Gum Disease and Tooth Loss; or (3) Warning: This Product Is Not a Safe Alternate to Cigarettes. This legislation also directs HHS to conduct and support research on the effects of smokeless tobacco on human health and to disseminate the findings of the research to the general public. HHS must report to Congress by January 1, 1987—and biennially thereafter—on the progress of its health-education efforts.

There is probably not a Member present in this Chamber who has not known a loved one who has been ill or died from an illness attributable to cigarette smoking. When I was a youth, we did not know the dangers of cigarette smoking. Today's youth, however, cannot make the same claim. It is our duty to share our knowledge of the dangers of smokeless tobacco and to make certain that all persons, especially our youth, are making informed decisions regarding the use of smokeless tobacco. Accordingly, I urge my colleagues to offer their full support for adoption of S. 1574 in order to inform the public of the health effects associated with the use of snuff and chewing tobacco.

Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. BLILEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. WAXMAN] that the House suspend the rules and pass the Senate bill, S. 1574, as amended.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the Senate bill, as amended, was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

FEDERAL EMPLOYEES BENEFITS IMPROVEMENT ACT OF 1986

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 4061) to amend title 5, United States Code, to expand the class of individuals eligible for refunds or other returns of contributions from contingency reserves in the Employees Health Benefits Fund; to make miscellaneous amendments relating to the Civil Service Retirement System and the Federal Employees Health Benefits Program; and for other purposes, as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MYERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentlewoman from Ohio [Ms. OAKAR] will be recognized for 20 minutes and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MYERS] will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentlewoman from Ohio [Ms. OAKAR].

GENERAL LEAVE

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks, and to include extraneous matter, on H.R. 4061, the bill presently under consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, today the House will consider H.R. 4061, the Federal Employees Benefits Improvement Act of 1986. This legislation is very similar to H.R. 3384, which was passed by the Congress last December and vetoed by the President on January 17, 1986.

The two provisions in H.R. 3384 to which the President objected have been deleted from H.R. 4061. The present legislation is cosponsored by 28 of my colleagues, including WILLIAM FORD, chairman of the Committee of Post Office and Civil Service, GENE TAYLOR, the ranking minority member, and JOHN MYERS, the ranking minority member of the Subcommittee on Compensation and Employee Benefits. H.R. 4061 enjoys bipartisan support in both the House and Senate and by the administration.

The purpose of H.R. 4061 is to make Federal annuitants eligible for refunds from the Federal Employees Health Benefits Program [FEHBP], and to make other necessary changes in the FEHBP and the Civil Service Retirement Program.

Mr. Speaker, millions of Federal employees and retirees are counting on us today to enact the reforms in H.R. 4061. The legislation will:

Enable Federal retirees to receive refunds from their health insurance plans;

Amend the "Three Medical Specialties" requirement for prepaid, comprehensive plans in the FEHBP;

Grant authority to the Office of Personnel Management [OPM] to waive certain eligibility requirements for annuitants to participate in the FEHBP;

Require OPM to conduct an annual open season;

Provide that FEHBP plans may require referral by a psychiatrist, but not physician supervision, as a condition for reimbursement of clinical social workers;

Permanently reinstate the authority for FEHBP reimbursement for nonphysician health providers in medically underserved areas;

Express the sense of the Congress that sufficient coverage for mental health and substance abuse treatment be available through the FEHBP;

Mandate a study by the OPM of the advisability of requiring direct payments to nonphysician health providers, such as clinical social workers, nurse practitioners, chiropractors, and others;

Mandate a study by the OPM of the adequacy of information services to FEHBP participants;

Require the OPM to establish at least one demonstration project to determine the advisability of health promotion and protection programs; and Allow for participation in the FEHBP by "mixed model" HMOS.

H.R. 4061 also makes technical changes in the Civil Service Retirement System to ensure retirement protection for certain former spouses, as well as other provisions sought by the administration.

As I mentioned, Mr. Speaker, two provisions to which the President has objected are not included in H.R. 4061. The first would eliminate the cap on the Federal Government's contribution to FEHBP premiums. The second would provide for direct reimbursement of nurses and nurse-midwives for covered services rendered to FEHBP enrollees. These provisions were removed from H.R. 4061 in order to expedite passage of the legislation.

I want to reassure my colleagues and the Federal employees that I intend to pursue these issues in the coming weeks.

With regard to the issue of direct reimbursement for nonphysician health practitioners under the FEHBP, this process begins with H.R. 4061. The legislation directs the Office of Personnel Management to study and report to Congress by April 1 on the feasibility of extending direct reimbursement to nonphysician health providers, including clinical social workers, nurse practitioners, nurse-midwives, chiropractors, and others.

I would like to point out, Mr. Speaker, that the issue of direct reimbursement for nurses, nurse practitioners, nurse-midwives, and others is exceedingly important and timely. These qualified health professionals are the mainstay of our health care system. They are the providers who are in constant contact with patients, providing more hours of direct care and counseling than any others. These trained professionals' main priority is to maintain health and prevent the onset of illness. They are not only compassionate, they are cost-effective, and prudent in their fees. I am convinced that our investigation into the direct reimbursement of nurses and other health practitioners will ultimately lead to cost savings in the FEHBP and better quality health care.

As an aside, my colleagues may notice that clinical social workers are mentioned elsewhere in H.R. 4061. The legislation mandates that FEHBP carriers reimburse these providers without any requirement of physician supervision, although physician referral may or may not be required. In addition, however, clinical social workers will be included in the OPM study to determine the appropriateness of direct reimbursement without physician referral. Immediately following completion of the OPM study, I will hold hearings on the direct reimbursement issue in the Subcommittee on Compensation and Employee Benefits and develop appropriate legislation.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, H.R. 4061 makes many important changes in Federal employee benefit programs. Its reforms will promote cost savings and improved administration. I urge my colleagues to give swift and favorable consideration of H.R. 4061.

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. MYERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 4061. I am proud to be a cosponsor of this legislation which will benefit Federal employees, annuitants and their dependents. It has been very ably presented by our Chair in describing the content of the bill.

One thing I think the Chair did mention but needs to be clarified, it does make technical and clarifying changes in the law providing for survivor benefits to former spouses. I think the gentlewoman from Colorado is going to describe this and define it a little bit more later on.

By way of background, the decision to make refunds of excess reserves was negotiated last year with participating carriers based on the assumption that Congress would pass legislation to allow the refunds to be made to the annuitants. These are active employees who would be eligible for refunds under current law.

As the Chair has said, the bill that passed the House last year and was sent to the President was vetoed. The President vetoed that bill on January 17 because he objected to two provisions. The President said he strongly opposed a provision which would have eliminated the current 75-percent ceiling on the Government's share of the premiums of any individual health plan as being excessive costs under the Gramm-Rudman and any other features that we try and hold down spending.

He also said that he had problems with the provision requiring direct access to and permitting direct payment for the services of nurses, midwives and other types of provisions of health care that were unsupervised. As the Chair has said, this legislation does provide for a study and recommendation to be made in this area because there are sections of the country where these services are badly needed.

This bill has strong bipartisan support, as the Chair has said, from both sides of the aisle. President Reagan has made it clear that he continues to support refunds for annuitants. The administration supports the enactment of this bill.

Again, I compliment our Chair. I am proud to be a cosponsor in urging suspension of the rules and passage of this beneficial and important legislation.

I reserve the balance of my time, Mr. Speaker.

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as she may consume to my colleague, the gentlewoman from Colorado [Mrs. SCHROEDER].

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Speaker, I really want to tell everyone how appreciative Federal employees are of the very fast action of both the gentlewoman from Ohio [Ms. OAKAR] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MYERS] in moving this back to the floor.

Mr. Speaker, a lot of people are anxiously waiting for us to pass H.R. 4061. Federal retirees, who lost a promised cost of living increase last month, are waiting for refunds from their health insurance programs. Former spouses of Federal employees, some eligible since last May for survivor benefits under Public Law 98-615, are waiting for confirmation that they will receive benefits. And the Office of Personnel Management [OPM], charged with administering these program, is waiting for Congress to resolve every potential wrinkle in the former spouse benefit program before taking any steps to make the law effective.

Representative MARY ROSE OAKAR and I have received many calls from other Members, from former spouses, and from attorneys, all wanting to know what was holding up OPM's processing of survivor benefit applications. We wanted to know, too. Last week, Representative OAKAR and I wrote to the OPM Director requesting an explanation for OPM's inertia in setting up the former spouse benefit program. A copy of our request is attached.

But we should not enact this legislation just to prod OPM into action. Rather, we should enact H.R. 4061 because it will improve the Federal Employees Health Benefits Program. It will improve the Civil Service Retirement Spouse Equity Program. And last fall we voted to enact H.R. 3384, the predecessor to this bill. I encourage my colleagues to support H.R. 4061.

COMMITTEE ON POST OFFICE AND CIVIL SERVICE,
Washington, DC, January 31, 1986.

Hon. CONSTANCE HORNER,
Director,
U.S. Office of Personnel Management,
Washington, DC.

DEAR MRS. HORNER: We have received numerous complaints from our colleagues and former spouses of federal employees and retirees regarding the implementation of the Civil Service Retirement Spouse Equity Act (P.L. 98-615). We have heard that the Office of Personnel Management (OPM) simply has not acted to process applications from former spouses. It would be useful if you could provide us with the following information pertaining to OPM's administration of P.L. 98-615.

1. How many applications for section 4(b) benefits [employee retired prior to effective date] have been received by the Office of Personnel Management? How many applications are complete and ready for processing?

2. How many applications have been processed? In how many of these cases have checks actually been sent to the former spouse? How much money has been disbursed?

3. Over eight months have passed since proposed regulations to implement P.L. 98-615 were issued on May 13, 1985. What steps has OPM taken to finalize these regulations?

4. What are the reasons for the delay in processing applications? In light of the fact that H.R. 3384 was vetoed by the President and action on a similar bill will take some time, what are OPM's intentions regarding the processing of applications?

5. P.L. 98-615 provides that persons entitled to receive survivor benefits are also eligible to participate in the Federal Employee Health Benefit program. How are health insurance provisions being handled for individuals with pending applications?

6. How many court orders awarding survivor benefits under 5 U.S.C. 8341(h) has OPM received? How many of these records are complete and ready for disbursement?

7. How many of these individuals chose to continue participation in the Federal Employee Health Benefit program? How is this monitored?

Please respond to these questions by the close of business on Friday, February 14, 1986. Any questions should be directed to Cathy Straggas (226-7546) of the Subcommittee on Compensation and Employee Benefits or Andrea Nelson (225-4025) of the Subcommittee on Civil Service.

Thank you in advance for your assistance.

Sincerely yours,

MARY ROSE OAKAR,
Chairwoman, Subcommittee on Compensation and Employee Benefits.
PATRICIA SCHROEDER,
Chairwoman, Subcommittee on Civil Service.

Mr. MYERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOLF].

Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 4061. I want to congratulate and commend the gentlewoman from Ohio [Ms. OAKAR] for her efforts in pushing this legislation and being very, very diligent; and I commend also the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MYERS].

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 4061, the Federal Employees Benefits Improvements Act of 1986. As an original cosponsor of this measure and as the sponsor of legislation to provide a rebate for retired subscribers in the Federal Employees Health Benefit Plan, and also provide a second chance to elect a survivor annuity, I believe this bill represents a balanced approach to several needed reforms in the Federal health benefits and retirement programs.

The refund proposed by the health carriers to Federal subscribers is a positive benefit and one which we should expedite and include all subscribers, both active and retired employees. This legislation improves the benefits structure for Federal employees and retirees and I urge my colleagues to support passage of H.R. 4061.

Mr. MYERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, I am very, very pleased with the cooperation that I have had from the minority. Let me at this point yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GILMAN].

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 4061, the Federal Employees' Benefits Improvement Act of 1986. This legislation would amend and improve the health insurance and retirement programs for Federal employees. In order to ensure that our Government employees are given the opportunity to benefit from an affordable and stable health plan, H.R. 4061 must be made into law. In May 1985, hearings before the House Subcommittee on Compensation and Employee Benefits dealt extensively with the accumulated excess reserve in the Federal Employees' Health Benefits Program [FEHBP]. At the close of 1984, $1.9 billion—or three times the amount considered necessary to assure program stability—had accumulated in program reserve accounts. To draw down excess reserves, 11 carriers will offer rebates to subscribers during the 1986 contract year. However, current law does not allow for such payments to be made to Federal retirees. H.R. 4061 would amend current law to enable all FEHBP enrollees to be eligible for rebates.

In addition, other changes are necessary to improve the FEHBP in order for enrollees to benefit from a more affordable, stable program with a greater variety of choice. H.R. 4061 includes numerous provisions to accomplish these changes.

With respect to retirement benefits, H.R. 4061 amends several provisions in Public Law 98-615, a law passed last year to provide for survivor retirement benefits to former spouses of Federal workers. The bill makes technical changes in the law to clarify congressional intent.

Therefore, this bill incorporates positive changes to improve the Federal health insurance and retirement programs for the benefit of all Federal workers and retirees. Accordingly, I urge the House to fully support and to adopt this legislation.

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume to make a few closing comments.

Mr. Speaker, I was disappointed that the President vetoed the bill, because it included removal of the cap on the Government's health insurance premium contributions. In the long run this reform would have saved a lot of money, because it would have made the health providers a little bit more aware of the competition they have, and so on. I was also very disappointed that the provision mandating direct reimbursement for nurses and others was vetoed; so we are going to carry on with a study in this area.

By the large, I would say the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service really appreciates the work that Government workers do for this country. It is in a bipartisan spirit that most of us work together on these areas, so when I make my following remarks, I am really not speaking of my colleagues on the other side of the aisle who are so cooperative and so supportive.

It is disconcerting to me, Mr. Speaker, that there has been an assault, in my judgment, on the value of Government workers and retirees. We see this with the automatic sequestration of the cost-of-living adjustment for Federal retirees; and I think the American public sometimes does not realize who we are talking about when we talk about Federal employees.

We are talking about drug enforcement officers who are Government workers; we are talking about people who very often run military bases. I know there are several bases in Ohio where there are three military personnel, and the rest are civilians who work for the Federal Government.

We are talking about people who distribute Social Security checks and, yes, our IRS people who have a thankless job, to say the least. We are talking about people who protect our borders so that we are safe and sound as a territory in the international forum. We are talking about air traffic controllers whose value is insurmountable in terms of safety.

We are talking about people who maintain our recreational areas and our parks. We are talking about Secret Service agents who protect, among others, the President of the United States. We are talking about many, many more thousands of people, too numerous to mention; but there is not a job in the United States that in some way or another does not relate to the necessity of having these valued workers.

We are also talking about astronauts. We are talking about people, some of whom sacrificed their lives for this country by taking on a very dangerous mission.

I think the time for attacking Federal employees and retirees should come to a halt. I think we ought to understand that the people I have mentioned, and indeed our own staff, and some of the people who are at the floor recording our words today, we ought to say thank you to these people, and we ought to say that they deserve a just living, they deserve benefits; and retirees who have given their service to this Government deserve a cost-of-living adjustment.

So I just wanted to, by way of responding to the President's veto, indicate that this Chair of a subcommittee is going to speak out very vocally if the budget contains another assault on Federal workers and retirees.

At this point I want to thank my colleagues on the other side of the aisle for their cooperation.

Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of H.R. 4061. I would like to thank my colleague, Ms. OAKAR, for her leadership in the area of FEHB reform, and her persistent efforts to pass this bill.

Last May, Blue Cross and Blue Shield announced that it would pay rebates to subscribers as a result of excess reserves it had accumulated. Since that time, 10 other carriers have joined Blue Cross in offering rebates.

It is now 9 months later, and those rebates still have not been paid, despite universal agreement that they should go forward. This bill will make a very simple, one word change in title 5, which will allow retirees to receive those rebates. It is time that we make this change.

In addition, the bill also makes a number of other necessary changes in the FEHB. It requires OPM to hold an open season in any year in which changes are made in rates charged or benefits offered by any plan, or if new plans are offered or an old plan is terminated. This provision will allow FEHB subscribers to adjust their coverage any time a change is made in the system. This ensures that subscribers have the opportunity to select the coverage that best suit their needs.

The bill also makes a number of technical but important changes to the Civil Retirement Spouse Equity Act. Certain Federal employees, retirees, and surviving spouses of employees were inadvertently excluded from that act, and H.R. 4061 corrects that oversight. The bill also clarifies congressional intent for electing an insurable interest for former spouses, as well as conditions for participation in the FEHB by former spouses.

I believe that it's time this bill was enacted. There is nothing controversial in this bill, and the administration has expressed its support. I urge my colleagues to suspend the rules, and pass this bill today.

Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of H.R. 4061, the Federal Employees Benefits Improvements Act of 1986, and urge that the House suspend the rules and approve this important legislation.

I want to compliment the chairwoman of the subcommittee for her swift action in introducing a bill that would meet the objections raised to H.R. 3384 by the administration. The Federal Employees Benefits Improvement Act of 1985 was the product of a great deal of negotiation, and I was disappointed to learn of the President's veto.

This legislation, H.R. 4061, however, has the strong support of the administration, as well as strong bipartisan backing here in the House.

It is most important that this bill be approved quickly and sent to the President so that we can facilitate health premium refunds for our retirees. Current law does not permit Federal retirees to participate in the rebates being offered to participants in 11 Federal health benefit plans. This legislation will allow retirees, in addition to current employees, to receive these refunds.

H.R. 4060 also contains another important provision. The OPM study of a direct payment program for nonphysician health practitioners is especially important to my State of Alaska. In many areas, physicians are unavailable, and health care is provided by very capable health care professionals such as nurse-practitioners. To the residents of remote areas, these professionals provide the only health care link, and save the cost of a Medevac to a city or similar regional center.

I'll be watching the progess of this study very closely, and know that a program that provides for direct payments to nonphysician health practitioners can only improve health care in Alaska, and other medically underserved areas.

Mr. Speaker, again I urge that the House suspend the rules and approve the Federal Employees Benefits Improvements Act of 1986.

Mr. HOYER. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to strongly support H.R. 4061, the Federal Employees Benefits Improvements Act of 1986. I want to commend the good chairwoman, Congresswoman OAKAR, for her untiring support of Federal employees and retirees. In 1985 Congresswoman OAKAR introduced H.R. 3384, which I was proud to cosponsor and support on this floor. After passage by both Houses of Congress, the President saw fit to veto what was an excellent piece of legislation.

Rather than fight the President over his reasons for vetoing the bill and delay the refund of health insurance overcharges to millions of Federal retirees who have been waiting patiently for their money, the chairwoman has wisely seperated out the refund provision of the bill for quick passage and chosen to fight for the other important provisions another day.

These other provisions are good ones. The 75-percent cap on Federal contributions to health plans for Federal employees could lead to significant cost savings in the future by encouraging more efficient health plans. The other item of Presidential concern is direct reimbursement for services of nurses and nurse midwives, which would also be a cost effective reform. Legislation including these provisions should quickly make its way to this floor so that we may send it right back to the President with enough votes that he will think twice about another veto. But for now, it is more important that we get that overdue refund to our retirees, who have already lost enough at the hands of this Congress and the President. As always, the chairwoman provides excellent leadership for those of us who feel that our Federal employees and retirees deserve better than being constantly singled out to bear a disproportionate share of cuts, and I support H.R. 4061 as a bill which attempts to quickly remedy a cut which the President was all too willing to impose.

Mr. Speaker, as we begin to review this year's budget review process and as we consider next year's appropriations, I hope that we will begin to treat those who serve our country daily with a degree of fairness and equity both in their salaries and benefits while they are employed and in their retirement benefits after they have concluded their service to this country. Let us work to ensure that they are accorded the respect and the compensation that they are due, because without them, what good we do here will have little effect. Without them, the Nation fails. And then, it is not just they who will suffer, but us all.

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Speaker, I strongly support H.R. 4061 and commend my colleague, the chairwoman of the Compensation and Employee Benefits Subcommittee (Ms. OAKAR) for her efforts on behalf of FEHB reform.

This bill does a number of important things. First and foremost, it makes a very simple, but critical change in title 5 to allow civil service and postal annuitants to receive rebates from FEHB carriers. Eleven carriers have announced rebates for subscribers due to excess reserves that have accumulated. Rebates for current employees are already in the works, and it is time we made this one word change in the law to allow annuitants to get them as well.

In addition, the bill requires OPM to study the adequacy of current sources of information on the FEHB. I believe those systems are woefully inadequate. In the 98th Congress, I introduced the "Federal Employees Health Benefits Information Act" which would have established an information center within OPM to act as a national information clearinghouse for the over 10 million Americans covered by the FEHBP. If the study required by H.R. 4061 shows a severe lack of information sources for the FEHBP, as I believe it will, I hope that we will be able to establish a similar office so that FEHB subscribers will have the information they need to make important decisions about health care coverage.

Finally, the bill makes several technical changes to a bill we passed in the 98th Congress, the Civil Service Retirement Spouse Equity Act. Among those changes are a provision which clarifies conditions that allow former spouses of Federal employees to participate in the FEHB. I have received numerous calls from divorcing couples who waited years for enactment of this bill so they wouldn't lose important benefits, and have been forced to wait even longer to be sure of getting health benefits.

Mr. Speaker, I believe this is an important and long overdue bill, and I urge my colleagues to suspend the rules and pass H.R. 4061.

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentlewoman from Ohio [Ms. OAKAR] that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 4061, as amended.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill, as amended, was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

REPORT ON THE EUROPEAN RESPONSE TO INTERNATIONAL TERRORISM

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FRANK] will be recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, I am glad to note that I am being joined on the floor by my colleague from South Carolina [Mr. DERRICK]. Last week, at the request of the U.S. State Department, Mr. DERRICK and I made a rather quick trip to Europe, not the most comfortable way to travel. We each flew over and flew back within a period of much less than 1 week. But it was to attend, as observers, the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe. This is the body that is composed of the 21 democratic states of Europe. It consists of Members of the Parliaments of those 21 states who are sent to this European Parliament in proportion to the party's strength in their home Parliaments.

One of the issues being considered in the current sitting, which began last weekend and will conclude at the end of this week, had to do with terrorism.

Now as Members are aware, we, in the United States, fairly broadly across the political spectrum, have been disappointed by the lack of firm response that we have gotten from many of our European allies in our policy against terrorism.

President Reagan's position against terrorism, his imposition of sanctions, and his effort to rally a unified world response against terrorism, is something that is widely supported in this country. It has no problem in either the partisan sense or in the legislative/executive sense.

I believe the overwhelming majority of the Members of Congress on both sides of the aisle and in both Houses support him.

Mr. DERRICK and I were delighted to be invited by the State Department to travel to Europe as a demonstration, as two members of the Democratic Party, of the kind of support that existed from President Reagan's policy here.

We were able to participate in the deliberations of the political committee and in the plenary. We were both able to speak.

I am very pleased to be able to report that we were able to participate in a deliberation which resulted in the adoption of a very strong antiterrorist resolution. It met; it exceeded the expectations, I think it is fair to say, of the American experts in this area in the State Department. It is the strongest response against terrorism in resolution form from anybody in Europe.

Now I wish it were binding on the governments because I wish we had all the friends and others in Europe adopting this as a policy. It is not. It is a consultative assembly, but it is a very influential one. The fact that this resolution was adopted and was adopted with only one abstention and no negative votes in the plenary on Wednesday, which Mr. DERRICK and I addressed on Tuesday, is very encouraging. I think it helps us get the kind of consensus that we need.

Let me just read the operative paragraph that was added in committee with our full support here:

Invites the governments of the Council of Europe member states to consider together and, where possible, take all measures, whether diplomatic, political, or economic, to deter and retaliate against states recognized as being responsible, directly or indirectly, for assistance to terrorism.

That is the most specific endorsement of sanctions that we have gotten.

This resolution named, again in an amendment adopted, Libya, Syria, and Iran. It quite clearly says that there are no justifications for terrorism. People said, "Well, let's talk about the political situation in the Middle East which might contribute to it." That was voted down because a majority of the members, the overwhelming majority of the members, said that we are not going to suggest anything exculpates this, that anything justifies it. It was a very firm condemnation of terrorism.

I am very delighted to have participated.

Mr. Speaker, I am inserting in the RECORD at this point the resolution adopted by the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe last Wednesday with no negative votes and only one abstention, which is a very, very strong and explicit resolution, not only condemnation of terrorism and of Libya, Iran, and Syria for supporting it, but calls for sanctions to be taken to prevent this wave of murder and kidnaping and assault from continuing.

The report of the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe follows:

COUNCIL OF EUROPE PARLIAMENTARY ASSEMBLY REPORT ON THE EUROPEAN RESPONSE TO INTERNATIONAL TERRORISM PRESENTED BY THE POLITICAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE

(RAPPORTEUR: MR. AMADEI),
January 27, 1986.

The Assembly,

1. Outraged by the wave of murders and massacres perpetrated by various terrorist organisations in several countries, in particular the simultaneous attacks carried out at the airports of Rome and Vienna on 27 December 1985;

2. Recalling its unqualified condemnation of terrorism, which denies democratic values and human rights;

3. Emphasising again that democratic states must combat terrorism while respecting democratic principles and the rights and freedoms guaranteed in their constitutions as well as in the Statute of the Council of Europe and the European Convention on Human Rights;

4. Noting with concern the growing evidence that terrorist organizations receive substantial logistic, political and financial support relayed, in particular, by certain states—Libya, Syria and Iran, among others—in open contradiction with the obligations resulting from membership of the international community;

5. Convinced that co-operation between the member states and the world's other pluralist democracies is the primary condition for effective prevention and suppression of all forms of terrorism;

6. Anxious for a speedy and successful conclusion to the efforts being made at intergovernmental level to set up within the Council of Europe framework an ad hoc political body open to all Ministers who in their national governments are responsible for matters relating to the problems of terrorism and international organised crime;

7. Invites the governments of the Council of Europe member states:

a. to introduce as a matter of urgency new forms of co-operation between their relevant authorities, and especially between police forces and intelligence services,

i. to expose and publicly denounce states which assist terrorism in any way;

ii. to forestall planned attacks and any possibility of attack by stepping up checks and circulating information;

iii. reinforce penal sanctions for all those responsible for terrorists acts;

b. to take action in all international forums, particularly in the United Nations, within the CSCE framework and through more intensive Euro-Arab dialogue, to secure the participation of as many states as possible in the battle against terrorism and the political and economic isolation and moral; condemnation of states which support it;

c. to consider together and where possible, take all measures whether diplomatic, political or economic to deter and retaliate against states recognized as being responsible directly or indirectly for assistance to terrorism;

8. Decides to consider in greater detail, at its next part-session, Council of Europe action to improve co-operation between member states on the lines of this resolution.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time so that my colleague, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DERRICK] who so ably participated in the debate, may take over.

ADDITIONAL REPORT ON THE EUROPEAN RESPONSE TO INTERNATIONAL TERRORISM

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. DERRICK] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. DERRICK. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FRANK] for his kind remarks. We did make a quick trip. I think we were in Strasbourg probably no more than 24 hours.

If I may say so, I think that our trip over there was very worthwhile. It gave me a better understanding of the situation as far as terrorism is concerned, and hopefully we were able to communicate to the members of the Council of Europe better the position of our country.

I think one thing, that has already been pointed out by my friend, is that it is not a partisan position; that it is a united position in this country; the strong, strong feeling that we have opposing terrorism and that we really even hesitate to label it as terrorism but rather to lable it as murder without provocation around the world.

As I was pleased to point out to the members of the council, it was so very, very much in their interest from a parochial sense as well as peace throughout the world, that they join with us in supporting the President's initiatives and other initiatives that we might take because, quite frankly, it was bad for business. And I explained to them how many Americans to whom I had spoken over just the last several months who were anticipating maybe traveling in Europe or other parts of the world, who were hesitant because of the terrorism situation, and what this could develop into, not only being bad for business but being bad for communication between our countries.

I would have to say that I came away with the opinion that these representatives, at least those with whom I spoke, could not possibly have been representative of the governments who failed to support us. They were very firm in their support of the steps that President Reagan had taken on terrorism, and I think we will see some very positive results from the resolution that was passed by the council.

The speech of Mr. DERRICK to the Council of Europe on terrorism and trade is as follows:

REMARKS OF THE HONORABLE BUTLER C. DERRICK, U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, BEFORE THE COUNCIL OF EUROPE ON TERRORISM AND TRADE, JANUARY 28, 1986

I am honored to participate in the 37th Ordinary Session of the Parliamentary Assembly and to represent the House of Representatives of the United States Congress.

Please allow me to comment briefly on a couple of topics which are very important to the Council of Europe and the United States: international terrorism and international trade.

Nearly every day a new act of terrorism occurs somewhere in the world. Americans are distressed and angry over the inability of governments to bring these criminals to justice. The citizens of my country do not understand why other Western nations do not strongly respond to attacks, like the ones that occurred in the Vienna and Rome airports. These are politically motivated acts of terrorism, crimes against the laws of our nations, and unacceptable threats to international peace. Frustrated with the Western world's apparent inability to counter these threats, some Americans have called for extreme measures to prevent such acts and to punish their perpetrators.

Many of our Western friends try to be even-handed in the Middle East. But this policy cannot justify the lackadaisical approach to combating acts of terrorism. Terrorism is bad for business because it threatens tourists; it requires substantial government investments to improve security systems; and it makes businesses reluctant to locate in areas subject to frequent attacks. It also results in the loss of life of innocent civilian men, women and children.

The United States does not ask the nations of Europe to take the lead in combatting this evil, but you must lend your support to our efforts to bring these terrorists to justice. England asked for U.S. support in the Falkland Islands situation and, while it hurt U.S. efforts with certain Latin American governments, we gave support. Yet when things changed and the U.S. invited support from the United Kingdom against Libya, we were turned down. Many Western nations are very tough on domestic terrorism but are reluctant to take action to combat international terrorism.

One of the reasons the West has generally been ineffective in combatting terrorism is due to the lack of cooperation among nations, especially among allies. We are getting to the point where it is a prohibitive expense to combat terrorism alone. Our diplomatic facilities are costing the Western world a lot of money. It might be time for us to ask ourselves whether doing business with a terrorist nation is worth what it is costing us to defend ourselves against terrorism. Are the cost-benefits of doing business with outlaw nations worth the price? When we have cooperation in so many other areas, why is it that this spirit cannot prevail in the effort against international terrorism.

It is the belief of many Americans, and my colleagues in Congress, that if our Western friends would at least collaborate with us and, at minimum not undercut U.S. efforts, we can be more successful. Last week the Second Session of the 99th Congress of the United States convened. Laws were passed in the United States in 1984 and 1985 that prohibited aid to countries that harbored terrorists or supported terrorism, and barred imports from countries supporting terrorism. Funds were also provided for an anti-terrorism program which enhanced the United States' ability to prosecute terrorist criminals.

Many of my colleages in Congress have expressed their impatience over the lack of will of Western nations in capturing and punishing terrorists in foreign countries. Thus, efforts this year in the Congress will be focused on implementing the International Airport Security Act, establishing an International Coordinating Terrorism Committee of like-minded nations that have terrorism problems, enacting legislation to provide for better international exchange of information on passport control, to further upgrade airport security, to try to get an international convention on maritime security, to upgrade our extradition treaty, and to try and get the International Atomic Energy Agency to upgrade its security standards.

The United States is committed to developing new tools to fight international terrorism effectively and in a manner consistent with our legal traditions. We encourage the support of Western nations. Without it, the Western world will continue to be victimized by terrorism, and terrorists will continue to commit wanton acts of violence and destruction to advance their political objectives.

REGARDING ALLEGED INVESTMENTS OF PRESIDENT MARCOS IN THE UNITED STATES

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LEACH] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. LEACH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, every now and then in political life, an issue emerges which is of such a dimension that it is set apart from the ordinary course of claims on time and judgment. Such is the case of a congressional subcommittee investigation into the investments in the United States of the family of the President of the Philippines, Ferdinand Marcos.

At first glance, the subject matter would not appear overly relevant to Congress. After all, in the vast majority of countries in the world, economic conflicts of interest are the norm rather than the exception in political life. Why the Subcommittee on Asian and Pacific Affairs is investigating this particular issue at this particular time is that the size and scope of abuse of power in the Philippines appears to be extraordinary by any standard. Some reports put Marcos family wealth in a category which few, if any, American families rival. Evidence that the subcommittee has unearthed points to a small fraction of this fortune—a quarter billion dollars worth of "walking around money" for the First Lady of the Philippines, according to one critic—being invested in prime New York City real estate.

Given the recent economic decay in the Philippines and the increase in the leftist insurgency feeding upon this decay, the issue deserves to be explored to the fullest extent possible. It may not be a happy event for a congressional committee to investigate the private investments of a foreign head of state, particularly when the country involved has friendly and important geostrategic relations with the United States. There are, however, policy implications for the Congress if it becomes apparent that a country to which we give aid is run by a family which allocates the resources of its land to its own personal use and which, in effect, loots the capacity of the country to achieve responsible economic growth and advance the welfare of its people.

It would appear that the economic infrastructure of the Philippines and the attendant ability of the Government to deal with a violent leftist insurgency is collapsing in part because the moral fiber of the leadership of the country has itself collapsed. Corruption breeds cynicism and the attendant poverty of opportunity for the masses breeds revolution. Any government that enriches itself while impoverishing its people will never be able to ensure domestic stability or meet its international commitments.

The problems involved in the congressional investigation of the Marcos family are myriad, touching on a host of constitutional and civil libertarian issues. Ascertainment of property ownership is extremely difficult when offshore corporations are utilized to shield individuals from public and tax accountability. It is compounded when investment advisers holding inside knowledge have family held hostage to a capricious Philippines political system or are lawyers who maintain that their knowledge is privileged because of the unique lawyer-client relationship.

Several attorneys subpoenaed by the subcommittee were confronted with a legal dilemma of catch-22 proportions. To refuse to answer questions posed by Members subjected them to the risk of being held in contempt of Congress, implying the prospect of jail. To answer certain questions put them in potential violation of the canons of the legal profession which in some States, have been codified in statute.

While precedents are uneven, the courts have largely held that Congress's investigatory powers are second only to its legislative mandate and prevail over privileges which exist in the practice of law or elsewhere. The investigatory authority of Congress is in fact so powerful that, as the ranking minority member of the subcommittee I have been as concerned with its potential coercive abuse as with the substance of the enquiry. The dangers of McCarthyism of the left appear to me to be every bit as grave as that of the right.

The fact that Marcos may be an aggrandizing leader of a foreign state—one who built his early political base on false claims of leading a guerilla band in support of American forces in World War II—does not justify Congress applying anything except the highest investigatory standards. It is technically the case that in policy deliberations, congressional standards need not be as high as judicial, but what the subcommittee is dealing with in the investigation of the Marcos family is the reputation of individuals who are citizens of this country as well as that of political leaders of a foreign state. Rather than lower, a powerful case can be made that the evidentiary standards applied should be higher than those required by a court of law.

On the other hand, issues of this nature can't be ducked. Some have suggested that the inquiry is inappropriate, at least in timing, because of the upcoming Philippine elections and the effect a congressional hearing might have on the outcome. My view is that to restrict or defer attention from the issue could be interpreted as a coverup and as electorally interventionist as proceeding with the inquiry might be. In a democracy, facts should never be squelched. They may not always be happy, but the chips should be allowed to fall where they might, unfettered by concerns for timing.

In any regard, the subcommittee has followed precise and careful rules and procedures and while a preliminary determination to proceed with contempt citations against two individuals has been made, these individuals have been cited in large measure because of their involvement as heads of a real estate investment company rather than as legal advisors to the Marcos family. An attorney with the law firm with which the two individuals mentioned above are associated was not cited by the Foreign Affairs Committee for contempt largely because his knowledge appeared to be derived from performance of strictly legal services.

The enquiry has received a great deal of press in this country and substantially more in Asia. The substance of the issue has been highlighted by concern for the safety of witnesses, the revelation of coded telexes, and lawsuits filed and withdrawn against the First Lady of the Philippines.

The picture preliminarily painted is one of opulent investment by the Marcos family in New York real estate. While conclusive evidentiary aspects of the committee's investigation have been thwarted in part by legalistic exercise of privilege by certain witnesses, only the naive could conclude that there wasn't fire amidst the smoke.

There is, of course, a risk to this type of inquiry, particularly if President Marcos prevails in the February 7 election. But the issues are of such profound international significance that they require addressing. Should American taxpayers be asked to support a foreign government hallmarked by corruption? Are U.S. foreign aid dollars which become fungible parts of a foreign treasury being returned directly or indirectly to our shores as investments of a private citizen? Is the international monetary crisis in part caused by the flight of corrupted capital from the developing world to safe havens like the United States? Are American laws regarding the disclosure of foreign ownership of property in the United States being fully observed? Isn't political integrity the linchpin of effective government of any size or philosophical foundation?

It is my hope that the subcommittee will pursue its enquiry both with regard to the New York real estate as well as with regard to other alleged Marcos investments, which may make this Manhattan property appear a footnote in value, until these questions can be satisfactorily answered.

As a case study, the Marcos investigation provides a glimpse at the dimension of global problems from a particular perspective that demands the heed of all current and budding political potentates. The developing word deserves better.

HIDDEN WEALTH OF MARCOS FAMILY IN UNITED STATES

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. SOLARZ] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. SOLARZ. Mr. Speaker, over the course of the last few months, the Foreign Affairs Subcommittee on Asian and Pacific Affairs has been conducting an investigation into the allegations of massive real estate investments in the United States by Philippine President Ferdinand Marcos and his wife, Imelda.

President Marcos has denied having any such holdings here in the United States, and in an interveiw which appeared in the Washington Post on Friday, President Marcos challenged our committee to produce the evidence which would substantiate the conclusion that he and his wife have indeed acquired substantial real estate interests in the United States.

I accept President Marcos' challenge to produce that evidence, and I plan to lay it before the House during the course of my presentation this afternoon.

I will lay out in substantial and significant detail the evidence both direct and documentary which led me, as chairman of the Subcommittee on Asian and Pacific Affairs—and I believe most of my other colleagues on the committee, as well—to come to the inescapable conclusion President and Mrs. Marcos control a real estate empire in New York worth somewhere in the vicinity of $350 million.

But before I lay out the evidence, I think it may serve a useful purpose to begin at the beginning and to make it clear to the House why the Subcommittee on Asian and Pacific Affairs commenced this investigation.

Our determination to look into the question of the hidden wealth of the Marcos family in the United States resulted from a series of newspaper articles that first began to appear in the American press last June when the San José Mercury News, in California, ran a series of articles describing the alleged real estate holdings of the Marcoses in our country.

Those articles were followed, in turn, by a long investigatory piece in the Village Voice in New York, and then by the New York Times.

In view of the extent to which these allegations, if true, would have had profound implication for American foreign policy and the American Foreign Aid Program for the Philippines, I concluded, in my capacity as chairman of the Subcommittee on Asian and Pacific Affairs, which has jurisdiction over our foreign policy and Foreign Aid Program for the Philippines, that we had no alternative but to commence our own investigation into the accuracy of these allegations.

It soon became clear that the paper trail which would have enabled us to have determined beyond a shadow of a doubt who was the owner of these properties was leading nowhere. It was, of course, no accident that the paper trail was leading nowhere because the ultimate ownership of these properties is in the name of a series of offshore corporations which have very cleverly been established in foreign entities whose rules of confidentiality and secrecy make it impossible for anyone from our country to gain access to the records in the name of these corporations, which would have enabled us to have determined who the ultimate beneficiaries of these properties were.

Once it became clear that we were unable, by tracing the paper trail, to determine who the owners of the properties were, because of the fact that they were held in the name of offshore corporations to whose records we were denied access, we came to the conclusion that the only way we could determine the truth or falsity of the allegations involved in these articles was to subpoena and put under oath in hearings before our subcommittee a number of the individuals who were named in the articles as having been instrumentally involved in the purchase, the acquisition, the financing, and the management of these properties.

It was our hope that by doing so, we would be able to obtain definitive information which those journalists who wrote these investigatory articles were not able to obtain by virtue of the fact that the individuals involved who were named in the articles refused to grant them interviews.

We began our investigation at the staff level, therefore, in the early fall, several weeks before President Marcos of the Philippines decided to call a snap presidential election, which is scheduled for February 7 in his country.

I mention this because as our hearings developed and as it became clear that we were in the process of producing evidence clearly linking these properties to the Marcos family, there were a number of individuals who charged us with holding the hearings for one purpose and one purpose only, which was to intervene in the Philippine elections and, by exposing this scandal, to influence the outcome.

I want to take this opportunity to categorically reject those charges. The truth is that we began our investigation before Mr. Marcos called this snap election. The fact is that we decided to hold hearings on this issue a few weeks before the elections were called.

Under those circumstances, we came to the conclusion that were we to cancel our hearings until the elections were over, we could just as easily have been accused of trying to interfere with the elections in the Philippines by covering up this putative scandal involving the diversion of hundreds of millions of dollars from the Philippines into lucrative real estate investments in the United States.

I remember how, in 1972, the Post Office and Civil Service Committee, under pressure from the administration, canceled a scheduled hearing on the Watergate burglary because of the argument that this might constitute interference in the forthcoming Presidential election in the United States.

Looking back on that decision now, we can see how wrong it was, because our Nation will have to live with the eternal shame of a President of the United States who subsequently was subject to impeachment proceedings in the House of Representatives and forced to resign his office as a result of the information which subsequently came to the attention of the Congress and the country.

So we decided that inasmuch as we would have held the hearings even if there had been no election called in the Philippines, that we had no alternative but to play it right down the middle and let the chips fall where they may and proceed with our hearings as if there had been no election at all.

Indeed, there was at that time a number of people who were suggesting that the elections might very easily be postponed or permanently canceled, and if we were to have waited for the elections to be held, there was a possibility that the hearings might have been postponed indefinitely. In any case, the purpose of the hearings was not to interfere in the elections in the Philippines or to influence their outcome. The purpose of the hearings was to establish whether these allegations concerning the hidden wealth of the Marcos' in the United States was accurate, and if so, what were their implications for American foreign policy and American foreign aid toward the Philippines.

Over the course of the last few months, having made the decision to proceed with these hearings, the Subcommittee on Asian and Pacific Affairs held 6 days of intensive hearings, often lasting several hours at a time, during which we received testimony from 16 witnesses, and during the course of which we have reviewed literally several thousand pages of documents that were produced before our committee as a result of subpoenas authorized by the committee.

Mr. Speaker, I would submit that the evidence produced and uncovered by the Subcommittee on Asian and Pacific Affairs points to the clear and compelling conclusion that Philippine President Ferdinand Marcos and his wife Imelda, the first lady of the Philippines, own at least five properties in the State of New York, including the Lindenmere estate in Center Moriches on Long Island, the Crown Building at 730 Fifth Avenue, the Herald Center, a nine-story vertical shopping mall at 34th Street and Sixth Avenue, 40 Wall Street; one of the largest office buildings in the financial district of Manhattan, and lastly, 200 Madison Avenue, which is considered one of the more lucrative and prestigious office buildings in midtown Manhattan. The total estimated value of these properties is approximately $350 million. These properties, according to evidence submitted to our committee, were all acquired since 1980 through agents acting on behalf of the Marcos' themselves.

Purchases of these properties were structured through offshore corporations registered in the Netherlands Antilles in order to hide the true ownership of these properties.

You may be interested to know that President Marcos' sole visible and public and legitimate source of income is the $5,700 a year he earns in his capacity as President of the Philippines. For someone to have acquired control of a real estate empire in New York with a salary of $5,700 a year suggests either that he has a very good investment advisor or that he has acquired the resources with which to purchase these properties, through presumptively improper means.

There is, of course, no American law which prohibits foreigners from investing in the United States. We welcome foreign investment. The mere fact that these properties were purchased by someone from overseas hardly means that their acquisition was in any way illegal. Nevertheless it appears as if at least one American law may have been violated inasmuch as, according to the Department of Commerce, it appears as if some of the corporations in whose name these properties were purchased have failed to comply with requirements under American law. This law obligates them to disclose to the Commerce Department the identity or at least the nationality of the purchasers of these properties.

Insofar as the Philippines is concerned, there is the very real possibility that the acquisition of these properties through the diversion of hundreds of millions of dollars from the Philippines may have constituted a violation of the foreign exchange laws of that country. In the Philippines, any foreign transaction involving more than $5,000 in foreign exchange requires the approval of the Central Bank of that country.

Last week, the Foreign Minister of the Philippines, in a speech before the National Press Club here in Washington, said that our subcommittee had not produced a single iota of evidence that President and Mrs. Marcos were the owners of these properties. I would submit that in a literal sense the Foreign Minister was accurate. We have not produced an iota of evidence, we have produced a ton of evidence that the Marcoses own these properties, and I will now lay it before you.

Let me begin with the Lindenmere estate, a 13-acre estate in Suffolk County, NY, estimated to be worth approximately $19 million. The subcommittee received compelling testimony from the contractor who was responsible for the construction of the estate that he had seen Mrs. Marcos there on at least five occasions. He also testified that he had been instructed not to mention the fact, although he had been told she was the owner of the property, that she was the owner of the property because she wanted her ownership kept confidential.

Augusto Camacho, the architect who was responsible for the design of the property, sent several letters to Mrs. Marcos which we uncovered during the course of our investigation in which he beseeched her to pay him for the hundreds of thousands of dollars worth of his time and services that he had put into the design of the property, and which he had been unable to collect from her duly appointed agents in New York.

Vilma Bautista, who works at the Philippine Mission to the U.N. as Mrs. Marcos' personal secretary when the first lady of the Philippines is in the United States, according to documentary evidence submitted before our committee, paid a substantial share of the taxes on the Lindenmere estate. Now, if this property was not owned by Mrs. Marcos why would her secretary have paid the taxes on it?

In addition to the evidence which we received concerning the Lindenmere, from the contractor, from the architect and from the county tax records which proved that Mrs. Marcos' secretary had paid a substantial share of the taxes on it, the subcommittee also uncovered substantial evidence that the Marcoses own four multimillion-dollar commercial properties in Manhattan. These include the Crown Building at 730 Fifth Avenue, which is now worth over $100 million, the Herald Center, a nine-story vertical mall at 34th Street and Sixth Avenue which is worth approximately $60 million, 200 Madison Avenue, a prestigious office building which is now worth approximately $80 million, and 40 Wall Street which, at 70 stories, is one of the tallest office buildings in the financial district in New York City which is worth in excess of $95 million. Together with the Lindenmere these five properties are worth approximately $350 million.

The subcommittee has reviewed thousands of pages of subpoenaed documents and heard 2 days of lengthy testimony on the issue of the ownership of these properties from a number of individuals who were intimately involved in the acquisition, management, and financing of these buildings.

We began our hearings on these properties by taking testimony from Joseph and Ralph Bernstein, the heads of the New York Land Co., which is the parent company for the offshore corporations that own these four Manhattan buildings.

□ 1340

The Bernsteins, more so than anyone else, were presumably in a position to let us know who were the owners of these properties, inasmuch as they had purchased the properties on behalf of the ultimate owners and were responsible for their management. And yet, when we called the Bernsteins before us, they refused to answer such simple questions as, "Do you know President Marcos? Have you ever met Mrs. Marcos? Who owns the Herald Center? Who owns 200 Madison Avenue? Who owns 40 Wall Street? Who owns the Crown Building?" on the grounds of the attorney-client privilege.

There is to be sure a time honored and very legitimate tradition in American law of the attorney-client privilege. There are all sorts of circumstances in which the assertion of that privilege would indeed be legitimate. But it was the conclusion of the House counsel and the minority counsel and of an overwhelming bipartisan majority of the Foreign Affairs Committee that in this instance, inasmuch as the questions we were asking related to business transactions rather than to legal advice, that the assertion of the privilege was utterly unjustified. It was for that reason that the Foreign Affairs Committee voted by a margin of 21 to 2 to cite the Bernstein brothers for contempt. We will be bringing that contempt citation before the full House after we return from the February recess.

I would submit that the refusal of the Bernsteins to answer our questions and to assert without justification the attorney-client privilege as the reason for doing so, in and of itself is a very significant development in this investigation. Faced with the very real possibility of having to spend up to a year in jail because of their refusal to answer such questions as whether or not the Marcoses own these properties, we can only ask ourselves, "What possible reason would the Bernsteins have had for running that risk if in fact the Marcoses did not own the property?" If they did not own the properties, the Bernsteins would simply have to have said that they did not own them, and they would not have been involved as a consequence in a contempt of Congress. Indeed Irwin Robinson, an attorney who represented Mrs. Marcos in a suit involving the Lindenmere estate, when asked if he knew whether the Marcoses owned these properties, did not assert the attorney-client privilege and responded by indicating that he had no knowledge that the Marcoses did own the properties.

The Bernsteins' action, therefore, creates a strong presumption that the reason they refused to testify is that they knew the Marcoses did own the property and wanted to protect them from that knowledge becoming public. They did not want to deny under oath that the Marcoses owned the properties because if they did, they would have been running the risk of an indictment not for contempt of Congress but for perjury, which carries with it a sentence of 5 years, not a sentence of only 1 year, which is the case of a contempt-of-Congress conviction.

Now, if the refusal of the Bernsteins to answer the subcommittee's questions was the only indication we had of the Marcoses' involvement with these four commercial properties, it might not have been sufficient evidence to justify the conclusion that the Marcoses owned their buildings. But we have also received documentary and direct evidence which, combined with the Bernsteins' refusal to answer the questions posed to them by the members of the subcommittee, leads in my judgment to the inescapable conclusion that the Marcoses are indeed the owners of these properties. What, then, is this additional evidence?

Five people intimately involved in the purchasing, financing, and management of these properties testified under oath that they were told or given the firm impression by Joseph Bernstein, the head of New York Land, which was responsible for the management of these properties, that the Marcoses owned the buildings.

Victor Politis, a former executive vice president of the New York Land Co., testified under oath that he was told by Joseph Bernstein in May 1984 that Mrs. Marcos owned these properties, and that President Marcos has given them to her a a gift. Some gift. This is a $350 million gift from the President of the Philippines to his wife, the first lady of that country.

Jim Breslin and Morad Tahbaz, who are still vice presidents of the New York Land Co., testified under oath that Joseph Bernstein had given them at a meeting at which Mr. Politis was present the very firm impression that the Marcoses owned these properties.

Barry Knox, another witness who helped arrange financing for three of the buildings, testified under oath that Joseph Bernstein told him, not once but on a number of occasions, that the Marcoses owned these four properties.

Henry Bullock, another witness, the loan officer for the Security Pacific Mortgage Co., who arranged the loans for some of these properties, testified under oath that he had been told by Joseph Bernstein at a meeting at the Trade Vics restaurant in New York on February 15, 1985, that in effect the Marcoses were the owners of these properties.

In addition, Victor Politis, the former executive vice president of New York Land, and Barry Knox, who helped arrange the financing for some of these buildings, both testified under oath that Mrs. Glyceria Tantoco, a very close personal friend of Mrs. Marcos, who had originally represented herself as the owner of these properties, had told them that in fact Mrs. Marcos was the real owner of the properties. And she also told Mr. Knox, who reported this to the subcommittee under oath, that she specifically asked him to create the impression that she, Mrs. Tantoco, was the owner and wanted to cover up the fact that Mrs. Marcos was the owner of these properties.

While this testimony from five witnesses, who were told by Joseph Bernstein and Mrs. Tantoco that Mrs. Marcos was the owner of the properties, is by itself fairly convincing, I grant that there might be some who would discount this testimony on the grounds that it is hearsay evidence and does not constitute in and of itself direct proof of Mrs. Marcos' ownership, together with her husband, of these properties.

But in addition to the testimony of these five witnesses, and in addition to the refusal of the Bernstein brothers to answer the most simple questions about whether the Marcoses owned these properties, we also received direct eyewitness testimony establishing very clearly and convincingly Mrs. Marcos' link to the ownership of these properties.

Mr. Politis, testifying under oath before our subcommittee, described a meeting in October 1984 at a townhouse in New York at which Mrs. Marcos was present, together with Joseph Bernstein, Mrs. Tantoco, Barry Knox, Mr. Politis himself, and others, which was called for the purpose of discussing these properties. And Mr. Politis testified under oath that at that meeting Mrs. Marcos said that she wanted the buildings kept in tiptop shape, and that she wanted the best management for them. Mr. Politis went on to say under oath that Mrs. Marcos also indicated that her major concern with respect to these properties was whether she would be able to pull $70 million out of them by 1987.

In addition, Mr. Knox, the gentleman who arranged the financing for these properties, testified under oath that she had been at three separate meetings at the same building on East 66th Street in Manhattan at which Mrs. Marcos was present, the primary purpose of which was to present Mrs. Marcos with a detailed briefing on the financial status of these properties.

So I think it is very clear that the Marcoses had an interest in covering up their ownership of these properties. They lead, after all, a country in which the economy has gone into a drastic decline, in which almost half the population lives in poverty, and in which a Communist insurgency gains strength and momentum every day, and it clearly was not in their interests to have it known back in the Philippines that while all this was happening, while the people of their country were sinking into poverty, when the Communists were marching on Manila, that they were diverting hundreds of millions of dollars from the Philippines that could have been used for economic development in that country into the purchase of lucrative real estate investments in New York City. So they clearly had an interest in covering it up.

But I would submit that the evidence that our subcommittee has obtained makes it clear that the coverup did not work and that we now have the facts and the knowledge and we know the truth, which is that the Marcoses own these properties.

If Mrs. Marcos did not own the Lindenmere, why would the contractor say he has seen her there five times and why would he testify under oath that he had been told to cover up the fact that she was the owner?

If Mrs. Marcos was not the owner of the Lindenmere, why did the architect of the property send her several letters trying to collect the money which he was owed for his services on the property?

If Mrs. Marcos did not own the Lindenmere, why did her personal secretary pay the taxes on the property?

And if the Marcoses did not own those four big multimillion-dollar buildings in Manhattan, why did the Bernstein brothers, one of whom is not even an attorney, assert the attorney-client privilege in refusing to answer such questions as whether the Marcoses owned the property?

Why did five other individuals who were intimately involved in the acquisition, the management and the financing of these properties, testify under oath that Joseph Bernstein told them that the Marcoses owned these properties, if in fact they did not own them?

Why would another witness have testified under oath that Mrs. Marcos said at a meeting at which he was present that her major concern with respect to the properties was that she be able to get $70 million out of them by 1987, if in fact the Marcoses did not own the property?

Why would the man who was responsible for the financing of the properties testify under oath that he had been at three separate meetings with Mrs. Marcos for the purpose of discussing these properties, if in fact Mrs. Marcos was not the owner of these properties with her husband?

Now, having established the fact that the Marcoses owned these properties, let me say a few words about the implications of these revelations for American foreign policy and the American Foreign Aid Program to the Philippines. It is, of course, up to the Filipino people to determine for themselves the propriety of the acquisition of these buildings by the first family of their own country; but it is up to us to determine the relevancy of these acquisitions for American foreign policy and the American Foreign Aid Program.

The truth of the matter is that we face some very serious problems in the Philippines. It is a country of enormous political and strategic importance for the United States. Our bases there at Clark Field and Subic Bay play a very important role in helping the United States preserve the peace and maintain a balance of power in Asia. If we were ever denied access to those facilities, it would send shockwaves throughout the region. Many countries, ranging from Japan to Korea, to Thailand, to Australia, to New Zealand, who depend on the United States for their own security, would be obligated to rethink their own security calculations.

There can be little doubt that if the Communists ever come to power in that country, the United States will be deprived of access to those facilities.

Over the course of the last few years there has been a clear and direct relationship between the decline of the Philippine economy and the growth of the Communist insurgency. To a very large, if not exclusive extent, the decline in the Philippine economy has in turn been related to the system of crony capitalism established by President Marcos and the government-led capital flight of which the evidence uncovered in our hearings is a very dramatic example.

Consequently, it seems to me, first of all, that regardless of who wins the elections on February 7 that we should insist as a condition for any additional economic assistance that the system of crony capitalism and government-led capital flight come to an end.

At a time of Gramm-Rudman, at a time when we have to cut into so many vitally important domestic programs in our own country, there can be no justification for sending hundreds of millions of dollars in economic aid to help the poor people of the Philippines if simultaneously the President and First Lady of that country are siphoning off perhaps even larger sums that would otherwise be available for economic growth and development in other countries into real estate investments in the United States.

Second, in the event President Marcos should win the election on February 7, I believe that we should insist as a condition for any additional economic assistance to his country that he repatriate the resources used to acquire these properties from the United States to the Philippines so they can be put to work in his own country.

I simply do not see how we can justify to the taxpayers of my district in Brooklyn, or to the taxpayer anywhere else in our country, sending additional aid to a country in desperate poverty like the Philippines if the leader of that country insists on diverting hundreds of millions of dollars from his nation into the United States.

Third, for political as well as symbolic purposes, I believe that we should make it clear that we will no longer provide any economic assistance to the Philippines through the Ministry of Human Settlements so long as it remains the personal fiefdom of Mrs. Marcos.

Fourth, in view of the possibility that some of the resources used to acquire these properties may have come from our Foreign Aid Program, I believe we should expand and expedite the audits and reviews which are curently underway by several agencies of our own Government of the Foreign Aid Program in the Philippines.

In view of a grand jury investigation now underway in Virginia, in which there is reason to believe that evidence has been uncovered involving corruption in the foreign military sales programs to the Philippines, we should immediately commence a review of all commercial military sales to the Government of the Philippines under the Foreign Military Sales Program.

Finally, there is the very real possibility that American law may have been violated by some of those corporations in whose name these properties were purchased. Some of these corporations appear not to have filed disclosure documents, as required by law with the Department of Commerce, indicating the identity and/or the nationality of the foreign citizens who purchased these properties. I believe the Department of Justice should commerce an investigation and, if necessary, prosecute those individuals or corporations involved if it should turn out that they have, in fact, violated American law.

In the final analysis, our policy toward the Philippines will be determined to a large extent by what happens in the elections in that country on February 7. Whether or not the elections are free and fair, or whether or not they are fundamentally fraudulent, will have a significant bearing on our policy.

The administration itself, the Congress by unanimous vote, and millions of other Americans, have expressed their commitment for the cause of free and fair elections in the Philippines.

I can only express the hope that the elections will give the Filipino people an opportunity to peacefully determine their own future. If they do, I think we have no alternative but to respect the result; but if it should turn out the elections are fundamentally fraudulent, we may have to review our entire relationship with the Philippines. It would be very difficult under those circumstances to justify continuing to support a government which would have lost whatever residual legitimacy it may have left. But regardless of who wins the elections on February 7, and I want to stress that this is a matter for the people of the Philippines to determine, it is not up to the United States, it is up to them. Regardless of who wins those elections, I believe our subcommittee has uncovered compelling evidence which leads to the conclusion that the President and the First Lady of that country have acquired a real estate empire in our Nation, and even if it should turn out that not a single cent of American foreign aid was involved, I submit that it would still have profound implications for the future of our foreign policy and our Foreign Aid Program for that country.

Therefore, I urge my colleagues in the Congress to give some thoughtful considerations to the evidence we have uncovered and to weigh in their own minds what the implications of that evidence may be for our future relationship with the Philippines.

Mr. Speaker, I would be happy at this time to yield to my very good friend, the gentleman from New Mexico, who accompanied me on a factfinding mission to the Philippines last April before any of us knew anything about these revelations.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague. I want him to know that that may have been the last time I accompany my colleague to the Philippines, but that does not diminish my admiration for the tremendous work the gentleman has done over the years on this issue, first of all the tying of conditions on the Philippines, the shifting from military to economic aid through his amendment I think made some very constructive signals to the administration that have caused some military reforms, although there is still a tremendous amount to be made.

I think with the gentleman's very close dialog that he has had with Mr. Laurel and Mrs. Aquino, I think he certainly has been a very constructive force.

I think from the evidence he has uncovered, I have followed his hearings very closely, I think they point out the damaging evidence that foreign aid dollars may have been diverted.

I just am one Member of the House who wants to thank the gentleman for generating good public policy and pushing American foreign policy in the direction of not standing for a corrupt dictator, of recognizing the importance of our security interests in the Philippines, of pushing for very fair elections.

I just wanted to have one dialog with my colleague. I am very concerned that by us having sent a congressional delegation to monitor the elections in the Philippines when Mr. Marcos has done nothing to ensure that the elections are not fraudulent, in fact what he had done is increased the possibility with limiting foreign observers from getting close to the polls that we in effect may be sending a signal that after election night that something adverse might happen. It is a concern I have and I just wish to share that with my colleague.

Mr. SOLARZ. Well, I thank the gentleman for his statement. I particularly appreciate his kind words about the work which our subcommittee has been doing.

Let me say that I think it would be a tragedy for the United States if we ended up legitimizing what the Filipino people themselves concluded was an illegitimate process; but I am very hopeful that our observers there will play a constructive role in increasing the prospects for a reasonably free election.

I have discussed this both with Senator LUGAR and Congressman MURTHA, who will be cochairing the delegation. I think they recognize the potential pitfalls involved in coming to any premature conclusions about the honesty of the elections in view of the fact that there are 94,000 polling places and 7,000 islands in the Philippines and it will obviously be very difficult for a limited delegation in one day to reach a definitive determination about the honesty of the electoral process in the Philippines; but I believe that we have such an overwhelming stake in a free and fair election, inasmuch as a fraudulent election would dramatically accelerate the political polarization in the Philippines and could even eventually set the stage for the eventual triumph of communism in that country, that we have no alternative but to do everything we can to increase the prospects for a free election. That is why this House unanimously voted for a resolution, as did the other body, calling on the Government of the Philippines for a free and fair election. It is why we are sending the observer mission over there.

My good friend, the gentleman from New Mexico, while acknowledging that he had been with me in the Philippines in the past, indicated that he had some reservations about returning with me in the future. Let me simply say to the gentleman that I plan to go back to the Philippines myself after the election is over sometime next week, because I believe that whatever happens, whether Mrs. Aquino wins or Mr. Marcos wins, whether it is free or whether fraudulent, will have profound implications for our future relationship with them.

I thought it would be helpful to get a wide variety of views in the Philippines about what we should do in the wake of the election, but I want to say to my friend, the gentleman from New Mexico, that as General MacArthur was able to say, upon returning to Manila, "I have returned," it is my fondest hope that I will be able to say, after going to the Philippines, that after I come back to New York, that I have returned from the Philippines.

UNITED STATES SHOULD NOT INTERFERE IN PHILIPPINE ELECTIONS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BURTON] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, the gentleman from New York, has just taken about an hour to point out that there are all kinds of allegations of corruption that he has uncovered as respects President Marcos and his wife. This concerns me a great deal.

The gentleman's comments which he just made were rife with all kinds of implications which may or may not exist. First of all, he said, "There is a very possibility of corruption." "There is compelling testimony," he said. "There may have been misuse of public funds over there by investing those funds in the United States." And "It appears as if." But there has been no proof, no documented proof beyond a reasonable doubt that these things have occurred.

What concerns me the most is that we must have a good working relationship with the Philippines, with whomever is the ultimate victor, whether it is Mrs. Aquino or whether it is President Marcos.

I was just in the Philippines about 1 week to 10 days ago, and when I was going down the main thoroughfare of Manila a newspaper boy ran up to the car door and knocked on the window and asked me if I wanted to buy a newspaper. The newspaper headline was, "FM and FL"—Ferdinand Marcos and First Lady—"World Class Grafters—Solarz."

That tells me one thing as a Member of Congress: that the gentleman from New York [Mr. SOLARZ], the chairman of the committee that deals with the Philippines in the U.S. House of Representatives, is trying to have an impact on the outcome of the elections in the Philippines. He is trying to make sure that Mr. Marcos is defeated.

I am not here to say Mr. Marcos is lily white. I am not here to say that corruption does not exist in the Philippines. It may very well be that it does exist. And I am not here to say that Mr. Marcos should be reelected or that Mrs. Aquino should be elected. What I am saying is that the United States of America should have a good working relationship with whomever the people of the Philippines choose to elect, and it should be their decision, not our decision.

If we want to get a real "Ugly American" image, all we have to do is start going around the world telling sovereign nations who we think they ought to elect and have them believe that we are dictating to them the policy of their Government.

We need to work with them for economic stability in the Philippines. We need to work with them to make sure that the Communists do not get a further toehold in that part of the world; that the balance of power remains consistent. To that end, we need to make sure that our bases, Clark Air Force Base and Subic Bay Naval Base, remain in the Philippines.

I met with Mr. Marcos when I was in the Philippines and I talked with him at length about our relationship, and he told me that in 1991 the agreements with the United States regarding our bases and our presence in that part of the world would be renegotiated, but that he was sure that the bases would remain. I then met with Mrs. Aquino's people, two of her brothers and other people on her campaign committee, and they told me that our bases would remain through 1991, but at that point, in 1989 or 1990, a decision would be made on whether or not the legislative branch of Government or the people would decide whether or not our bases should remain.

We should have that kind of relationship. We should let them know that we want to help them with their economy, with their military problems, with the problems with the Communist NPA army, but we should indicate to them that we are not trying to dictate who should be the next President of that country.

That country is one of the most literate countries in the world. They know what is going on, make no mistake about it. They know the charges of corruption. They know of these allegations. They know of the charges that have been made against President Marcos' war record. They did not need us to tell them about that. Nevertheless, we, here in this Congress, chose to stick our nose in and start trying to tell them what they already knew. As a result, those people who are for Mr. Marcos are upset with people like the gentleman from New York [Mr. SOLARZ], and those people who are for Mrs. Aquino are upset with other Members of this body because the United States of America, instead of trying to work with those people and help them through a very trying time, are trying to dictate who is going to be the next President of that country. I think that is wrong.

I talked with Cardinal Sin and he is very interested in this election. As a matter of fact, he was the person who was instrumental in getting Mr. Laurel and Mrs. Aquino together on one ticket so that they would be a formidable force to oppose President Marcos. He has very strong feelings about the outcome of this election.

Business people have very strong opinions about the outcome of the election and who should be the victor.

There are people on both sides who feel very strongly, so how can the United States of America come out ahead if we start choosing sides and trying to decide for those people who ought to be their leader. We can only get a black eye and it can only lead in the long run to problems for the United States of America.

Five hundred air miles away from Clark Air Force Base and Subic Bay is Cam Ranh Bay in Vietnam. That used to be our biggest naval installation. Now the Soviet Union has a great armada in there, and if we lose Clark Air Force Base and Subic Bay, you can bet your bottom dollar the Soviets will have a presence in that part of the world and the balance of power will be upset. We must not allow that to happen, and the best way to make sure that does not happen is for the United States of America to make sure we have a good working relationship with whomever is the eventual winner over there.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. SOLARZ] does not do the United States of America and our interests any favor by raising these allegations 1 week before the election. He would have us believe that this just happened; that all of a sudden they were conducting this investigation and the elections came up and it was just a coincidence that this all came to pass at the same time. Baloney; baloney. He has orchestrated this so that this entire scenario would take place just before the election, so that he would have a tremendous impact himself in trying to pick the next President of the Philippines.

The party of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SOLARZ] in the past has made some monumental blunders. They were instrumental in helping get the Shah of Iran thrown out. Look what we ended up with: the Ayatollah Khomeini. They were instrumental in pushing and pushing and pushing in Nicaragua for a change, and I am not saying that was bad, but nevertheless, they pushed for that change and it did take place. Now we have Daniel Ortega and a Communist menace on our front doorstep.

All I am saying is that we should have a good working relationship and let those people know we are concerned about the future of the Philippines, whomever they choose to be their President. What we are doing, or what the gentleman from New York [Mr. SOLARZ] is trying to do is to tell them who ought to be their President. He is raising all kinds of issues that the people of the Philippines already know about and he is creating headlines. He is in the headlines in the Philippines. Instead of just Marcos and Aquino and the issues, we have SOLARZ telling them of corruption that they already are aware of or that they have heard about.

I am very distressed about this. After having been over there and talked to people on both sides of the issue and both sides of this election campaign, I am convinced that there are good people in both camps, good people who want to deal with the problems of the Communist army and the growing Communist threat over there, good people who want to see changes in the military structure so that they will be stronger and be able to deal with any kind of military eventuality, any kind of military threat in the future, good people who want to see a change in the economy of that country, who want to see economic changes that are going to bring about prosperity in the future on both sides of this political spectrum.

For us to jeopardize our interests over there by taking this type of approach, I think, is sorely wrong. I, for one, if this is being broadcast around the world and the people are listening to it in the Philippines as well in the United States of America, would like to go on record as saying that we are for the people of the Philippines, whatever they decide. We are not endorsing President Marcos. We are not endorsing Mrs. Aquino. We are endorsing what the people of the Philippines want. We want to work with you to help build up your economy, to build up your military presence in that part of the world so you can deal with the Communist menace. We want to make sure that our working relationship is so good that you will want to work with us to make sure our bases at Subic Bay and Clark Air Force Base remain so that the balance of power between the Soviet Union and the United States is not disturbed in the long run.

That should be our position. That is my position. I hope the people of the Philippines realize that the gentleman from New York [Mr. SOLARZ] does not speak for the Congress.

(1) such accident caused death or serious personal injury, or could have caused death or serious personal injury;

(e) The provisions of section 8 of the National Bureau of Standards Authorization for Fiscal Year 1983 (15 U.S.C. 275b) shall not apply to any service performed pursuant to this section.

(f) The provisions of this section shall be effective until Congress enacts legislation regarding amusement ride safety in response to the report submitted by the Commission under section 5 of this Act.

SENATE—Monday, February 3, 1986

(Legislative day of Monday, January 27, 1986)

The Senate met at 12 noon and was called to order by the President pro tempore [Mr. THURMOND].

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray.

This is what the Lord says: What fault did your fathers find in me that they strayed from me? They followed worthless idols and became worthless themselves.—Jeremiah 2:5 (NIV).

God of our fathers, the prophet, Jeremiah, reminds us that we are incurably religious. We must worship—if not the true God, we invent substitutes and become like the substitute god we worship—whether it is the God of power, position, prestige, popularity, prosperity, pleasure, or No god, or ourselves. We worship you Lord, not because you need our worship, but because we need to worship. Our humanness is diminished when we fail to worship you.

"I will exalt you my God and King; I will praise Your name for ever and ever. Every day will I praise You and extoll Your name for ever and ever. Great is the Lord and most worthy of praise; his greatness no one can fathom."—Psalm 145:1-2. Amen.

RECOGNITION OF THE MAJORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The distinguished majority leader is recognized.

SCHEDULE

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, under the standing order, the leaders have 10 minutes each. Then there is a special order for the Senator from Wisconsin, Senator PROXMIRE, for not to exceed 15 minutes, and then routine morning business not to extend beyond the hour of 1 p.m., with Senators permitted to speak therein for not more than 10 minutes each.

Following routine morning business, the Senate will begin consideration of Senate Resolution 28, TV in the Senate. That will be today.

Then, on tomorrow, we will convene at 11 a.m., and, after morning business, the Senate will stand in recess from 12 noon until 2 p.m. for the weekly party caucuses. When the Senate reconvenes at 2 p.m., it will resume consideration of and finish S. 638, the Conrail bill.

There is, of course, the joint session tomorrow night to hear the President's State of the Union Message, and that is at 8 p.m. Hopefully, we can conclude action on Conrail by 6:30 or 7 p.m. We should assemble, then, if we do complete action, by 7:30 p.m., so we can go over as a body to hear the President's State of the Union Message.

On Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday, we will resume consideration of Senate Resolution 28, TV in the Senate.

Again, I am not certain what will happen on that particular legislation. I have just not heard from many Members. I know there are a number of Members who strongly support TV in the Senate; there are some who are less than enthusiastic; and some, like myself, who believe that we should do it, but there should be at least minimal rules changes to accompany TV in the Senate, either agreed to now or before we move from the test period on radio and TV into the public phase of TV and radio in the Senate.

Mr. LONG. Will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. DOLE. I am happy to yield.

(Mr. McCONNELL assumed the chair.)

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I am very delighted to hear the majority leader say what he did about the changes in the rules if we are going to have TV in the Senate. The Senate will recall that some years ago we had this matter up and, after debating it for a while, the matter was referred to the Rules Committee by the then majority leader, Mr. Baker. The instructions were that the committee should report a measure back that would contain rules to implement television in the Senate.

Now, I say to our leader, there are some rules changes that are needed badly; that it is inexcusable to understand why we have not done it. They keep being postponed, postponed, and postponed.

I am here to submit to the able leader that, if we do not seize upon this opportunity and tell those who want TV in the Senate that if they want it they are going to have to agree to some rules changes and let the Senate vote on some rules changes, we will never get it.

Just to take one simple example: Why is a motion to proceed still fully debatable? You cannot blame anybody for taking full advantage of it, because they all know it is there and the Senate does nothing about it. But, as the Senator so well knows, one can proceed and debate a motion to proceed for at least 2 days before the Senate can get to the cloture motion. He can still debate, because he still has 1 hour, and he can make motions and things like that, even after it is agreed to.

There are other things that we should look at. For example, we should not have to invoke cloture in order to have germaneness. If you get cloture, you do have a germaneness rule. But when the Senate has an important national issue that should be debated, we ought to be able to bring that matter up and the Senate should be able to impose germaneness on the measure without invoking cloture and limiting everybody to 1 hour and all of the other procedures under cloture. There is no doubt about it, in my judgment, that the Senate would vote for it if they had a chance to vote for it.

Under the cloture rule, after a motion to invoke cloture is filed—the leader filed a cloture motion, and he well knows—the vote on the cloture motion is on the next day but one. This normally means if a cloture motion is filed right now, the vote will not be until Wednesday on the motion to invoke cloture. Forty-eight hours is too long. Senators know pretty well how they are going to vote when the motion is filed. So it should not be more than 1 day. That is just to mention one item.

Another item, may I say to the leader, is that we ought to have a voting machine. I believe every State legislature has one. I do not know of any State that does not have a voting machine. I know they did it in my State of Louisiana. I was a 10-year-old boy the first time I saw it. So we ought to have a voting machine here to expedite the process of the Senate.

There are some other things I could mention. But there are some matters that are so obvious that ought to be considered and voted on that, if you are ever going to get them, you are going to have to get them now.

I told the leader—and I think he knows; he has his own opinion on this—that if you put the Senate on television and if you do not have any rules to limit conversation, the debate could go on forever, because a Senator will see the chance either to help himself with his constituents or else he feels, if he makes a speech on this particular situation, he might be recognized as a statesman throughout the entire country, so that is a good time to make his speech. So if you are going to get some kind of limitation, you better get it as a part of the package, as a part of the deal, before the TV goes on or I do not think you are going to get it.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, let me indicate that I think that is one which has been fairly successful in the House.

I also agree that the American public ought to see the Senate in action. I think we ought to show who is listening in the Chamber in the Senate or in the House. They ought to show the empty Chamber, and not make it appear in Kansas, Louisiana, or wherever their Senator is from that he has everybody riveted to their seats. Often there is nobody in the seats. The Chamber is empty.

I did not disagree with the Speaker when he panned the empty Chamber. I imagine there were a lot of surprised viewers who had believed their Member of Congress really held the Members of the House in rapt attention. They were not even there. They probably were not even in town.

There are other areas that I think we need to be certain we are not going to deceive anyone about. We are going to let warts and all be shown. But the House has rules, and it makes it a bit easier there for them to say nobody can stay on all day. Here you can stay all day, particularly if you have a good crowd. If you had a good viewing audience, it might be something right before election, and I might want to stay on all day rather than vote absentee. Then you could get all kinds of coverage at home.

There are areas I think we need to address. We have experts on rules. Certainly the distinguished minority leader is one. The distinguished Senator from Alaska, Senator STEVENS, has done a lot of work on the rules, as has Senator MCCLURE on this side.

I know there are some who do not want to change the rules. They do not want to change anything. They like it just as it is. I am not asking for many changes. But I hope at least on the motion to proceed we could have 2 hours of debate, and maybe reduce the 3-day rule on reports. There are just a few little things that would make it a bit easier for those who have to manage the business of the Senate.

It all gets back to the quality of life that we talked about. It seems to me that one big complaint I pick up from Members is, "Well, we never really know for certain when we are going to leave this place in the evening."

I just suggest without some rules, and with TV in the Senate, Senators may not want to leave in the evening. Perhaps they would want to be on the evening news.

So I think it is going to be a good debate. I hope we can do it. My view is it ought to happen, and I certainly want to work with the Senator from Louisiana, the distinguished minority leader, and the Senator from Colorado, Senator ARMSTRONG. He has been very active on this side along with the chairman of the Rules Committee.

I reserve the balance of my time.

RECOGNITION OF THE MINORITY LEADER

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Democratic leader is recognized.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may reserve my time throughout the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BYRD. I yield the floor.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR PROXMIRE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE] is recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes.

IS THERE AN OPTION TO DÉTENTE WITH THE SOVIET UNION?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, is there an option to détente? Sure. And there is an option to life. It is called death. Those who would reject détente would take a long flight from life into the grave. We live in a nuclear world. Our world suddenly has become starkly different than it has ever been in all human history in one vital respect. War between the two superpowers will bring death to both. And I mean death. In a superpower war, neither country could conceivably survive as an organized society.

The National Academy of Science has estimated that a tiny 1 percent of the U.S.S.R. nuclear arsenal—that is right, I said 1 percent—delivered on American cities would instantly kill between 35 million and 55 million Americans. Tens of millions more would become terminal, dying of severe burns or radioactivity. Doctors and hospitals would be pitifully inadequate even if all of them survived, and most of the doctors would perish. Most hospitals would lie in ruins. America's major cities would become radioactive garbage heaps.

The Academy of Science has found the clear possibility that the huge and widespread fires in American cities set off by the nuclear attack would kick such an immense concentration of smoke and soot into the atmosphere that sunlight would be shut off from the Earth for many weeks, and the temperature on Earth would drop 45 degrees below normal for a year or so. Agricultural scientists tell us this would devastate much of the world's food supply.

Carl Sagan, the eminent astronomer, has said that nuclear winter would constitute Earth's worst environmental disaster in the past 45 million years. The fact of nuclear winter means that, as the Catholic bishops have declared, for the first time in human history a generation has the power to destroy mankind on Earth.

The hardliners who oppose détente would agree with much of this. Their guru, President Ronald Reagan, has said that a nuclear war can never be won, and must never be fought. How can these hardliners defend their position? They argue that détente is more likely to lead to a superpower war than a policy of standing up to the Soviet Union in firm opposition whenever and wherever superpower interests clash.

In Afghanistan and Nicaragua, in Angola and the Middle East their view is that we should move in with support, including military support, to stop the encroachment of tyranny, and to advance the cause of freedom. They see ideological conflicts everywhere. And I mean conflicts; not differences—conflicts. They believe that if the United States steps back or steps out, the tyranny of Soviet communism steps in. They see the Soviets stopping only when the United States stands up to them. They contend that the Soviets recognize the terrible possibility of nuclear war, too. They believe the Soviets will not impose their tyranny on others on only one condition. That condition is if they know the United States will go to war if necessary to prevent it.

Now how about it? Which policy is more likely to lead to peace and life? Basically détente is right. We Americans have no real choice in this nuclear world except to live with the other superpower. They are here to stay. They have not advanced their Marxist philosophy or their military power anywhere in the world. They have failed in their economy. Their people suffer in a gray, grinding poverty. They have miserably flopped in little primitive weak Afghanistan where their military effort has been pathetic. No where in the world have their troops won a clear military success except in their puppet satellites in Eastern Europe.

Obviously, the free world has nothing to fear except our own paranoiac dread of the Soviets. We can negotiate with this superpower in the knowledge that we—not they—have the superior military power. We—not they—have the superior technology. We—not they—have the superior military allies. What more do we need or want? Our paranoia, our fear that the Russians are 10 feet tall, could push this country into a direct military conflict with the U.S.S.R. in Africa, or Asia, or Europe.

Consider Europe. Our troops in Europe are loaded with tactical nuclear weapons. We have refused to renounce a first use of these mininukes in the event of a conventional conflict with the U.S.S.R. Meanwhile we have also refused to try to negotiate a verifiable end to nuclear weapons testing.

So both superpowers continue to develop smaller, cheaper more devastating nuclear weapons. These are the weapons tailor-made for the scores of smaller nations thirsting for a nuclear equalizer. Both superpowers and all mankind can gain from détente, and lose with confrontation.

THE MYTH OF THE DAY

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, the myth of the day is that spending cuts alone will balance the budget. That myth has been given up by most people, but a few, adamantly opposed to any new taxes, still cling to it. Even they will now have to rethink their position after looking through a remarkable book published by the Heritage Foundation.

That book, "Slashing the Deficit, Fiscal 1987," is a search and destroy mission against Federal spending. Had General Sherman been as thorough and as ruthless on his march to the sea, Savannah, GA, would still be in ruins.

What sort of spending cuts does the Heritage Foundation propose? Start with the outright elimination of 25 programs, ranging from the Export-Import Bank to rural housing assistance. Add a bracing dose of privatization, for example, selling the Bonneville Power Administration and placing tolls on some interstate highways. Then stir in savings from highly controversial proposals such as charging some veterans for their health care.

My abbreviated summary does not do justice to the scope and ruthlessness of the foundation's proposal. There are recommendations in it which are certain to raise the hackles of even the most committed antispending Member of Congress. Set aside all political objections, however, and assume that every recommendation were to be adopted by Congress. I am not advocating such a course, but do want to demonstrate the magnitude of the deficit.

How much would be saved? About $120 billion, using the most optimistic technical assumptions imaginable. If more reasonable assumptions about speed of implementation, possible termination costs, and savings on interest are made, then the potential savings drop to $100 billion or less.

Picture this, Mr. President, Here is an organization—the Heritage Foundation—with not a liberal bone in its body. It loathes Federal spending. It looks on taxes as akin to the plague. Yet that organization can suggest no more than halving the budget deficit by relying on spending cuts. And many of these recommendations will be renounced by conservatives in this body.

Do we need more revenue so the deficit can be eliminated? The answer is an irrefutable "Yes."

THE ERITREAN CONFLICT AND THE GENOCIDE CONVENTION

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, the Eritrean conflict in Ethopia continues as one of Africa's longest and least publicized wars. The Ethiopian Government is fighting Eritrean rebels in order to keep open its two major ports on the Red Sea. Ethiopia's overall objective, however, is to prevent the rebels from establishing their own nation. This past fall, Ethiopia launched its eighth major military offensive in as many years into this area.

The civil war began when Ethiopia overrode the post-World War II U.N. guarantee to allow Eritrea to exist as an autonomous territory. Eritrea was forced to submit to a new official language. Its elections were rigged, and finally, in 1962, Ethiopia annexed this area.

Mr. President, Ethiopia has revealed that its war aim is not simply to maintain its ports on the Red Sea, but to deny Eritrean ambitions to become an independent nation. The Government's army pursues this aim by inflicting damage upon combatants and civilians alike. Relief workers report that rural peasants are forced to abandon their farms because of the destruction wrought by the war, which compounds the impact of a 10-year drought. Reports describe advancing soldiers routinely burning crops and houses, stealing and shooting livestock, and raping Eritrean women.

Relief agencies have shipped supplies to provide for the basic needs of the homeless and starving refugees. The United States has pledged 25,000 tons of food for Eritrea, and a nearby region also affected by the civil war.

Mr. President, is material assistance all that we can provide for the Eritreans, a people whose nationhood is being denied? What step can we take to object to this moral wrong?

Mr. President, the Genocide Convention is designed to prevent and punish acts committed with the intent to destroy a national, ethnic, religious, or racial group. Ratification of this treaty would allow the United States to take its place alongside many of its allies in opposing genocide. Why must we continually hesitate to take action when moral wrongs are committed frequently against people such as the Eritreans, reminding us that we must act now?

I yield the floor.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There will now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business not to extend beyond the hour of 1 p.m., with Senators permitted to speak therein for not more than 10 minutes each.

NEW SCHOLARSHIPS TO IMPROVE U.S. STANDING IN CENTRAL AMERICA

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, a few weeks ago the New York Times carried an article describing a new U.S. Government-sponsored Scholarship Program aimed at improving relations between the United States and Central America.

This is a program which was recommended by the Commission headed by Henry Kissinger last January, as a new way to build lasting links between our two regions.

I rise today to applaud the creation of this program, and to congratulate those who are now involved in administering this very important new initiative.

According to the New York Times article, which is dated January 12, 1986, the program is administered by the U.S. Information Agency, and will involve at the outset 150 college students who will come to the United States from Central American countries to engage in a wide range of academic studies.

This is another example, Mr. Presdient, of what I think is an important way that we can improve our standing in many areas of the world. And this is not just for the political advantages that this may bring. There are some very real economic benefits involved for us as well. To give an example, a few years ago as I was conducting hearings in the Subcommittee on Agriculture appropriations we had before us the Director of the Office of International Cooperation and Development, Dr. Joan Wallace and I asked her if it would be possible to develop a new program to be administered by her agency in the Department of Agriculture that would bring foreign studens who were interested in studying agriculture subjects to the United States.

We found that there was a program that provided some scholarship funds in AID, the Agency for International Development. But these were funds targeted to the smallest and poorest countries around the world. There were many other nations who would like to participate, we found, in a program of that kind but were ineligible because they were classified by the Department of State as middle-income countries and perceived to be financially able to pay for sending their own students or otherwise take care of the problems themselves.

In spite of that, at my request we appropriated $1.5 million to start a scholarship program that involved agriculture students from abroad. I am taking advantage of this opportunity today, Mr. President, to advise the Senate that this program has been a resounding success. We are in the third year of the program. I can say from a report I received just last week from Dr. Wallace that countries around the world who have participated, agriculture cooperators who are promoters of U.S.-grown agriculture products abroad, and the students themselves who have had an opportunity to participate are all enthusiastic about the program.

In the first year of the program, 102 foreign students were here in the United States from six countries: Korea, Mexico, Venezuela, Colombia, Turkey, and the Ivory Coast. Fifty-eight percent of them were from government services or organizations, 9 percent came from academic pursuits back in their home countries, and 33 percent were from private business.

They were enrolled in university and college classes all across America. They were involved in research projects at the Department of Agriculture laboratories, and they participated in many practical, hands-on learning experiences in our agriculture areas.

The subjects they studied ranged from processing of commodities to marketing to disease control and animal science.

Evaluation of the training experiences has been extremely positive by those who were involved.

There have been some specific example cited of sales of U.S. commodities and of U.S. business products—as a result of these training experiences.

The two most often mentioned benefits according to the students themselves were improved skills and the establishment of valuable U.S. contacts. That goes right to the heart of the reason why this is a wise investment, from a business standpoint. The students become familiar with our technologies. The students also become familiar with the types of machinery and equipment used in the United States, and manufactured in the United States, in the agriculture sector. So the likelihood is upon graduation, or once these students get back into business in their own countries, they will want to work with, be involved with, the same technologies, the same equipment, the same machinery, with which they become familiar in the United States.

To give an example of how successful this program is as viewed by the foreign countries, we are seeing more and more contributions being made by the countries sending students to help pay for transportation costs and the like, to make the U.S. dollars go further so that more students can participate in this program.

We are also seeing organizations, such as the American Soybean Association, the U.S. Wheat Association, and the U.S. Feedgrains Council, contributing their own money to help defray the cost of these training programs.

What does that tell you? These people are in the business of selling U.S. grain, U.S. wheat and U.S. soybeans overseas. Some were worrying when this program developed that we were going to be training these agriculturalists, giving them technology and knowhow, so that they would go home and compete with us and make it more difficult for us to sell in international markets.

Just the opposite is occurring. We are seeing our ability to sell in those countries that are sending these students improve as a result of this experience.

This year is the third year of this new program, Mr. President. I am confident that before the year is out we will be able to present to the Senate a full report with details of the countries that have sent students to study in the United States, the numbers involved, and probably more data on the return of our investment.

Let me simply conclude by saying that we only need to look to the Soviet Union's recent investments and the recent investments of Eastern European countries in programs of this kind to see how much emphasis is now being placed on the exchange of information and the exchange of people in the college and university environments.

The article I mentioned points out that in 1982, 37,000 students from Africa studied in the Soviet Union or Eastern European countries—37,000.

Do you know how many studied in the United States that same year? Eight percent of that number. Fewer than 3,000 came to the United States under our Government sponsorship.

We do have the benefit in our country of private foundation activity in this area. There are many groups who are involved in providing funds from the private sector to help make it possible for students to spend a year or two studying in some country other than their own.

One example that I am personally familiar with is the Rotary Foundation. I had the privilege and honor of having a fellowship 1 year and studying in Europe under a Rotary Foundation fellowship.

There are many other activities for American students and even foreign students to come here under the auspices of academic and cultural exchange programs which may not be available in the Soviet Union or Eastern European countries. That may be one reason why those numbers are skewed so much, that the big number of 37,000 attributed to scholarship programs for Africans in the Soviet Union is government-sponsored activity.

What I am saying is that our Government ought not to lose sight of the fact that it does play a vital role in promoting exchanges of this kind. There is a definite economic benefit. There is an obvious political benefit to the United States for continuing to support activities of this kind.

The article I mentioned is a clear example of a new program which we have developed. I referred to a program which is just 3 years old which I hope can be continued after the end of this fiscal year. I think the evidence is going to be overwhelming in support of a continuation of the program administered by the Office of International Cooperation and Development. I will wait until the appropriate time before I reach a conclusion and make a final recommendation to the Senate on that subject.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article to which I referred from the New York Times be included in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, Jan. 12, 1986]

NEW SCHOLARSHIPS AIM TO IMPROVE U.S. STANDING IN CENTRAL AMERICA

(By Gene I. Maeroff)

More than 150 college students from seven Central Amerian countries, including Nicaragua, are to arrive in Miami tomorrow under a new scholarship program through which the United States hopes to improve its relations in the region and counter Soviet influence.

The $3.8 million program, the Central American Program for Undergraduate Scholarship, is an outgrowth of a Presidential commission headed by Henry A. Kissinger that recommended such aid last January as a way "to build lasting links between Central America and the United States."

MUCH BROADER PROGRAM SEEN

The students arriving this week, officials say, are predominantly from poor rural areas and might otherwise have gone to study in the Soviet Union and other Communist countries.

If the program, sponsored by the United States Information Agency, is successful, it could become a model for a much broader one in which the government would bring poor undegraduate students from all parts of the world to study in the United States.

"In the past, those coming here for undergradutate study have been self-financed and more affluent, leaving the Soviets to concentrate on those who couldn't afford to go to the United States," and Paul White, chief of the Bureau for Latin America and the Caribbean of the Agency for International Development.

Mr. White's agency and the U.S.I.A. are mounting companion programs that could bring more than 4,000 undergraduates from Central America to the United States to study for bachelor's degrees by the early 1990's.

FOCUS ON UNDERGRADUATES

The unusual factor is the focus on undergraduates. In the past, students brought to the United States have largely been graduate students, scholars and technical personnel.

Federal officials also said the ventures marked a new emphasis on Central America, a region long neglected in education programs.

"This is the forerunner of a sizable flow of youngsters from less privileged backgrounds," said Richard Dye, vice president of the Institute of International Education, a private agency that helped set up the program.

The effort in Central America is regarded by its proponents as a potential model for similar projects elsewhere under the Third World Undergraduate Scholarship Act. Congress passed the legislation last year and the President signed it, but so far the project has received no funds.

When the bill was discussed in the House, one of its backers, Representative Jim Wright of Texas, the majority leader, said:

"Rich students come to the United States; poor students go to the Soviet bloc countries on full scholarships. In 1982, for instance, 37,000 Africans received an education in the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe completely at Government expense. That same year fewer than 3,000 Africans came to study in the United States under our Government's sponsorship."

Congress has given the information agency $3.8 million for the program that starts tomorrow and told it that future funds will depend on how well it works. The House Appropriations Committee's Subcommittee on Commerce, Justice, State and Judiciary refused to promise support for eventually bringing 3,000 undergraduates to the United States from Central America.

IMPACT ON YOUNG STUDENTS

Subcommittee members, more accustomed to short-term programs for older students, were uneasy about the impact on less mature undergraduates who might be more inclined to remain in the United States. The members also said they had reservations about starting a large scholarship program for foreigners while domestic student aid programs faced cuts.

The students arriving tomorrow are to spend three days being oriented to American college life at Miami-Dade Community College and then depart Jan. 16 for 12 campuses around the country.

"We're excited about it, and we have had an overwhelming response from our community," said Wynn De Bevoise, project coordinator at the University of Louisville, where 15 of the students have been assigned.

Most do not speak English, Mrs. De Bevoise said, and are to spend six to eight months learning English before they begin regular courses.

SIX ARE FROM NICARAGUA

The 154 students to arrive in Miami include 24 from Costa Rica, 23 from El Salvador, 26 from Guatemala, 25 from Panama, 30 from Honduras, 20 from Belize and 6 from Nicaragua.

Two private agencies, the Institute of International Education and the Latin American Scholarship Program for American Universities, helped information agency officials and representatives of the Central American governments choose the students.

The information agency sought students who were within about two years of completing bachelor's degrees. Most are in their 20's and are entering the third year of college. Among them are 40 school teachers whose classes are to be taught by Peace Corps volunteers while they study in the United States.

Most of the others are pursuing degrees in the social sciences and humanities. Past scholarship programs aimed mainly at students in science, engineering and technical fields.

The students are to attend the University of Louisville, Iowa State University, the University of Texas at El Paso, St. Michael's College in Vermont, Linfield College in Oregon, the University of Arkansas, Spring Hill College in Alabama, Louisiana State University, the University of Wisconsin-Eau Claire, Murray State University in Kentucky, Mankato State University in Minnesota and Indiana University of Pennsylvania.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, in accordance with provisions of rule VI of the rules of the Senate, I ask unanimous consent to be absent from the 6th of February to the 25th of February to perform certain duties for the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE NEED FOR A CLEAR AND COMPREHENSIVE NATIONAL STRATEGY

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, over the years, members of our committee, particularly Senator GOLDWATER and Senator NUNN, have strongly voiced the need to improve the method by which the Congress receives from the executive branch positions covering U.S. foreign policy objectives and the supporting defense requirements.

For years Congress has collected this body of policy information in a very diverse manner: Presidential Address, posture statements, hearings, fact sheets, reponses to questions, and the like. Further, the information comes fragmented—presented at different times, to different committees, in different versions.

This historical practice, in part, will continue; but to be more effective, our budget process should begin with the presentation of a national strategy. With defense budgets ranging around $300 billion impacting upon State Department budgets of over $12 billion, it is essential that Congress receive at the very beginning of the budget process a foundation documentation of our national strategy—a coordinated, comprehensive description of our foreign policy, our worldwide commitments, and the requirements of our national defense to deter aggression and implement our foreign policy.

I recently researched a statement Senator GOLDWATER made in a speech to the American Business Press in 1983, indicating his concern on this issue:

We need a grand strategy and we need it now. It must be coherent. It must be realistic. It must be sufficient to deter our enemies and protect our friends. And it must be understood by the American people and have their support.

The Armed Services Committee is now in the concluding stages of devising a bill intended to strengthen elements of our defense organization and to improve the interface between Congress and the executive branch on defense and foreign policy issues. I shall be submitting an amendment to this bill which relates to the procedure by which Congress receives a foundation report. This amendment will require that:

The President provide a foundation report on the national strategy to the Congress at the beginning of each year. The chairman of the Armed Services Committee and the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate will convene a joint hearing to receive this report and request the Secretary of State and the Secretary of Defense jointly appear to present the report. A similar procedure will be followed by the House of Representatives.

These hearings will take place annually following the President's State of the Union Message but prior to hearings on the annual posture statements.

In recent years, the respective chairmen and ranking minority members of the Senate Foreign Relations and Armed Services Committees have been achieving increased coordination between these committees. This amendment provides the opportunity to further advance these efforts and to provide both committees with a common point of departure as they proceed to perform their respective responsibilities.

Strategic consensus requires almost unprecedented cooperation, agreement, and coordination among policymakers, strong and dedicated administration leadership, and commitment by Congress and the American public to support force deployments and resource requirements demanded by such fundamental decisions.

But at least we can begin our legislative process each year with a better understanding of an administration's view of our national strategy.

Mr. President, at this time I want to recognize the efforts of our distinguished chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee [Mr. GOLDWATER] and minority member [Mr. NUNN] for the leadership they have given in bringing the defense reform issues to a point where a markup session can be started.

I also want to comment on an article which appeared in the February 3, 1986, edition of Defense News entitled

"Warner Building Barrier Against Reorganization."

In that article it was inferred that I intended to do whatever is necessary to block the attempts of other Senators to reorganize the Defense Department and that I would be marching off in my own direction when the committee begins to consider its reorganization bill this week.

This article has misinterpreted my comments. I completely support the efforts of the committee to bring about positive change, where necessary, in the Department of Defense. I have worked and will continue to work diligently to that end.

The thrust of my work is that I believe the system is not broken, but at the same time, there are aspects of the Department of Defense which can be improved.

This is an important challenge and I welcome the opportunity to work with all members of the committee to make a solid contribution.

JOHN FLINK

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I would like to say a few words today about John Flink, my press secretary, who is leaving my staff after loyal service of 7 years.

I would like to concentrate first on the qualities that made John an exceptionally fine press secretary, as well as a policy advisor. Above all, he is a clear thinker. I always recommend to my staff the slim volume entitled, "Elements of Style". In that book, E.B. White teaches us to use the simplest words to most clearly express an idea. Even if one adopts all of those rules, the writing on complicated issues will never be clear unless the person who pens those words thinks clearly. John Flink does.

Moreover, John is a steady hand. He is incapable of overstatement. He has a quiet presence and an institutional memory that made him trustworthy for the rest of my staff and the press corps in Montana and in the Capitol. In short, John Flink had good judgment and integrity that people trust.

A few final personal thoughts about John. His interest in running emerged at the same time as mine, and both of us helped each other when neither of us really wanted to run.

There is an old saying that "still waters run deep," and I can think of no one who better depicts that description than John Flink. When he goes home at night, I know that he spends hours listening to fine music and consuming a wide variety of good literature. He is a deep thinker about many things; theology, world issues, and personal freedoms. He is a good listener, and he was a wonderful and loving husband to his late wife, Kathy.

I will miss John, and I thank him for the service he has rendered to me and to the people of the State of Montana.

SOVIET GESTURE TO JUDITH RESNIK AND CHRISTA McAULIFFE

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, the announcement by the Soviet Union that it will name two craters on the planet Venus after Judith Resnik and Christa McAuliffe is a fitting tribute to the two women who perished in the tragic explosion of the Challenger.

This move by the Soviets, whose cartographers are creating the first map of the surface of Venus, is a thoughtful gesture that could—if only in passing—bridge the deep gap that divides our countries.

People throughout the world that cherish the quest for knowledge and exploration are deeply saddened by this tragedy.

Over the weekend, all across this Nation, Americans paused to pay tribute to the seven members of the Challenger crew.

Judy Resnik and Christa McAuliffe hold a special place in our hearts.

Ms. Resnik, who comes from Akron, OH, was on her second space trip. She was thrilled by her job and was an inspiration for all young women who see space exploration as a challenging and exciting goal. Those of us in Ohio were particularly saddened by the untimely death of one of our own.

Ms. McAuliffe was the best known of the seven because she was the first civilian rider on a space mission. As a school teacher, students throughout the Nation looked to her as a special hero and truly so.

The sudden end of the Challenger's journey does not mean that the mission of these two end in failure. Indeed, they succeeded in forging a path into space technology for women and civilians that will remain forever.

To them we owe a deep sense of gratitude, and this designation on the planet Venus will be an everlasting rememberance of their contribution.

EXPRESSION OF CONDOLENCES

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. President, I bring this telegram to the attention of the Senate as the President of the United States group of the Interparliamentary Union. It is the international organization to which we have belonged throughout most of this century, and to which 104 nations now belong. The union is based in Geneva, Switzerland. One of the nations which almost invariably supports the United States in most political contests and philosophical views has been Belgium. I have in my hand a telegram from the president of the Belgian group of the Interparliamentary Union in which he expresses his personal and his country's sympathy to the Congress of the United States and to the Nation on the tragic accident to our Challenger.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the telegram be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

For Senator STAFFORD.

The Belgian group of the Interparliamentary Union and its American section express their pain and their condolences to the American Interparliamentary group and to the Congress of the United States after the tragic accident of Challenger. The sympathy of the members of the group go to the families of the seven who offered their lives for the progress of science and human knowledge.

Senator JANINE DELFUELLE, President, Belgian American Section. Senator D. DE CLERCO, President, Belgian Group IPU.

The conforming changes must be limited to lineation and pagination.

["No Senator shall call up more than two amendments until every other Senator shall have had the opportunity to do likewise.".]

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I will have a statement later, but I am prepared to turn the resolution over to the manager on this side, the distinguished chairman of the Rules Committee, Senator MATHIAS.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr President, I thank the majority leader. I thank him for giving me this opportunity to address the Senate, but more than that I thank him for calling up this resolution because I think it is an extremely important resolution.

It is not novel. The Senate has had a long time to think about it and consider it. I think it is good that we begin early in 1986 to consider a subject which many of us feel is essential for the future of the Senate in its relationship with the American people.

Some four decades ago, a joint resolution providing for radio broadcast coverage of the proceedings of the Senate and the House of Representatives was introduced. It was a historic first. It was the first legislative initiative taken to open up the Halls of Congress to the electronic age.

Since that time, versions of that resolution have come to include television.

These proposal have tracked the development of the electronic media itself.

Today radio and television coverages of the legislative proceedings are a way of life in the other body. But this is still not so in the Senate, despite the years of consideration, many hearings, and a great deal of private discussion.

So once again we meet to address the issue that is embodied in Senate Resolution 28, the resolution introduced by the distinguished minority leader, one to which he has given a great deal of thoughtful and positive consideration.

As amended in the committee by Mr. GORE, Senate Resolution 28 establishes a test period during which the Senate proceedings will be broadcast live on radio but will be televised only on the in-house closed circuit congressional system. I think that ought to be clearly understood. We are not talking about going to the networks, we are not talking about going to the cables, we are not talking about going to the world; we are talking about video on an in-house closed circuit congressional system just for a test period.

The test period will end only after another resolution has been considered and acted upon by both the Committee on Rules and Administration and the entire Senate. Thus, no television signal can reach the public now. There may be some regrets about that, but sometimes you have to go slowly. No television signal will reach the public, and permanent public radio broadcasts will not be finally authorized, until there is another affirmative decision, a second action taken in the Chamber, taken by, again, to repeat, by the Committee on Rules and by the Senate.

The committee believes that the test period represents an important opportunity for Senators to experience televised proceedings before the public spotlight is turned on. After all, we have not met in private, except under unusual conditions, for many years. We have had the privilege of having our proceedings witnessed by visitors in the galleries, so we are not entering a totally new experience. But we are not going to broadcast these signals until the test period is completed. The test period should be used to review and consider rules changes that have been suggested by the distinguished Senator from West Virginia, Mr. BYRD, and by other Senators, that the introduction of the television cameras may necessitate.

We may find during this test period that some changes are needed. I believe the Senator from West Virginia believes that. This is our opportunity to test that theory.

Whether, in fact, any rules changes ultimately will accompany a resolution to televise Senate proceedings, or whether they should be considered separately, will be up to the Senate. It will be determined by the committee and the Senate. But it is the intention of the committee that the rules changes be considered concurrently with the closed-circuit television broadcast test.

Radio and television coverage of the Senate would be, in my judgment, beneficial in a number of ways. I think that a thorough knowledge and understanding of history is important in the discharge of public duty. And this would be, for the first time, an accurate, historical record of what transpires in the U.S. Senate.

I am a great admirer of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as it is presently published. It is a wonderful and a useful document. But, as the clerks on the rostrum who sit here hour after hour, day after day, month after month, are well aware, it is not a precise, historical record of what has occurred here. It is revised, it is extended, it is added to, it is supplemented and sometimes things are deducted, things are expunged. So it is a highly edited document.

This video tape will provide for all time the complete historical record of what occurs on the floor. And that is of some importance. It will preserve the voices, the facial expressions, the triumph and the pain of Senators who are engaged in a debate.

And this will not only be of historical significance but, to the contemporary public who may see it if we authorize it to go to the networks and to other outside media, to that contemporary public it will add a new dimension to the public's understanding of the Senate's business. The public will become a part of these debates. They will see them. They will hear them. They will get some sense of the personal interplay that goes on among Senators which affects this Nation. In effect, it will bring the debates in the Senate to life. It will make the Senate once again the great forum of debate in America.

Now, there is another important question, and that is the question of fairness. One of the objections to television in the Senate has been the concern that, on occasion, the Presiding Officer might not be fair, might exhibit some bias when making rulings from the Chair. And some have argued that if there were to be some case of unfairness, or some case of bias on the part of the Chair—God forbid—but if it should happen, that the effect of that would be exaggerated on camera, that the error, if error were made, would be perpetuated on film.

Well, I understand that that is a very valid concern and it is one that certainly should not be ignored. But, in all these questions I like to rely on that great 18th century English marvel, Dr. Samuel Johnson, a man who wrote the dictionary and who was so full of human wisdom. Dr. Johnson once said that the greatest inducement to a clear conscience is the suspicion that someone is watching.

Well, if we have more than a suspicion that someone is watching, if we know that the entire American people are watching, I believe that the Presiding Officer of the U.S. Senate would be extremely careful to be impartial and just and fair. The Presiding Officer in that chair, who knows that the eyes of 225 million Americans are upon him, will be paying close attention to what is being said on the floor of the Senate and will be very careful in the rulings he makes from the Chair.

Now the decision we have to make involves the fundamental right of citizens to know what their Government is doing and how it is doing it. The studies have been made, the costs have been computed and I think the time has come to implement the results of all our deliberations. It is within our ability to allow the people to see us at work, to see us doing the work that we were elected to do, and to let them know of the concerns and the questions and the apprehensions as we make decisions.

I sometimes think that the American public thinks that being in the Congress is an easy job. "Look at those fellows. They don't convene until noon. They just drift around. They take a vote sometime late in the day. That is an easy thing. They knew all along or their staff tells them what to do, how to vote."

And if they see this decision being made, if they see that Members are personally familiar with the issue, that the decisions draw upon a wealth of knowledge and experience in public life, that the decisions are not made arbitrarily but, in most cases—and I believe the distinguished minority leader would agree with me—in most cases the decisions are a painful choice between alternatives.

I have to do one thing or the other. What I try to do is to decide on a course of action that will be most beneficial, more beneficial, and less painful than the other decisions. I think we have the technical capacity to bring people of this country closer to the Senate which in turn will bring us closer to them. The rules and procedures that govern our work on the Senate floor are constantly evolving, and we are mindful of those changes.

I think we have to recognize that many of the opinions that have previously been discussed on this subject were dictated by the circumstances of the time that those decisions were made. And this is a different time. This is a time when the American people depend upon the electronic media for a great deal of their knowledge of public affairs. This is a time in which there is a high degree of interest in public affairs in America. This is a time in which I think we can create a benefit for ourselves as well as a benefit for the country by making the American people a part of our deliberations—by turning on the lights and bringing in the cameras.

So I hope that we will give careful attention to Senate Resolution 28, and move very rapidly to approve it.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, I support Senate Resolution 28 as amended and reported by the Rules Committee on November 19, 1985. Although not all of my fears and uncertainties concerning televising Senate Chamber proceedings are entirely gone, I believe the time has come to take this first step of a test period, during which we can gain knowledge and experience, and, I would hope, fine tune any system under which we move to full public television coverage.

The provision in the resolution authorizing during the test period public broadcasts of radio is particularly pleasing to me. For years now, I have urged the Senate to authorize radio coverage as the most cost-effective means of informing the general public on proceedings in the Senate. It is most gratifying to me that adoption of Senate Resolution 28 by the Senate will allow almost immediate initiation of radio broadcasts at virtually no additional cost to the Senate.

The Democratic leader [Mr. BYRD], who is the principal sponsor of this resolution, has proposed a number of rules changes which he believes should be made, certainly if we go to public television broadcasts, and probably whether we go to such coverage or not.

During the test period, the Senate will have an opportunity to consider, review, and determine what changes in our rules of procedure should be made. Before final action by the Senate to approve full public radio and television coverage, we can and will make the decisions on the rules changes that have been proposed by Senator BYRD and others.

I urge my colleagues to vote for the adoption of Senate Resolution 28. It is a measure whose time has come.

Mr. BYRD addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The distinguished minority leader.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the distinguished majority leader for calling up Senate Resolution 28 today. The majority leader kept his commitment. He has stood by his promise made last December that he would make every effort to get this matter before the Senate upon the disposition of the Conrail legislation. The Senate has been debating the Conrail decision but has not completed action thereon.

I thank the very distinguished chairman of the Senate Committee on Rules and Administration [Mr. MATHIAS] for the statement that he has just made with respect to Senate Resolution 28. I thank him also for the many courtesies that he has shown to me and to others over the past several months as we have from time to time discussed in the Committee on Rules and Administration and elsewhere, U.S. Senate television and radio coverage of debate in this body. He moved with dexterity to conduct the hearings, and I had requested that there be hearings. He moved with equal dispatch in having the resolution marked up and brought to the Senate calendar. I thank him for the time he has spent on this important matter, and for his expression of thoughts just now on the subject.

I know there are Senators in this body who are opposed to the idea of television and radio coverage in the Senate. But while I greatly respect their viewpoints, it seems to me that the time has come when the Senate debate should be covered by both television and radio.

On the Rules Committee there were others on both sides who spoke in support of the resolution and/or some of the amendments that were voted on in connection therewith. I commend Mr. GORE, who is supportive of radio and television coverage, who is active in the committee, who participated in the hearings and in the markup, and who is on the floor at this time ready to contribute to the debate.

Senator GORE was a Member of the House of Representatives when that body decided to proceed with televised coverage of debates. So he and other Senators who served in the House before coming to this body will be able to bring to bear the experience of their services there. They are in a good position to make helpful suggestions. And I feel that as the debate progresses they will continue to make fine contributions.

One of the most respected Members of this body, one who is a very senior Member of the body, Senator RUSSELL LONG, has made contributions to the debate in previous times, is prepared, and is on the floor at this time to participate in the debate. And I shall listen with great interest to what he has to say. I know that in many ways he and I feel very much the same in connection with the matter of televising Senate debate, and also, hopefully, changes in certain rules of the Senate.

I feel that certain changes are meritorious in connection with some of the rules, whether or not the Senate has television or radio coverage of the debates. I think if the Senate decides to move forward with television and radio coverage, the changes that I have proposed, although they may be improved upon by other Senators, will prove to be helpful in maintaining the unique role of this institution, and at the same time open the windows of the institution to the American people—who, after all, should be better informed of what is said here, and what is done here.

Talleyrand said, "There is more wisdom in public opinion than in Napoleon, Voltaire, or all of the ministers of state, present and to come."

I have a similar view of that expressed by Talleyrand. Gladstone referred to this body as "that remarkable body, the most remarkable of all the inventions of modern politics." It has played that role for almost two centuries. During the first 5 years of the Senate, the doors were not open, the press was not a part of the audience. And neither were the galleries opened to the public.

I have read the history of the first 2 years and I in many ways feel that that may have been the most remarkable Congress of all—the first Congress—because many of the statutes that were so necessary for the establishment of the departments of Government and for the proper functioning of this Republic were passed in the first Congress, the first 2 years.

One Senator whom we have to thank in that regard was Senator Maclay, a Senator from the State of Pennsylvania, who wrote some very revealing pages in his diary, not only with respect to the actions that were taken by the Senate in those first 2 years, but Mr. Maclay also gave future readers of that diary a remarkable insight into the personalities, the shortcomings, the strengths and, from Mr. Maclay's viewpoint, the weaknesses, of the Members of the U.S. Senate during that period.

He was not reelected, but we are all much indebted to him for having left to us his journal, which is almost a blow-by-blow description of the actions that were taken by the Senate in that period.

Mr. President, I was the acting majority leader of the Senate at the time the late Mr. Nelson Rockefeller was sworn in as the 41st Vice President of the United States. The then majority leader, Mr. Mansfield, was in the Far East at the time. The television and radio galleries implored me to approve the televising of that event. Being the acting majority leader at that time, I gave that approval. That is the only occasion of live TV coverage of Senate proceedings.

When the Senate neared the debate on the Panama Canal treaties, I offered a resolution, Senate Resolution 268, on September 24, 1977. It was agreed to on February 2, 1978.

That was a resolution providing for radio coverage of the proceedings of the Senate during the consideration of the Panama Canal treaties. I offered that resolution on behalf of myself and Mr. BAKER, Mr. ZORINSKY, Mr. THURMOND, Mr. Abourezk, Mr. HUDDLESTON, Mr. METZENBAUM, and Mr. MATSUNAGA.

Mr. LONG. Will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. BYRD. I yield.

Mr. LONG. The Senator has a great memory. I will ask him if he will recall one of the events that happened during the course of that debate.

If I recall correctly, we had agreed by unanimous consent to a vote after a lengthy and extended debate. I believe the vote was to be at noon. Everybody in America had their radios tuned in to hear the outcome of the vote. That was a tremendous vote. Here was everybody waiting to hear the vote. The majority leader at that time, I believe, was Mr. Mansfield. Is this Senator correct? Or was the Senator from West Virginia the leader?

Mr. BYRD. I was the majority leader.

Mr. LONG. Then the majority leader came in and asked unanimous consent to extend the time to hear other speakers. At that time, the Senator from Louisiana felt that was not fair to all the public. Here were millions of people waiting breathlessly to hear how the vote would go. It would be a close vote on the Panama Canal treaties. They were not going to hear the vote, not unless they had all afternoon to wait, because several other Senators had importuned the leadership on both sides of the aisle saying they must have more time to debate.

In my judgment, I felt at that time, and still feel, that that was an imposition on the entire Nation, on every listener of radio, not only everybody in the Senate, who wanted to hear the vote, everyone around the country.

I objected. Those Senators who had obtained this agreement with the leadership were undoubtedly very irritated with the Senator from Louisiana at that point. I made the point that there was an agreement on the time for the vote. Everybody in America wanted to hear the vote. I was satisfied that not one vote would be changed and that we ought to go forward with the vote.

I believe I eventually relented on that and let them have some of that time. I think I did not go all the way with it but I did agree that some time would be allotted.

Does the Senator recall that situation at that time?

Mr. BYRD. I have a somewhat vague recollection of it, may I say to the distinguished Senator, but I have absolutely no doubt that his recollection of the incident to which he is referring is accurate. It would be typical of the distinguished Senator from Louisiana to relent and, after having made very carefully whatever point he intended to make or whatever protection he intended to give to the American listening audience, to attempt to work out whatever compromise would be desirable all the way around.

Mr. LONG. The point this Senator had in mind was that any one of those Senators could have made the speech the night before or any time within the previous month. They wanted to wait until the last minute when everyone wanted to hear the vote and then they wanted to give their speeches. The Senator from Louisiana felt that that was an indication of one of the problems that should be dealt with if we are going to have television in the Senate. Someone sees the chance to make a speech and have 50 million people see him.

Of course, every Senator cherishes in his bosom the hope that he can be eloquent on occasion. He would like to think that at that moment he will carry the day and perhaps change a vote or two. But even if he changes no votes, he tries to persusade the people that he is a great Senator making the speech and he should well be considered perhaps for some higher office than just U.S. Senator. If he is not considered, the people back home would hopefully hear the speech and agree that at least they had great representation of which their State should be proud, thereby assuring the Senator of reelection by making the speech when everyone was tuned in.

Now, if we are going to have television in the Senate, I say to my able Democratic leader, it seems to this Senator that it is indispensable that we have some way to control the length of speaking and, in fact, not only the length of a Senator's speaking, but the length of the overall debate. We do not have that now. The House has it, but we do not have it.

I wonder if the Senator an opinion on that.

Mr. BYRD. Yes, Mr. President. What the distinguished Senator from Louisiana is saying would be undoubtedly true. As a matter of fact, already, while we have no television or radio coverage of Senate debate, I am sure the distinguished Senator from Louisiana will agree with me that we see, time after time, espcially on a very controversial matter, Senators who will not come to the floor to make their speeches until the last day. They want to offer their amendments the last day, they want to make their speeches the last day; more preferably, they want to be the last ones to speak. I have felt that way myself on several occasions. It might be that that phenomenon would continue under television and radio coverage.

There is no doubt about it, there are changes that will have to be made in the Senate. The distinguished Senator from Louisiana puts his finger right on the key practical question: How do we assure the minority of equal time? How do we ensure against a Senator's taking the floor and speaking for an entire day while other Senators have to divide the time that remains? So, fairness toward the minority, and hedges against Senators' hogging the camera are all important.

I think we can work out those problems. In a test period, I believe with the combined and collective judgment of Senators we shall be able to find ways that will overcome such problems, which are of great concern to the distinguished Senator from Louisiana. And they are of concern to me.

These are practical problems. They are extremely important, especially with the unique role of the Senate under the Constitution. I certainly want to work with the distinguished Senator from Louisiana and other Senators to see if we can come to grips with these very real issues and concerns.

I respect the distinguished Senator from Louisiana because he is concerned about the unique role of the Senate under the Constitution. But the Senator, as I have seen on many occasions, when he applies his talent to a task, can make a tremendous contribution toward making things work.

Mr. MATHIAS. Will the minority leader yield to me for a brief observation Mr. President?

Mr. BYRD. Yes, Mr. President.

Mr. MATHIAS. I share with the minority leader the concerns he has just expressed and, I would like to assure the Senator from Louisiana, that I think the majority of the Rules Committee share them and that we would try to work out those procedures which will assure fairness and equity as we proceed with this test period. I think there is no deviation of any sort from that general proposition.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the distinguished Senator.

Mr. President, I do not want to keep the floor overly long. If I may take just a very few minutes more, then I shall yield the floor.

Mr. President, my goal has been, and continues to be, to address those concerns about which we have been talking, in a way that will produce the votes to move this institution out of the communications dark ages and into the 25th century before we reach the 21st.

The resolution before us is the necessary first step. I favor its adoption and I believe the test period is a good idea. It will give us time to assess the need for other rules changes, changes in procedures, and so on. Any necessary changes can be considered as part of our final resolution.

I shall only add to that, that there is a public service argument, there is an institutional argument, and there is an equity argument for opening this Chamber to the microphones and cameras of the broadcast media.

First, the public service argument: As we consider this resolution, I hope we will keep in mind the admonition of Woodrow Wilson, who said that "the informing function of Congress should be even preferred to its legislative function." In order to carry out that charge to inform the public, we must acknowledge the best ways in 1986 of reaching that public. A study commissioned by the American Society of Newspaper Editors and released in April of 1985 shows that the American people are more likely to rely on television news reports over those carried on newspapers, magazines, and radio. Seventy-two percent identified TV as their preferred source for national and international news. And Roper's annual poll on the news media shows television named by most people as their first and most believable news source.

Some would argue that we already allow access. But allowing broadcast reporters without their cameras and microphones into the gallery is not enough. Giving interviews outside the Chamber is not enough. I said there was an equity argument for broadcast proceedings of the Senate. We have given print reporters the tools of their trade, but we have not given television and radio the visuals and audio they need.

Even those of us who came to this institution before the era of the television candidate understand such needs. We have a President in the White House who understands the need for visuals and who also understands the power of television's direct impact. We claim to be the foremost deliberative body in the world; certainly that image is handicapped when television audiences in 1986 see only artists' renderings of a reporter's version of our debates rather than the live debates themselves.

And that brings me to the institutional arguments for television in the Senate. I said in my speech on January 3, 1985, when I introduced a resolution on this subject, that the Senate was fast becoming the invisible half of Congress and that we cannot hold our own with the White House and the House of Representatives when it comes to news coverage of the important issues of the day.

The Founding Fathers gave the Senate a unique role—the responsibility of "advice and consent" on executive appointment and on treaties, in addition to providing a distinctly different legislative arena from that of the House of Respresentatives. Millions of Americans, through television, see the daily proceedings of the House but are denied access to the proceedings of the unique Senate Chamber.

Mr. President, to remain a visible policymaking part of our national Government we must find a way to accommodate television and radio broadcasts of Senate proceedings. I am convinced we can do this without violating the unique role of the Senate.

There is nothing that benefits our country like an informed public. The will of the people is best derived from an educated electorate. I believe that we do the people of this Nation an injustice by continuing to deny the broadcast media access to the proceedings of this body.

A sampling of editorial comments on the possibility of TV in the Senate highlights this point. The Oregonian of Portland, OR wrote:

Anything that has a chance to enhance the public's comprehension of how the legislative system works is worth the overstated risk of longer floor speeches or political grandstanding.

According to the Christian Science Monitor:

Great public access to elected officials' legislative proceedings tends toward greater understanding and accountability . . . The argument we like best: If television is to be used so much for staged political events—from contrived "news" events to paid campaign commericals—then it should provide more realistic coverage of government in action.

The Miami Herald wrote:

But the Senate is everybody's business, and there's simply no substitute for being there via the live eye.

And from the Sun-Sentinel and Fort Lauderdale News:

In reality, TV will have one major beneficiary—the voter and the taxpayer, who will have an improved understanding of how his or her government operates by seeing and hearing it in action.

Mr. President, I know that there is continuing concern for rights of the minority should we decide to televise our proceedings. I share that concern and had addressed it in the rules changes I proposed in my original package. I want to assure Senators that I believe that the final resolution after the test period must include a commitment to equal access for the minority and majority to recognition during televised proceedings.

I know that there is concern that the traditions of the Senate will not survive the glare of the television cameras. I disagree with this. I believe our proceedings can be televised without losing the unique aspects of this body. I believe it is possible to maintain our traditions while also meeting the realities of our times. We cannot continue to be the invisible half of Congress. We should not hide behind tradition, but rather take every advantage available to us to prove our best-known tradition—namely, the Senate is the greatest deliberative body in the world.

I urge my colleagues to support this resolution. I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I wish to compliment the distinguished minority leader for his foresight in addressing this issue early in 1985. I ask unanimous consent to include in the RECORD an article from Broadcasting Magazine from January of 1985 entitled "Byrd Fronts Drive for Radio-TV in Senate."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BYRD FRONTS DRIVE FOR RADIO-TV IN SENATE

Senate Minority Leader Robert C. Byrd (D-W.Va.) last week began his campaign to allow radio and television coverage of the Senate with a solo appearance before the Senate Rules Committee. He warned: "Without television coverage, the Senate is fast becoming the invisible half of Congress." But it was evident at the hearing that the proposal will run into opposition from senators concerned about provisions designed to accommodate the Senate—with its traditions and rules encouraging lengthy debate—to broadcast coverage, as well as to others Byrd has included to provide additional streamlining of Senate procedures.

Senator James A. McClure (R-Idaho) did not dispute the complaint that Senate rules can be used to construct roadblocks to Senate action. But he said, "We're looking for an easy fix. What is really required is self-discipline on the part of members." His expressed concern was with the protection now given members of a minority—even a single member: "I'd err on the side of caution rather than going over to the majority side. The protection we've had in the Senate is in the tolerance of members, not the rules."

The issue of television and radio coverage as such was not discussed at length, other than by Byrd, who had introduced his resolution in the first week of the new Congress (Broadcasting, Jan. 7). Senate Majority Leader Bob Dole (R-Kan.), who has made it clear he opposes opening the Senate to such coverage—he feels it would impede procedures he says are already balky—participated in the hearing long enough to indicate he intends to give the matter a thorough airing. He said he will soon poll Republican members on the issue, and would discuss it with Byrd—and many other senators. He talked of discussing it "Over lunch" with "a majority of the 100 members."

Striking the theme certain to be heard as long as the debate over the issue lasts, Dole said, "We want to streamline procedures, but without sacrificing the rights of members." Or, as Senator Wendell Ford (D-Ky.), who had opposed radio-TV coverage in the Senate in the last Congress, when it was pushed by then Majority Leader Howard Baker (R-Tenn.), put it, "How far do you feel we need to go or can go in shifting power from the individual senators who are in the minority to the leadership of the majority?"

Byrd, responding specifically to McClure's concerns, said, "We have responsibility as senators to protect the minority, but we must also protect the majority against the tyranny of the minority."

Byrd was not without support for his proposal. Senate Rules Committee Chairman Charles McC. Mathias Jr. (R-Md.), who had supported Baker's proposal, said he welcomed Byrd's interest in the matter. Then, noting that television coverage of Britain's upper house of Parliament had begun on Wednesday, a day before the hearing, he said, "We should be at least as bold and venturesome as the House of Lords."

Byrd's argument was that "the Senate can maintain [its] traditions while meeting the realities of [the] times. We can change without violating the unique role of the Senate." And he said, in effect, that the Senate is losing the image contest to the House of Representatives, whose debates, he noted, are seen in clips on the network evening news programs and are carried live by C-SPAN, and to the President, "who always has access to television." Then he said, "I believe it is becoming increasingly essential to find a way to accommodate television broadcasts of our proceedings if we are to remain a visible policy-making part of our national government."

It would not be easy, he acknowledged. A particular difficulty he foresees is in achieving what he considers the essential ingredient of "equity in debate time" in a legislative body where the advantage in controlling the floor rests with the majority. His proposal, he said, is designed to deal with some of the fairness problems: The majority and minority leaders would decide when and for how long broadcast coverage will be permitted and broadcast time would be controlled in a way to assure equal time to the majority and minority parties. It also would restrict Senate sessions to Monday, Tuesday and Thursday and committee hearings to those times and those days when the Senate is not in session.

A number of the provisions are designed to speed up the business of the Senate. One calls for electronic voting, a procedure for deciding issues that has been employed in many state legislatures for years. It changes the method of cutting off debate by scrapping the requirement that three-fifths of elected senators vote for cloture and substituting a requirement that two-thirds of those present and voting support cloture (except that two-thirds of elected senators would be required to end debate on a change in Senate rules). Perhaps more important, the resolution eliminates the present provision permitting 100 hours of debate after a cloture vote and replaces it with one permitting 30 hours, equally divided between the parties. Another provision sets a two-hour limit on the time that can be devoted to a motion to proceed, a motion that can now be used as a means of stalling action.

Under the Byrd proposal, construction of the broadcast facilities and control of the cameras and microphones would be in the control of Senate employes. It would also provide for a trial period before sound and pictures could be transmitted to the public. One difference from the coverage now employed in the House is that senators would not, as originally believed, be required to speak from the podium. Byrd said the camers would be focused on the presiding officer and those senators recognized by the presiding officer, as well as those recognized with the consent of another senator, wherever they are speaking on the floor. However, he indicated the cameras would provide tight shots. The cameras, he said, "would not show empty seats or demonstrations in the gallery."

Byrd concluded his testimony with advice for his colleagues: Television one day—maybe not tomorrow or next year—is coming to the Senate. So it would be well for members like himself and Mathias, he said in remarks to the chairman, to participate in drafting the necessary rule changes. "Knowing something about the rules," he said, "we should do whatever we can to make television available within the peculiar rules and traditions of the Senate."

Mr. GORE. It has been a pleasure for me as a freshman Member of this body to have the opportunity to work with the minority leader, and I certainly appreciate the distinguished leadership he has provided on this issue.

It has also been a privilege to work with the chairman of the Rules Committee, the Senator from Maryland, who has pushed this matter forward with imagination and drive, and the distinguished ranking minority member of the Rules Committee, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. FORD] who has done an equally outstanding job, and I have enjoyed working with him as well.

Senator ARMSTRONG, the junior Senator from Colorado, has been indefatigable in his efforts to move this issue forward for floor consideration, and the majority leader, Senator DOLE, has been responsive to the concerns of so many Members of this body that we have an opportunity to move toward television and radio broadcasting.

I wish also, Mr. President, to pay tribute to my predecessor from Tennessee, the former majority leader, Senator Baker, who felt very strongly about this issue, worked tirelessly in behalf of radio and television coverage, and retains his interest in seeing this resolution pass.

Mr. President, when Americans turn on their television sets in the 1980's, they can see pictures of the Titanic at the bottom of the ocean, and they can keep track of Halley's Comet in deep space. But if they want to see and hear what is going on on the floor of the U.S. Senate, they have to get an airplane ticket and fly to Washington, take a taxicab to the Capitol, get a ticket to get into the Capitol, and then stand in line for 1 of only 611 seats in the Senate gallery. Just imagine how many lobbyists alone will be in line for those seats when the tax reform bill comes up later this year.

If you take a pencil and paper and do the mathematics, you will find that if the Senate of the United States was in session 365 days a year, each one of these seats would have to change hands 1,000 times a day for every American to get a brief glimpse of these proceedings.

But televising Senate proceedings will make democracy more than a once-in-a-lifetime experience for those American citizens who wish to keep track of what occurs on the floor of the U.S. Senate.

We are in the midst of a revolution in democratic participation. The American people now demand more information about their Government, and Government at last is learning to provide it.

With the help of sophisticated technology, some Members of Congress have met with constituents via teleconference, and we are all familiar with the fact that popular opinion, which once came by stagecoach and pony express, now arrives by mailgram and computer modem.

There is bound to be a little uneasiness in the marriage of a new medium and an old and distinguished institution, but over the last 2 centures, our faith in democracy and the wisdom of our people has shown that we have nothing to fear but the dark.

As a freshman who has much to learn about Senate procedures, I cannot answer every objection of my colleagues who have long served in this institution and mastered its rules and have concerns about the impact of television. But I can speculate about the impact television will have on the Senate, and I can offer the perspectives of a Member who served in the House of Representatives both before and after its proceedings were televised. I have also studied and written at length about the impact of television on our constitutional system.

On March 19, 1979, I made the first speech on the floor of the other body as the television cameras were turned on for the first time, and at that time said that television had the power to revitalize representative democracy.

Generally speaking, Mr. President, that has been its effect in the House of Representatives. Certainly TV did not disrupt the institution as many feared. In fact, I believe most of my former House colleagues would agree that, after a few months, most Members began to totally forget the cameras. Neither the tone nor the manner of debate changed perceptibly. It is true that the number of 1-minute speeches which begin the day's proceedings in the House has increased, but even that change has been beneficial in the view of many. For those opponents of Senate television who fear a wave of long and self-indulgent speeches, the House experience seems to indicate the opposite result. Speeches seem to have become more focused and more carefully drafted. Words are chosen with more deliberation and enunciated more precisely. Television, in other words, has helped to keep Members on their toes.

There is something about the television medium that has the effect of dissipating hot air. Because of the nature of the medium, long-winded speeches tend to produce a bad reaction on the part of many television viewers. Perhaps, for that reason, television has helped to rein in grandstanding and verbosity in the House of Representatives. With respect to the exchange between the distinguished minority leader and the distinguished senior Senator from Louisiana earlier, I would submit that there is a kind of self-correcting mechanism.

If we are seriously concerned about a single Senator taking to the floor of the Senate and controlling all of the debate time for an entire day just because the television cameras are turned on, I think we can dispel that concern rather easily because the first Senator who responds to television in such a manner would soon receive in his or her office a flood of mailgrams, telegrams, letters, and telephone calls saying, "Cut it out; we don't want to hear all that hot air."

The next time that particular Senator took the floor, that Senator might well remember the reaction of his or her constituents. There is a self-correcting mechanism. I submit that it even extends to the question of fairness in the distribution of debate time as between the two parties.

If it becomes clear in the course of a debate that the majority leader or the presiding officer is exhibiting unfairness and that is pointed out, and then subsequently confirmed in the minds of those who are watching on television, this, too, would provoke a bad reaction, and the resulting outrage would tend to work a change in the way the Senate was run.

In the House of Representatives, the impact has been extremely positive, and it has been dramatic. Twenty-three million American households now have access to gavel-to-gavel coverage of the House proceedings. Studies indicate that, remarkably, 93 percent of the C-Span viewers of the House proceedings vote in each election. I daresay that there is not another cross-section of people in this country where you would find such a high percentage of voters.

The televising of House proceedings has enhanced the public perception of the institution and the work of its Members. I cannot tell you how many times people came up to me during my service in the House of Representatives to tell me how they felt about the speeches which were made during a particular debate. And after a time, you become aware of the fact that the speeches make a difference. If no one is listening to speeches that are made on the floor of the House or the floor of the Senate, then their impact is, of course, diminished. But if Members of this body begin to get the idea that their constituents are following the course of the arguments made on the floor of the Senate, then the impact of each individual speech is heightened, and the desire of Senators to participate actively in that debate, or at least to follow the logic of the statements made, is going to be enhanced.

For a few, that is a drawback. But most who think about it will see that as a positive contribution. This, after all, is a deliberative body. It used to be widely known as, and is still often referred to as, the world's greatest deliberative body. It can be that again. In fact, not just in legend. Television can help to make it so.

Senate rules, of course, are so very different from House rules that it is difficult to predict the precise impact of the change. This is true. But I feel comfortable in predicting that the televising of Senate proceedings will enhance, not diminish, the prestige of this institution. In time, the viewers will grow accustomed to Senate rules and procedures, just as they have done in watching the House. The proud traditions of the Senate will shine through in the telecasts. The American people will begin to see the complexity of the tasks facing Senators and better appreciate their hard work and dedication. This has been the case in the House of Representatives.

In talking to my colleagues in this body, I sense a feeling of inevitability about televising procedures. The Senate simply must reestablish itself as a full and visible partner in public debate. The question now seems to be not if, but when and how.

One of the principal reasons is the one cited by the minority leader:

> Without television coverage, the Senate is fast becoming the invisible half of Congress.

That is a very concise, insightful statement of exactly why we need to proceed.

The measure before us is a modest step. It calls for a test period for an in-house TV system and for gavel-to-gavel radio coverage. No television signal will be made available to the public until a subsequent resolution passes both the Rules Committee and the Senate. As another safeguard, it instructs the Rules Committee to hold hearings during the test period on any rules changes that cameras might require.

Working with the minority leader, I offered some suggestions for changes in his resolution as it was presented to the Rules Committee, and both he and I feel that slow and deliberate steps are better than an abrupt shift to television, and the committee endorsed Senator BYRD's resolution, as modified, by an overwhelming vote.

The Senate need not and should not toil in obscurity forever. Let us proceed in measured steps, but let us move forward. We must give the American people the opportunity not only to watch Government in action but also to take part in it, through an electronic town meeting of the Nation. All that stands between the Dark Ages and a new era in representative democracy is a rollcall vote and the flip of a switch.

The best way to preserve our democracy is to return to its oldest principle—trust in the American people. As Daniel Webster observed, a democracy must always rely on its people—seeking out their wisdom, listening to their ideas, and sharing with them the tools of opportunity and the rewards of success.

Televising the Senate would be another great stride in making democracy work.

Mr. President, there is one matter that I should like to address very briefly before closing, and that is the relationship between this resolution and rules changes that might be needed before the television signal is made available to the American people.

I wish to quote from the report of the Rules Committee, a copy of which is on the desk of each Senator. It says:

> The committee intended to break the linkage between rules changes and the vote on the test period, but it did not intend to break the linkage between rules changes and the decision to broadcast the television signal to the public.

I am reading from near the bottom of page 4. At the very bottom of page 4, I emphasize this quotation:

> . . . it is the intention of the committee that the rules changes be considered concurrently with the closed-circuit television broadcast test.

There have been a great many informal discussions about how this linkage might be preserved, and on this occasion I simply ask the chairman of the Rules Committee if he wishes to respond to this question:

Is it not true that during the test period, it is the intention of the Rules Committee to move with all deliberate speed to a full consideration of the rules changes, so that at the time the Senate is ready to end the test period and consider the question of whether or not the TV signal should be made widely available to the public, we will have before us the results of the Rules Committee's work on the proposals for changing the rules as recommended by the minority leader?

(Mr. SIMPSON assumed the chair.)

Mr. MATHIAS. The Senator from Tennessee is exactly right. As he just heard me assure the minority leader and the Senator from Louisiana, I am convinced that the Rules Committee wants to work in a way that will provide absolute equity for Senators, absolute fairness in floor proceedings as it relates to television coverage.

But there are some unknowns here. I think we all admit that. I think the best way to do it is to act it out, give it a trial and do it under these test conditions in which the signals are kept in-house. Members can see what it feels like on the floor. They can go back to their offices and observe it through the screen, look at it on the tube so they can see both sides of the operation, and in the light of that experience and observation we can then look at the rules question.

But it should be done concurrently, and that is why the language that the Senator has quoted from the report is important language.

Mr. GORE. Let me just say in concluding that during my experience in the House of Representatives we had a closed-circuit test period of the television broadcast before it was made available to the television networks and to C-SPAN and to others. Many Members of the House of Representatives who had grave misgivings about the introduction of television began to feel much more comfortable with it when they could actually see exactly what was involved.

Some modifications in the way the House did business were made after, the precise nature of the impact of television could be assessed and the changes could be more artfully designed.

It is my hope and belief that this body would have the same experience when we can actually see the proceedings during the test period. Senators would, see for example, that the camera would be focused only on the Senator speaking, so that Senator who might be in an important committee meeting would realize that there is no need to rush over to the floor to be there just in order to be seen as not absent. This would produce a feeling of ease, and I think, therefore, that the test period is the correct way to go.

Again I compliment all those who have brought us to this point and I hope we can vote on this favorably this week or soon.

Mr. MATHIAS. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. GORE. I am delighted to yield.

Mr. MATHIAS. First of all, I thank the Senator for his very kind and generous comments and for his consistent support for this measure.

I wanted to say that I agree exactly with him in the point he made that television really will discourage the frivolous. It will not encourage it; it will discourage it.

I think that all of us who have had any experience in political life in the last decade understand that the objective eye of the camera is very quick to spot the phony, very quick to spot the frivolous and to expose them.

It is, in fact, cruel in that respect. It never blinks. I think that it will tend to enhance the objectivity of the view of this floor rather than otherwise.

I also agree with the Senator in his comment about the importance of the impact on public thinking about the kind of example we already have from C-SPAN.

Just the other day I was walking around the corridor behind this Senate gallery and two very attractive and very pleasant ladies stopped me and they said "Oh, good morning, Senator," as if they knew me well, as if they were constituents from Maryland, I stopped and I was a little at a loss because I did not immediately recognize those Marylanders and they kindly said "We are from California but we know you because we watch C-SPAN."

That is just an illustration of the kind of personal link that televison establishes between the viewers and Members of Congress who are observed on C-SPAN and other electronic media.

My question to the Senator really is this, and it relates to the concern expressed by the Senator from Louisiana about the fact that the Panama Canal Treaty vote was slightly delayed, because a few Senators wanted to make some closing remarks.

Obviously, if those remarks were frivolous or unnecessary what we have already said I think would apply.

But there are serious things that need to be said sometimes at the last minute.

Does the Senator believe that this would really concern the public, or is the public already well introduced to the uncertainties of life through other activities that are exhibited on television?

For example, is the public seriously concerned if there is a 10th inning in a baseball game? That is serious. Now you are talking about serious business. You are talking about baseball. If a baseball game does not end right at the end of the 9th inning, if it goes into the 10th inning, do you think the public is very much concerned or upset about that?

If there is overtime in a football game—if anyone does not think that is serious business, just remember back to Super Sunday a week ago—if there is a little overtime in a football game, does the public fail to understand the reasons for it?

I think the public would understand that if there is a genuine need to extend the play, to make another point, to carry the ball another yard, whatever it may be, they would understand exactly what is happening here on the Senate floor, and they would accommodate to it even if it prolongs the vote for a few minutes.

I wonder what the Senator felt about that?

Mr. GORE. My answer to the Senator's question would be exactly the same as the one he has himself provided, and I would only add one thought: If we are concerned that it might inconvenience the American people to tune in the radio or television to hear and see for themselves the drama of a particular vote only to find that it was going to take place a little bit later than had been scheduled, is the remedy to inconvenience them even more by preventing them from ever seeing or hearing it no matter what time they turn on their television or radio?

I think the answer is self-evident, and once the American people became familiar with the rules and procedures of the Senate, as they would, such an inconvenience would not occur. They would know that there is a tradition of courtesy here and that, if Senators arrive with thoughts to share which they feel are important, the tendency of the body is to say, of course, we want to show every courtesy to our colleagues. This would become well-known to the American people just as similar conventions and procedures in the House of Representatives have become well-known to them.

I urge my colleagues to support this resolution. I think it is so important. We are at the threshold of a new era in participatory democracy.

The Senate can lead the way. The passage of this resolution is the key.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, I will be glad to yield to the minority leader.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the distinguished Senator from Arizona for his courtesy, and I apologize for interrupting him.

I committed an inadvertent ovrsight a little earlier when I did not make reference to the distinguished Senator from Kentucky [Mr. FORD], who is the ranking minority member on the Committee on Rules and Administration.

Mr. FORD has been very, very attentive to his duties in all things and to say that he is attentive to his duties on the Rules Committee would be no exception. He has faithfully attended the markups, the hearings of the Rules Committee with reference to this matter, and he has worked very closely with me and others on that committee. I wish to commend him for the diligence that he has displayed as, over the months, the Committee on Rules has come to grips with this subject matter. He is a very able Senator. He contributes much to the Senate, to his State, and to his country.

I wish to apologize for speaking earlier without reference to the services that Senator WENDELL FORD has given in this whole matter. His speech, as ranking member, should have followed the statement by the distinguished chairman of the committee, Mr. MATHIAS.

I ask unanimous consent that Mr. FORD's statement appear in the RECORD at that point immediately following the remarks of Mr. MATHIAS and prior to my own remarks.

At the moment he is in his office meeting with some constituents, and he had to temporarily leave the floor. But I apologize to him in absentia, not that he has mentioned the matter to me, but I do know he should have been entitled to speak following the distinguished Senator from Maryland [Mr. MATHIAS], the chairman.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BYRD. I thank my friend Mr. GORE for the references he has made and I thank Mr. DECONCINI for his kindness in yielding to me.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, I agree with the remarks of the minority leader regarding the senior Senator from Kentucky. As a member of the Rules Committee, I have witnessed his immense effort and tenacity in working not only on this legislation but in general. I would also like to commend the chairman of the Rules Committee, the Senator from Maryland, and the distinguished minority leader, who have spent many hours to produce the resolution that is before us today.

In addition, the Senator from Tennessee, is to be commended for his efforts.

As my colleagues know, the former majority leader, Mr. Baker, tried to get a similar resolution passed in the last Congress when it was not a very popular issue. I was pleased at that time to lend my support to the then majority leader, Mr. Baker.

Mr. President, I wholeheartedly support Senate Resolution 28, introduced by the very distinguished minority leader. This resolution provides for a test period of live, gavel-to-gavel radio coverage and closed-circuit television coverage of all proceedings in the Senate Chamber, except when a closed-door session is in order.

By its very design, democracy was intended to be an open process. The framers of the Constitution conceived our form of government specifically for its emphasis on forthrightness and the free flow of information. They fully intended that the public know what its government was up to.

That may have been easy in 1776. But 1986 presents a different United States, a nation of constituents so numerous and so dispersed that Congress is no longer physically accessible to the majority of Americans. These new artificial barriers of vast expanses can, and must, be circumvented by utilizing the most efficient, modern forms of communication available. Undoubtedly, those methods include television and radio.

The issue of allowing Senate proceedings to be broadcast has been repeatedly debated in this body since it was first proposed in the 1940's. And frankly, I am surprised that this common sense measure has not been passed earlier. For almost 40 years, television and radio coverage of Senate committee hearings have given the American public partial view of their elected representatives at work. Several television broadcasts, most notably of the Fulbright hearings on Vietnam and the Ervin investigation of Watergate, and radio coverage such as the broadcast of the Panama Canal Treaty debates have restored a form of open access to the mechanisms of the Senate.

Each and every step we have taken toward openness in government has had positive, not negative, effects. Opponents of this resolution should be reassured that the consequences of allowing television and radio coverage of the House have been less than catastrophic. After a few weeks of initition, the cameras were no longer an obstruction, but an unobstrusive part of the daily routine. Surely, it will not be said that Senators are less able to cope with the presence of television cameras than our counterparts in the House.

Since this resolution provides for a test period, we will have time to review and consider changes that may be necessitated from the introduction of television cameras. I am pleased to have been recently appointed to the ad hoc committee which will study changes in the standing rules of the Senate, and I look forward to working with my colleagues to improve the proceedings of the Senate.

I believe that we have an obligation to pass this resolution. We have an obligation to open our debates to the people whose lives we affect by the decisions we make. I am glad to join my distinguished colleagues, particularly the minority leader, the chairman of the Rules Committee and its ranking member, Mr. FORD, in supporting this resolution.

I yield the floor.

Mr. MELCHER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WEICKER). The Senator from Montana.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator from Montana yield?

Mr. MELCHER. I am delighted to yield.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Arizona for his illuminating and incisive remarks. I thank him for the support he has given to this effort. I know that he will continue throughout the debate, as will others in support of this measure, to deal with it and discuss it, hopefully, and, in the final analysis, enable the Senate to pass it.

I thank the distinguished Senator from Montana who, likewise, is a good supporter of this measure. I appreciate the contributions he has made and will continue to make as we debate the resolution and, hopefully, come to a vote on it.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, I thank our distinguished Democratic leader. I do, indeed, strongly support Senate Resolution 28. I do so because one of the greatest responsibilities that we have here in the Senate is the communication of our actions to the people.

These methods of the media coverage by reporters and individually each of us mailing out through our letters or our newsletters or through telephone conversations or participating through radio and television media coverage are all fine to relate to the people what goes on here in the U.S. Senate, but we are at a time now when I believe it is absolutely essential that we allow the people themselves through television and through their own radios to record or audit or view our actions here in the Senate.

Their opportunity to watch and hear us as the Senate's actions occur is a right, and I believe they want to exercise that right. The people will observe our deliberations, observe and audit our actions, and they will tell us—they will tell us—how they feel. They will let us know of their approval or disapproval.

That review by the people themselves will be in a sense a report card to the Senate that will help to formulate government, and in doing so strengthen both the Senate and the Nation.

Mr. President, those are my reasons for strongly supporting Senate Resolution 28.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I rise in support of the move to have televised debate. I commend my colleague from Tennessee, who has provided leadership on this, and all the members of the Rules Committee who have worked on this, including the distinguished Senator from Virginia.

Why move in the direction of televised debates? The reasons are several.

First, in a democracy, the people are entitled to know not only what decisions are made but how those decisions are made, what goes into them; why does the Senator from West Virginia, the Senator from Virginia, or the Senator from Tennessee make the decisions that we do. I think the public is going to have more of a chance to know not only the final decision, not only that we pass a bill 54 to 43, but why this is important for the people of Connecticut and Illinois. That is first of all.

Second, let us face it, Senate debate is not what it ought to be. I had breakfast this morning in the Senate dining room and I saw more Members of the Senate in the Senate dining room at breakfast than there are here on the floor of the Senate right now listening to this debate.

When do we have the best debate on Senate subjects? I would love to tell you it is right here on the floor. I have heard some good speeches on the floor, maybe even some great speeches on the floor. The best debate is in the Democratic caucus and I assume in the Republican caucus, though I have not been privileged to receive an invitation to attend the Republican caucus. I assume the same is true there. There you can speak to more Senators ordinarily than you can on the floor of the Senate.

I do not know that televising the debates is going to change things, but it might and it seems to me it is a worthwhile experience. Why not try it? Then the public can get greater insights into the decisions.

The Conrail decision we are struggling with right now is a complex thing. The average citizen in Illinois and in the States represented by those Members on the floor right now just gets lost on this thing. They would at least have some idea what this whole Conrail decision is all about, a much better idea than they are going to get in 30 seconds of television on the 6 o'clock news or the 10 o'clock news; a much better idea than they will get just glancing at an International News Service or Associated Press news release, or some other fine news service. They can get some understanding of the details of the problem.

And, finally, and I think not the least important, we are going to face tough decisions in these coming months and years. There are no popular decisions in doing the right thing for the future of our country. I want the people of Illinois, when I make some unpopular decisions—and I am going to make some unpopular decisions during the coming months and years—to understand why I make those unpopular decisions, that it is for the good of the country.

Just as one example: revenue. I do not believe anyone within the sound of my voice will fail to acknowledge that the majority of the Members of the Senate will at least privately acknowledge we have to have more revenue in this country. Maybe we do not make speeches about it, but we acknowledge it.

There is a great story in this morning's Washington Post by John Berry about where we are going and why additional revenue is needed. A small percentage of the people in Connecticut, Illinois, Tennessee, West Virginia, Virginia, and South Dakota are going to read that story.

They ought to hear right here as we debate this what the needs of the Nation are and why we have to move in this direction.

Mr. PRESSLER. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. SIMON. I yield.

Mr. PRESSLER. I served in the House before coming to the Senate. I do have some comments concerning the House becoming the upper Chamber because it is on TV and people can see it. They feel that the great debates will be in the House because of their accessibility to the country.

It is not that we are trying to be a superior body here but trying to be an equal body.

I think the people of the country have a right to hear what we are saying and to participate in the great debates. If you go through some of the great debates in our history, they have been in the Senate more so than in the other body, though there is no reason they cannot be there also.

Senator Baker pointed out that unless the Senate goes on television, the great issues of our time and the in-depth discussions will be carried on, at least to the public's awareness, in the other body. I think we have an obligation to be part of those great debates. It could be that the budget debate we are going into now will be one of the great debates or issues.

Unless the people of this country are able to see us, have an opportunity to see us, unless the local news stations have an opportunity to have news clips from what we do there—rightly or wrongly, and some may be critical of us, and that is very appropriate, also—I think that is very important for us to consider, that the U.S. Senate is not reaching out in terms of the great debates unless we change this.

Mr. SIMON. I thank my colleague from South Dakota. I could not agree with him more. He is right. We did serve in the House together. He came over here in the Senate a little earlier—of course, he is much older than I am—but he started off in that direction sooner than I did.

It is not only the great debates. The other day, after the tragedy in Florida, frankly, I wish every American could have heard JOHN GLENN and JAKE GARN right here on the floor of the Senate. I was proud to serve with both of them. I thought it was a moving event when they both got up and gave their reactions to it. The Nation should have been able to see that.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield on that?

Mr. SIMON. Yes, Mr. President.

Mr. WARNER. The Senator said he wished they could have heard. If they could have seen the faces of those two great Senators and the emotion they had in their faces.

Mr. SIMON. The Senator from Virginia is absolutely correct.

Mr. PRESSLER. I might add that television did cover the prayer in the House of Representatives and it did cover some of the comments in the House of Representatives. I applaud that. That was good. It was available to the networks and they used it. But here, in the Senate, where we had a very dramatic moment, and I think three-fourths of the Senators were here, we had two Senators stand and make very dramatic statements and it was not available to anybody. I think the children of America missed, I think the adults of America missed and everybody missed that, except the people who were here. The number of people in the galleries is very limited. That was a moment in history that is forever lost because we do not have television in the Senate.

Mr. SIMON. My colleagues are absolutely correct. In this case, both JOHN GLENN and JAKE GARN had a press conference, but it was not the same. It was not the same as suddenly speaking for the first time to your colleagues and hearing them say here is what happened and what it meant. That should have been captured, not only for the people of today but for the people of tomorrow.

Again, Mr. President, this is the direction that we ought to go in. We serve ourselves, we serve the Nation well by moving in this direction.

Mr. PRESSLER. If my colleagues will yield further, this has stimulated me to think there was an article in TV Guide by Mr. Norman Ornstein, an expert on Congress, about how little Congress is in TV in terms of the network news, about 2 weeks ago. It is entitled, "Where's All the Coverage? The Case of Our Disappearing Congress."

It does not really have an explanation, but it compares September of 1985 to September of 1975 and points out that during September of 1985, we had the immigration bill debate on the Senate floor, which is one of the great debates on the Senate floor, the Simpson-Mazzoli bill, whether you agree with it or disagree with it. It pointed out that there was virtually no coverage except some brief press clips from a press conference or something of that sort.

That is the sort of issue, regarding immigration, whatever your stand on it is and all the amendments, that if it were available on TV, I would think would be something schoolchildren and adults across this country, regardless of how they feel about it, would be interested in, the various amendments we debated here—I think we had something like 20 amendments that were debated. That really is one of the great debates of our time and there was virtually no coverage or, according to this article, no coverage of it. About the only thing TV stations had available were press conferences, which are not the living thing. That is a good example of a debate.

Of course, the Senate passed the bill, but it did not pass in the House. There is no saying what will come of it this year. But that is one of the great debates of our time.

I think that article should be in the RECORD and I am going to get it and bring it over.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have the the article printed after Mr. SIMON's remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 1.)

Mr. PRESSLER. That article, which was written by Norman Ornstein, who is an expert on Congress, was struggling with the question of why we did not see more of the Senate and of Congress actually working. We do see a lot of commentators commenting about Congress, but very little—perhaps it is because the TV stations do not have available, what occurs in the U.S. Senate.

Mr. SIMON. I thank the Senator from South Dakota.

Let me add just one observation. I do not know how my colleagues from Tennessee, South Dakota, and Connecticut, who are here, feel, but I feel we shall be in a decided disadvantage compared to the minority leader and the Senator from Virginia, who have a distinguished shock of gray-white hair. They look like Senators on the floor of the U.S. Senate. They will have a great advantage on television, Senator WARNER and Senator BYRD, over us. Despite that handicap, I still favor going on television.

EXHIBIT 1

[From TV Guide, Jan. 11-17, 1986]

THE CASE OF OUR DISAPPEARING CONGRESS

(By Norman Ornstein and Michael Robinson)

This new survey reveals that the network news shows are covering lawmakers less and less even as they're becoming more assertive. The mystery is why. Two hundred years ago, the authors of our Constitution designed Congress as the "first branch" of American Government. But you would never know that if you relied on the evening news in 1985.

That is the first conclusion we came to after a month of intensive analysis of the network evening news shows. Throughout September, we carefully monitored the broadcasts on ABC, CBS and NBC, checking closely for every story that mentioned Congress or its members, in an attempt to assess how the network news shows treat our first branch. What we saw met the conventional standards of responsible journalism. It was what we didn't see that troubles us. How do the networks cover Congress? The answer, sadly, is: not much.

In retrospect, most of the typical criticisms the networks receive about their Congressional coverage strike us as largely unwarranted. When given a chance, Capitol Hill correspondents do a professional job. But eventually sins of omission also get noticed. And Congressional correspondents just don't get much of a chance these days.

The lack of coverage—the disappearing Congress—is something we had noticed in general over the past several years. But we decided that our gut reactions had to be tested more systematically. So we picked a month, September 1985, when the issues before Congress and the Federal Government were urgent and numerous; when the institution was regularly in session; and when the President was also in Washington and focusing a good deal of his attention on Congress and matters before it.

Ironically, we found that during a time when Congress has been trying to gain more authority in policy-making and grant greater access to television, the networks have been bailing out on Congressional news coverage, at least on their evening news programs.

During the four weeks of September, when Congress was in session, we counted just under a hundred news stories that in any way, shape or form mentioned Congress or any of its members. At first blush, that sounds like a whole lot of news. But in reality, it's a pittance. To begin with, that means Congress is mentioned in fewer than one out of every 10 stories. And that is only if we count equally every mention of Congress, no matter how minor. Eliminate the stories in which Congress is no more than a passing reference, and the number of items falls to 78. And even among these, almost half treated Congress simply as a supporting actor, not the principal focus of the piece. There were only 41 stories in which Congress was the focus of the story.

On average, in other words, during what was one of Congress's most active months in years, network evening news presented us with about half a Congress story per broadcast—and that's using a very generous definition of a Congress story.

Now take a historical perspective. We checked the record for September 1975, 10 years earlier. That month the networks presented well over 200 stories mentioning Congress, more than double the number of references made in September 1985 on the evening news. There was no special crisis taking place 10 years ago September, and no vital issues resolved—nothing, in other words, that might easily explain why it was that Congress deserved so much more attention back then. Clearly, somewhere along the line, all three networks have systematically deemphasized their Capitol Hill coverage: they all seem to agree that the Congress of the 1980s isn't nearly as newsworthy as the Congress of the 1970s.

PLAYING DOWN WASHINGTON

The conventional explanation for all this is that networks have consciously decided to get the news more and more from outside Washington. George Watson, the veteran and respected Washington bureau chief for ABC, denies this; he says there has been "no conscious decision on our part to deemphasize coverage of Congress." But Lane Venardos, executive producer of the CBS Evening News with Dan Rather, told the Washington Journalism Review that reduced coverage of Congress "is a direct result of decisions made at CBS . . . to 'de-Washingtonize' our coverage."

In any event, the facts show that the networks have not gotten out of Washington so much as they've gotten off Capitol Hill. Charles Gibson, ABC's chief House correspondent says, "Ten years ago, there was probably one piece a week that started in a Congressional hearing room and ended in a hearing room. Today you won't see any of that." NBC's Roger Mudd, the dean emeritus of network Congressional reporters, says, "Today, if they cover a hearing, they'll stay in the hearing itself for maybe 15 seconds—then switch to a coal mine in West Virginia or somewhere else out of Washington to finish the story."

The networks still stay in Washington for the Presidency, however. The White House still does phenomenally well in holding the attention of all three networks. In September, the White House and its First Family got more than three times as many news references as Congress. And sometimes the inequality of the news focus was painfully clear.

During September, the Senate debated and passed a landmark piece of legislation dealing with immigration, a bill with profound consequences for the population of America and for the future of U.S.-Mexican relations. All told, on the three networks combined, the Senate's debate and action attracted about one minute's worth of evening-news time. Meanwhile, Nancy Reagan's brief stopover in Mexico City, arranged so that the First Lady could extend cash and condolences after the earthquake, attracted about four times the news coverage. So, downplaying Washington means deemphasizing Congress and its actions, not the Reagans and their White House.

Congressional coverage fails not because of a lack of pictures, by the way. Since 1979, the networks have had access to live broadcasting of the House of Representatives. In September, they used that system only eight times on evening news—which works out to a short blurb of House debate in one out of every 10 newscasts. The video from the House floor is often good—lively, punchy, significant. The lack of interest by the networks in using it miffs, among others, Roger Mudd. "I think it's a journalistic outrage," he says, "to have that material and then just ignore it."

GETTING IT RIGHT

The networks have long been sensitive about the problem of superficiality in the evening news, a problem built in by the limitations of a 22-minute broadcast filled with stories that usually are less than two minutes long. The networks have attempted to deal with that problem by occasionally showcasing one story, giving it more time or several short reports from different angels.

Given this limitation, we do not quarrel much with the quality of the coverage of Congress provided by the network news shows. For the most part, what they told us about Congress was accurate, often substantive, and about important issues: our monitoring shows that the issue receiving the greatest amount of attention in Congressional coverage was trade policy; No. 2 was U.S./South Africa relations; and No. 3 was tax reform.

True, little of the coverage was profound. And most of it came early in the month, before the networks shifted their attention to Mexico, Hurricane Gloria and, eventually, the Paris summit between Mikhail Gorbachev and Francois Mitterand. Still, trade, South Africa and tax reform were the issues where there was real action. And "action" is the key word.

Issues, no matter how important, that were heating up in Congress but had not yet boiled over received hardly any attention. Take the deficit. During September, Congress faced direct pressure over the statutory limit on the national debt—due to go over the highly symbolic $2-trillion mark. Republicans in the Senate had openly threatened to use the vote on the debt limit to attempt a new law forcing an end to Federal deficits, underscoring their deep concern about the deficit. None of these undercurrents or maneuvers, which were leading up to dramatic confrontation and action, received the attention of the networks. The deficit itself was not totally ignored. It was mentioned as an important factor in several stories on trade and international economics. And Bill Moyers presented a hard-hitting commentary on Congress's inability to cut the deficit; but that was about it. With the shrinking news hole the networks have adopted for Congress, all the movement on Capitol Hill to deal with the fiscal crisis—background vital for understanding the tremendously significant actions Congress did take in October—just could not be covered. No boilover, no coverage. Unless, of course, the issue has sex and/or "circus" appeal.

The network news quest for action—plus conflict plus celebrity—eventually leads to circus reporting. And in September the networks all found lots of time to cover the circus generated by rock-video and rock-lyric "pornography." Heavy-metal rock star Dee Snider, lead singer of the group Twisted Sister, came to the Senate to testify in favor of rock video and against public warning or labeling of "adult" lyrics on record albums. And Susan Baker and Tipper Gore, spouses of two of Washington's most celebrated political leaders, Treasury Secretary James Baker and Sen. Albert Gore Jr. (D-Tenn.), came to testify in favor of such labeling.

NBC's Tom Brokaw seized the opportunity to do a three-minute story—a virtual eternity on the evening news—about all this contempoary music and culture, moving from the hearings to extensive use of rock videos. All told, the rock-porn hearing attracted a full six and a half minutes of evening news time in a single day—more coverage than Congressional work on the budget-deficit crisis received in a full month.

In the end, the networks did give substantial time and attention to some of the major issues that Congress grappled with in September. Trade policy received three times as much coverage as rock porn. But the only issues that were covered on the evening news were those Congress pushed hard to the point of open conflict or to the point of final passage.

ANSWERING THE CRITICS

Network news has taken its shots from hostile critics in the past several years. But our monitoring of the evening news programs tells us that some of the criticism is wrongheaded.

Perhaps because the networks do so little reporting about Congress, there isn't space enough for many mistakes. Whatever the reason, the network coverage of Congress seems by and large to be fair and responsible when it is here at all. Critics such as Reed Irvine of Accuracy in Media argue that all the networks are biased against Republicans and favor liberals; not in our findings. Start with the anti-Republican charge.

As far as time on camera is concerned, it is the Democrats who have more to complain about. The Republicans overall get more time in the news, and nobody comes close to getting as much coverage as Senate Republican Leader Robert Dole (R-Kans). In September, Dole appeared in 12 separate pieces, six times as many as House Speaker Thomas P. "Tip" O'Neill (D-Mass.). As for the character of coverage—the networks made just as many critical comments about Democrats in Congress as Republicans.

Liberal bias? Only one piece on Congress during the month of September sounded "liberal." Bill Moyers, in a lengthy commentary, showed how the Congress was caving in to special interest and PACs on Superfund legislation to clean up toxic-waste sites in America. It was a tough piece, making powerful use of visuals. And it was one that would make most conservatives wince. But the piece was commentary, and it spared neither party as it condemned the cave-in on the House side. To us, Moyers' piece looked more like old-fashioned watchdog journalism than liberal bias.

One legend did prove to be valid. CBS is different—not more liberal, just different. As Lane Venardos's comment suggests. CBS is by no means preoccupied with the internal dynamics of the legislative process. Still, CBS accounted for more than half the pieces making some use of House television. And CBS, at least in September, accounted for practically all of the heavyweight criticism of Congress.

Hard-hitting journalism may be great, but it can get journalists into trouble. CBS embarrassed itself in September with one of its feature pieces about the politics of Congress. Bruce Morton, using videotape, presented a negative story about Congressional junketeering. The pictures implied that Sens. Chic Hecht (R-Nev.) and Jesse Helms (R-N.C.) had recently been junketing in Jerusalem at Government expense. A few nights later, Dan Rather apologized on the air, admitting that the trip in question had been financed privately, not by the taxpayers. Gaffe or not, CBS still occasionally covers Congress as an institution in its own right.

BAD NEWS, BAD NEWS

One other piece of "conventional wisdom" about news coverage of Congress seems to hold. In the past we've argued that network news is too negative toward Congress—that it has followed the dictum of the late social doyenne Alice Roosevelt Longworth: "If you can't say anything good about someone, sit right here by me." In September, we found only the softest sort of whispers implying anything good about Congress. Even when the facts favored Congress, reporters rarely drew that conclusion.

Granted, the vast majority of the stories were simply neutral about the way Congress does its job. But one of every 10 news pieces was negative in tone and none was expressly positive. At the top of the list were three tough-minded pieces on CBS—the two commentaries by Moyers and the junket piece by Morton.

Most other reporting was more like teasing than mudslinging or muckraking. For example, ABC's Charles Gibson, usually one of the most thoughtful Congressional correspondents, began a story on an informal weekend meeting of lawmakers about tax reform by saying, "Where else for Congressmen to go to consider the Nation's tax burden but on a retreat at a secluded, posh conference center outside Washington? A retreat paid for by taxpayers." (Gibson, incidentally, was mistaken: the retreat was privately financed.)

It's hard to say how much praise or criticism any Congress deserves. But it is clear that, even in a month without a whiff of scandal, the networks found some room for hard-nosed and soft-core criticism—but no time for anything positive.

WHY LESS COVERAGE?

Why is Congress slighted by the evening news? There are, of course, many reasons, many of them valid. ABC's Gibson offers one. He likens Congressional action to moving a house across a street. The final outcome is important, but the house moves inch by inch; which inch do you cover? And indeed, Congress does move inch by inch, with sometimes dozens of decision points, and few if any offering the final word. When the Senate passed that immigration bill, it was the third time it had done so—and in the past, the bill failed to become law. So there is a case to be made for not covering that particular "inch."

Another reason is the proliferation of other public-affairs programs, including ABC's Nightline and This Week with David Brinkley, CBS's Nightwatch and Sunday Morning, not to mention such public-television shows as MacNeil/Lehrer News Hour, and Capitol Journal and, of course, cable's C-SPAN. Nightline has done some first-rate shows on the Congress, and the occasional discussions Phil Jones has with Charles Kuralt on Sunday Morning are the best no-frills analyses of Congress on commercial television.

Of course, even where the other network news shows do fill in the gaps, problems remain. There is still limited quality and quantity of coverage. And the audience for any and all of the other shows is dwarfed by the ratings for the three prime-time newscasts. The evening news shows are the flagships for the news divisions. If the news doesn't show up there, its impact is greatly diminished.

TRUTH? YES, BUT . . .

Admittedly, we have looked at only one month, and only at the evening news broadcasts. But what we have seen leads us to conclude that the networks do present the truth—but not the whole truth, or even a major fraction thereof. And if the news hole for Congress keeps shrinking, the truth will be so small that nobody will ever notice.

Congress is losing out badly, and not just to the Presidency. Congress is the victim of current evening news policy: do one major story a day and let it be something more sensational than Congress. It's not that the networks have filled up on junk journalism. In September, the Congress lost out to the crisis in South Africa, a major story by any definition; to the Mexican earthquake, a genuine disaster; to Hurricane Gloria, a potential disaster; and to the upcoming Reagan-Gorbachev summit.

We do not question news judgment that places stories about earthquakes and South Africa above the internal machinations of Congress. We do question news judgment that values rock-video regulation above immigration reform or deficit reduction. We question most of all the coverage of the Presidency, which has abated not at all these last 10 years. The networks remain fixated on every twist and turn, every rumored staff rift, inside the White House. We aren't the only ones who question such coverage; a recent ABC News poll shows 38 per cent of Americans think there is not enough network coverage of Congress, with only 17 per cent believing there is too much. Meanwhile, a full 41 per cent of the public thinks the networks provide too much coverage of the Presidency, while only 13 per cent think there is not enough!

This is obviously not a major crisis. So long as the Constitution gives Congress the power to make our laws, Congress will still matter—no matter what the networks do. But the compulsion to cover the Presidency raises issues about standards. And the preoccupation with the Presidency does shape public attitudes about where the power lies in the system—and that in turn affects the power itself. In September, four stories in 10 tied the Congress directly to the Presidency. More than 20 per cent of the "Congress" pieces were taped on location—at the White House! Journalism ought simply to fight the obsession to do the Presidency, especially at the expense of Congress.

There is one group out there that must feel particularly frustrated by all this—the network Congressional correspondents. They are the news equivalent of the famous television Maytag repairman—lonely and underutilized.

But it obviously goes beyond that. Here we are in President Reagan's second term, and Congress is trying harder than ever to make news and make policy. It is succeeding at the latter—on trade, deficit reduction, farm policy, military reform, immigration, South Africa and countless other key issues, where the ideas and control of the agenda are rooted on Capitol Hill.

Judging by the network news attention, you'd never know it. There are reasons to take the anchormen and the news programs on the road, to Mexico City, Paris or Geneva—mostly good reasons. But the continuing focus on the Presidency and away from Congress, given the canons of journalism, is harder to justify. Congress deserves more coverage than it's getting. But that fact may be ignored, given the network news pressures to leave Washington behind. The sizable segment of the public that wants to see more of Congress had better hope in the end that the Senate grants access to the cameras. It isn't likely to change the networks' focus, but at least all of Congress will be appearing on America's home screens, if only on cable television.

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, as a long-time supporter of television and radio broadcast coverage of proceedings in the Senate Chamber, I am a cosponsor of Senate Resolution 28.

A great deal of debate has occurred on this proposal and some of our colleagues have expressed concern that the quality of debate in the Senate would be affected by televised sessions. I believe television in the Senate would be a good thing.

Our sessions are open for public view from the Senate gallery. It is time we extended the public gallery to the entire Nation. Television would merely expand our present audience and give those who would otherwise not have the opportunity, the privilege of seeing firsthand our legislative process at work. The American people would enjoy this experience. They need to be informed and I believe they can be trusted to accept the traditions and procedures under which the Senate operates. To continue to deny them the privilege of viewing the Senate in session is to deny them the incentive to reach out and become involved in public affairs.

In today's society, we are committed to open government. Committee hearings are open to the public and the fact that there are great numbers of citizens interested in the process is attested to by the heavy attendance and coverage which have existed over the years. Senate committee markups, which previously were held in closed executive sessions, were opened to the public over 10 years ago and have been allowed to be televised and broadcast. We need to continue to improve upon this popular tradition by televising and broadcasting Senate deliberations.

I think that television and radio in the Senate would be especially good for and appreciated by our young people—high school and college students. I have addressed many commencement exercises and government classes around my State of South Dakota during my time in Congress and find that many young people do not have a clear understanding of how our legislative process works. While American government classrooms do an excellent job in educating our young people about our Government and how it works, the exposure broadcast and televised sessions would provide would have a lasting and positive effect on our young people. The future of American politics lies in the hands of our young people.

I should note that my interest in televising and broadcasting Senate proceedings stems from my deepest conviction that this would be in the public interest.

One of the most profound forces in contemporary life has been the advent of the telecommunications industry. However, television frequently does an inadequate job of coverage on action taken in the Senate Chamber. This is not to take away from the fine job the network reporters do, but frequently the time allotted for network news broadcasting is not sufficient to get the full story across.

Many opponents of this legislation have used the argument that the public will be confused by Senate rules and deliberations. On the contrary, televising the Senate would help remove the shroud of secrecy that exists and provide a better understanding of our legislative process. It is true that as a collective body, we are constantly on the run, rushing from one committee meeting to another, to a rollcall vote on the Senate floor, or to appointments with constituents. Activities off the floor consume approximately 90 percent of the Senator's time. We do not need to hide this from the public. They will accept the fact that there are great demands on our time and we cannot be present on the floor at all times.

One can understand and sympathize with the fear of some of our colleagues that certain of the Senate's intangible qualities would be lost by the advent of live TV in the Chamber.

The other side of that argument is that there is more to be gained than lost by live coverage. The basis of democracy is citizen involvement. We must not allow people to become alienated from their Government. If we are to be governed by the people, then we must take the necessary steps to instill in our people the desire to govern. Open hearings, public listening meetings, and the television and broadcasting of Senate debates are all ways to keep Government in touch with the people and the people in touch with their Government.

I believe it is time we moved forward with this proposal which would allow the people the right they so richly deserve to have access to the legislative deliberations of the Senate.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I join my colleagues in support of Senate Resolution 28, which in my judgment will improve the ability of this body and the Government to keep the people better informed. The resolution would provide a test period for implementing gavel-to-gavel radio and TV broadcast coverage of proceedings in the Senate Chamber. The assumption is if this proves to be successful, the Senate will then address the issue of making that coverage available beyond the Chamber. In that context, we shall need to examine the rules.

I note the presence on the floor of the distinguished minority leader and recall his extensive research on this issue and his presentation to the Rules Committee. At some point, I think it is essential that we look at the rules in the context of our overall objective.

It is my hope that the senior Members of the Senate on both sides of the aisle—I see we are now joined by our distinguished colleague from Mississippi [Mr. STENNIS]—Mr. LONG, Mr. THURMOND, and Mr. DOLE, and others who have been here many years, will help guide the rest of us as we work our way toward this goal and do it in a manner that will in no way compromise the integrity and the procedures of this great institution.

In the beginning, I had considerable skepticism about this issue and did not associate myself with either side. I have patiently studied it and eventually, I came around to the view that we should certainly take this initial step because of the study of history. History is, in a way, our rear-view window on life. If we go back, this institution had a public gallery open to all citizens, as it is today and has been continuously since 1794. By providing a public gallery, the Senate allowed firsthand observance of the proceedings by the only means available in the early years of our country. At that time, it was direct sight and sound transmission.

Now, as we approach the bicentennial of the Senate, we should reaffirm the same policy of openness that our forebears, and indeed, the Founding Fathers, had in establishing the public gallery. We have to recognize that we have to facilitate the advancing technologies, television and radio—which again, although indirectly, transmit sight and sound. That more people today learn from these mediums of communication than all others is a reality. They are an integral part of the modern-day teaching process. Now, the Congress has powers, coequal in many respects, with the executive branch of our Government. Therefore, the availability of communications emanating from each of these branches should be on as coequal a basis as technically possible. The people of this Nation have a right to know firsthand and, I stress, on a real-time basis, what is being discussed and debated in the United States.

Let me emphasize "real time." While the written press, I think, fairly and objectively transmits the proceedings, if we were in the middle of a debate and persons viewed it or heard it, they would then have the opportunity to communicate their thoughts with respect to the pending issues on a real-time basis. It is not beyond possibility that within a matter of hours an individual on the west coast, upon viewing or hearing what is transmitted in the United States Senate, could transmit his or her views back through a Senator's office and that communication reach the floor of the Senate during the course of the debate. Therefore, the real-time communications aspect of what we are about to hopefully enact is a very important consideration.

It is also important, as mentioned by many of my distinguished colleagues today—and I notice the presence of the Senator from Tennessee—that people know their Senators and have the opportunity to see them in action. It is another way to be able to hear and see the Senators performing the duties for which they were elected. Indeed, the written press in a vital and important mechanism for conveying information to the people as well as the record of the proceedings for posterity. However, radio and television coverage is instantly relayed to the public and conveys the energy and the feeling and at times the humor that is associated with this great institution. Whether the issue being debated in the U.S. Senate is small or great, it is important that we allow our citizens the opportunity to observe us on a real-time basis.

I urge my colleagues to support Senate Resolution 28.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. EVANS). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, for the time being, I will be opposed to the adoption of the committee amendments en bloc. If a request is made for such, I hope that if I am not on the floor, one of the Senators who is present or who may be listening in and who would come to the floor at that time would object to adopting the committee amendments en bloc. Now, I may at a later time take a different position on that, but as for right now that is my position.

Mr. President, I will not speak with reference to each of the proposed rules changes that I incorporated into Senate Resolution 28 star print. I will however, try to briefly comment on a few of them.

The legislation which I introduced and which is shown as stricken, these are the amendments in part which I earlier included in Senate Resolution 28 star print. I provided for gavel-to-gavel coverage of Senate debates. I provided that such coverage could be had continuously except when a meeting with closed doors is ordered. I provided that any television or radio broadcast time shall be divided and controlled in such a way as to assure fairness to both parties, equal time to both the majority and minority parties. I provided that the Senate would be in session on Mondays, Tuesdays, and Thursdays, and that committee meetings would be scheduled on days or times that the Senate is not in session, unless otherwise ordered.

Of course, this does not mean that a majority leader could not call the Senate into session on days other than Mondays, Tuesdays, and Thursdays. That could be done, just as it is now, by unanimous consent or by nondebatable motion. But this language would be advisory in nature and, hopefully, would be followed by majority leaders present and future.

The Senate would be in session on days when no committee meetings were being held. Conversely, committee meetings would be held on days when the Senate would not be in session. Committee meetings, therefore, would not be interrupted by Senate quorum calls or rollcall votes. This would ensure better attendance on the Senate floor than we now see, and, likewise, it should encourage better attendance in committee meetings, because, in each instance, that would be the sole focal point of action, and we would not have Senate floor sessions and committee hearings going on simultaneously. As I say, that could be changed in a given situation by unanimous consent or motion as it is done now.

The next provision that I shall make reference to will be—and in all these instances may I say parenthetically that the changes in the rules which I have advocated or on which other Senators may have improvements that they would like to propose to those rules that I have suggested——

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRD. Yes, if I could just finish my sentence.

In each instance, I am only touching on those rules as to which I believe the Senate would be well advised to accept the rules changes with or without television. In the event debate is covered by television, I think these rules changes would enhance the standing of the Senate, improve on the debates, increase attendance, and enhance the Senate in the eyes of the American people.

I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, the Senator is familiar with the arguments I have made about television in years gone by and that I am making now.

Without a rules change to accompany TV in the Senate, we can imagine that any time something is before the Senate that has a great deal of interest in the country, and that is frequently the case, you could expect the debate to go a great deal longer, because in many cases the Senators would be speaking to the largest audience they have ever addressed. That will tend to slow down the work of the Senate, unless something is done by way of rules to see that it does not.

These suggestions the Senator has here would tend to make the Senate more efficient and would help save the time of Senators by getting on with the business.

It seems to me that if you are going to do something which—minus the rules changes that I do not see here at the moment—would tend to cost us a lot of valuable time, we at least should have whatever we can find as part of this to make the Senate more efficient, so that it would get on with the business.

I applaud the distinguished miority leader for suggesting these proposals, and I hope very much that the Senate will consider them.

Let me ask the Senator: Does some special procedure have to be followed in order to bring these matters to a vote, or are they available for the Senate to vote on in view of the fact that they were in the original resolution?

Mr. BYRD. They are available for the Senate to vote on. They are divisible by sections, and there are 16 sections in the resolution.

That was one reason why I would object, at least for the present, to adoption of the committee amendments en bloc. They would each be subject to separate votes as things now stand.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, the Senator from West Virginia, in my judgment, is the best parliamentarian in the Senate. I am talking about Senators. It may be that the Parliamentarian might be a better parliamentarian than the Senator from West Virginia. I am not sure about that. But other than the Parliamentarian, I think the Senator from West Virginia is the best parliamentarian in the Senate, and I have observed many parliamentarians in the 37 years I have been here.

Let me ask the Senator if this is correct: If this were not a part of the language of the measure, would it not be necessary to file notice at the desk that one wishes to amend this proposal, to have a change in the rules as part of it, and the notice would have to be at least 24 hours in advance of the date the amendment is offered?

Mr. BYRD. May I suggest that the Chair answer that question?

Mr. LONG. I address the question to the Chair. If the matter that has been stricken were not a part of the resolution and one wanted to offer something to amend this resolution, to offer a change in the rules or a measure to amend the Senate rules, would it not be necessary to file a notice of intention to offer the amendment, to state what the amendment would be, and to file that notice at least 24 hours before the amendment is offered?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct. One day's notice.

Mr. LONG. One day's notice. Does that mean 24 hours?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No, it does not. One calendar day.

Mr. LONG. So if one files today, he can bring it up at any time tomorrow. Is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. LONG. I thank the Chair.

The Senator's former colleague from West Virginia, Mr. Randolph, offered an amendment to the rules in a previous debate on TV in the Senate, and I recall that at that time he had to follow the procedure to which I have referred.

It is very important to the Senator from Louisiana that we consider the rules that must accompany TV in the Senate in order to serve the Nation's interests and the Senate's interests, and I am pleased that the minority leader saw that problem. As a member of the committee, he made his suggestions, so that they would be available to the committee and to all Senators. I believe that some of the suggestions he has made might even be some I have been making down through the years, if the Senator can recall what my suggestions have been to him.

Mr. BYRD. The Senator is correct.

The distinguished Senator from Louisiana, on several occasions, has advocated a rule which would allow a motion to be made with reference to a particular bill before the Senate—a motion that all amendments be germane and relevant. If that motion carried by 60 votes—which would be the number of votes required to invoke cloture, anyhow, on measures not involving rules changes—what it would accomplish would be this: That by the same vote, 60 votes, the Senate would vote that an amendment not germane or relevant would not be in order—cloture would accomplish the same purpose.

However, the distinguished Senator from Louisiana does not believe that cloture should be invoked in every instance just in order to rule out nongermane amendments, and I agree with him on that. That provision is carried in this resolution, with the additional provision which I have thought should be the twin brother of that amendment—namely, that to overrule the Chair with respect to what the Chair considers to be germane or not germane would require a two-thirds vote of the Senate.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, during my first day in the U.S. Senate, something was going on, a resolution of some sort, and a Senator from—I do not recall what State he was from—got up to make a speech. I will never forget the occasion. One Member got up and made a speech about something that had nothing whatever to do with what was going on. The Senator from Louisiana thought, was that man out of his mind? What is going on here does not have a thing on Earth to do with the speech that man was making. It appeared ridiculous. He was talking about the Reed-Bulwinkle bill, which I had knowledge of, which had passed in the previous Congress, and nobody was interested in that bill. I thought he must be senile or something, but he was talking about the Reed-Bulwinkle bill and not about the measure that was being considered.

Subsequently, I found that Senators were doing it all the time. They got up and made speeches about something that had absolutely nothing to do with what was going on or the measure being considered.

It seems to me that if we are going to put the Senate on television, we should require that when you have a bill before the Senate, Senators talk about the bill.

Now, I am not saying that they have to talk about the bill in the morning hour. You can set aside time or gain consent of the Senate to talk about irrelevant matters.

But the public out there is not going to understand what is going on unless we talk about the bill when it is before us while we are on television.

I have done many times myself—when I have something I want to say about a matter I come in here and ask someone to yield to me and make a speech about something that has nothing whatever to do with what is going on, insert it in the record and go on about my business.

We should not do business that way if we are on television. We ought to do business in a more orderly fashion because it is not that much of a bother to do it in an orderly fashion, if you want to do it. May I say to the Senator, it seems to me that we ought to do it whatever measure the Senate passes that has to do with television, so that we do get the opportunity to do that.

When the Senate is on television, it seems to this Senator, if we have, let us say, the Panama Canal Treaty before us, as we had before, or whatever it might be, the amendments ought to have some relative connection to the bill.

In other words, if the bill has to do with prayer in school, you should not have an abortion amendment offered on a prayer-in-school amendment because it has nothing to do with it.

It would seem to the Senator from Louisiana that for such a purpose germaneness ought to be construed more broadly than it is for purposes of the present cloture rule. But I do not see why that cannot be worked out in a way to agree that the amendment would be more germane but with a broader concept of germaneness in that situation.

Now, when that happens, we have seen under our cloture rule and we have seen under the consent rules, Senators offer amendments that are not germane, knowing they are not germane, and we see a Senator stand and move to appeal from the ruling of the Chair when the Chair upheld the Parliamentarian.

I would ask the Senator, does one of his proposals have something to do with that fact, with germaneness when one offers an amendment that has nothing whatever to do with the bill and the Parliamentarian does his duty and then for Senators for reasons of expediency proceed to vote the Parliamentarian and the Presiding Officer down?

Mr. BYRD. Yes. My provisions if adopted would allow the Chair to be overturned in its ruling anent germaneness only if two-thirds of the Senate voted to overrule the Chair.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, that would be a very important improvement of Senate procedure. I am sorry that has become necessary. But in the judgment of the Senator from Louisiana, it very much is necessary.

May I say to my distinguished leader that I believe I have been as consistent in voting to support the Parliamentarian and the Chair, when I know that they are doing their duty as the good Lord gives them the light to see it, as almost anyone in this body. I even find myself seeing the other people do the expedient thing so much that I find myself wondering what is the point of it. We really ought to come back to fundamentals and insist that we uphold the Chair when the Chair is clearly right. The Senate has trespassed in this area so much that I think it is time that Senators in their conscience support the Senator's proposal to say that where the Chair rules that something is not germane, it would require a two-thirds majority to overrule the Chair.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Louisiana asked the Chair a little earlier with respect to amendments to Senate Resolution 28, whether or not the Senate would have to be given notice 1 day in advance in writing. As I understood the Chair, the Chair answered in the affirmative. May I ask the Chair what situation would obtain in the event cloture is invoked on Senate Resolution 28? And I have reference both to the introduction of first-degree amendments and second-degree amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The cloture rule invokes additional requirements on the time for filing germane amendments in addition to the 1-day rule which is further noted.

Mr. BYRD. Let me ask the Chair specifically, in the event of a second-degree amendment which would fulfill the requirements of cloture by being offered 1 hour prior to the vote on cloture. If cloture is invoked, what about that second-degree amendment? It has had no previous day's notice in writing?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It would not be in order until the following day.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, we probably need a change in the Senate rules on this very matter.

An amendment in the first degree has a deadline of 1 p.m. on the interim day. Does this mean that as to an amendment then offered in the first degree on the interim day and with cloture's being invoked the following day that that amendment offered in the interim could not be voted on by the Senate even though the Senate might be disposed to do so during the interim day?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. BYRD. As to an amendment in the second degree, in which case the amendment has to be filed no later than 1 hour before the Senate begins the vote on cloture, is the Chair stating then that immediately after cloture is invoked that particular amendment could not be called up until the next day?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment must be filed 1 hour before the vote but could not be called up until the next day.

Mr. BYRD. Yes, Senators can all see that we have a conflict in the rules here. Ordinarily, when cloture is invoked on a matter, an amendment in the second degree to a first-degree amendment has a deadline in its filing of 1 hour before the cloture vote begins. If we are going to follow on the ordinary rule, that requires 1 day's notice in writing, then that particular amendment in the second degree could not be called up on the day cloture is invoked, but would have to wait until the next day to be offered. Is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. BYRD. Well, that is another good reason why the postcloture ought to be changed.

I do not recall our having had any such a problem arise in the past. Does the Chair, through the Parliamentarian, remember any such situation?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. We have not had the circumstance of a rules change coming under cloture since rule XXII was amended to provide for the filing.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the Chair.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. BYRD. Yes.

Mr. LONG. It seems to me, Mr. President, that that points out once again the need for a germaneness rule quite apart from the cloture itself.

Some years ago the Senator from Louisiana was managing a major revenue bill. In order to pass the bill, the Senator sought to persuade the Senate that cloture should be voted, not to limit Senators to 1 hour, that was not the problem, but in order to limit the germaneness of amendments so that we could focus on the measure before us and not have measures that had nothing whatever to do with the subject matter of that bill considered. And, to his surprise, cloture was voted the first time that we voted on it.

The Senator from Louisiana thought at the time that that might take two or three votes before we would finally get cloture. But that was in December and Senators wanted to be home for Christmas and it began to occur to them that a vote for cloture might get them home in time for Christmas.

The Senator at that time explained that the purpose was not to limit Senators' speaking. The purpose was germaneness and that, if cloture was voted, the manager offered to ask unanimous consent to let them have more time to talk if need be because the purpose was not to cut off their speeches but the purpose was to try to limit the irrelevant amendments that otherwise would be offered. And it worked very well.

But we do not have a rule, even to this day, that would let us do that. Now, a single person could have objected to any of those amendments being offered and it would have been out of order just in order to make it possible for us to move expeditiously. I hope the Senator agrees that we need something more than just a cloture rule, but a limitation certainly in the area of germaneness which need not, necessarily, be a limitation on the time of Senators to speak.

Mr. BYRD. I do agree with the Senator and do make such proposal in the package that I have offered.

Mr. LONG. I thank the Senator.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the distinguished Senator.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRD. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Is the Senator suggesting these changes in the rules in order to accommodate the Senate and its business or to accommodate television? Let me say that my basic objection to television in the Senate is I feared that the television tail is going to be wagging the business of the Nation, that we are going to basically and fundamentally change the way we do business, either through Senate rules changes or through the necessity of having to accommodate the television, not because it is necessarily in the interest of the Senate or the country and its business, but because it is necessary to accommodate television in the Senate.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, in response to the distinguished junior Senator from Louisiana, the proposed rules changes that I have incorporated in the overall resolution are meant by me to aid the Senate in the conduct of its business. Whether we have television or not, it seems to me that these are changes that ought to be made in order to make the Senate more efficient in its business. And I also think that, with the adoption of these, we would also aid television in the Senate.

As a matter of fact, I think that without most of these rules changes—not all of them, but most of them—we would not be aiding the Senate in its business. We would be going along in the same old snail's pace—sometimes too fast, sometimes too slow—as we have been operating in the last few years.

So, whether or not we have television, we should have the rules changes. But even more so should those proposed rules changes occur if the Senate televises coverage of debates.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Is the Senator suggesting that we should do away with the rule on nongermane amendments, permitting nongermane amendments?

Mr. BYRD. No; I am suggesting that a motion be in order to prohibit the introduction of nongermane amendments, and if that motion is carried in relation to a given bill before the Senate, by a vote of three-fifths of the Senate—in other words the same super majority required for cloture—then no nongermane amendments would be in order during the deliberations on that particular measure.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I thank the Senator.

Mr. BYRD. So the Senator, in that instance, would be achieving that part of cloture as to germaneness, but he would not be limiting the time of other Senators as would be the case if cloture were to be invoked.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I see. This is fundamentally different from what I thought I was hearing and I am glad the Senator clarified that.

Mr. LONG. If the Senator will yield further, it would still, would it not, do the type thing we do when we vote on cloture. We would be avoiding seeking a vote on cloture and the Senator would find his amendment would be foreclosed if cloture were voted on. Many times we simply ask unanimous consent that his amendment be considered germane for purposes of cloture in the event cloture is voted, the thought being we are not seeking to rule out his particular amendment, but that we do want germaneness in general. Therefore, in a situation that the Senator was describing, if one was seeking to limit germaneness, he would still be able to ask unanimous consent that, notwithstanding the invoking of germaneness, his amendment would be considered germane.

Mr. BYRD. Yes, he would.

The addition that I say I would make to that is that once that motion carries by a three-fifths majority, the Senate could not thereafter, by invoking the rule of "germaneness," overturn the Chair's ruling and overturn the previous decision by the Senate, which had the support of 60 votes, by a simple majority vote on invoking the rule of germaneness.

I think we saw something like that about to happen here just a year or so ago when the Senate had by decision of a supermajority ordered one thing, and then by a simple majority vote was about to overturn that previous decision by the Senate which had required 60 votes. But to overturn the Chair under my proposal, and thus the ruling of the Parliamentarian through the Chair, would require a supermajority of two-thirds.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield further, it seems appropriate to note for the RECORD that Senators need not be caught in as much of a disadvantage as might appear to one not familiar with the Senate procedures. For example, when one is on notice that efforts will be made to impose germaneness, a person wanting to sponsor an amendment could always go down, talk to the Parliamentarian, and be advised by the Parliamentarian as to how he is going to advise the Chair to rule on germaneness. And then if the amendment that might not be germane is sought, that is a good time to discuss it with the mover of the germaneness motion, to say that this would foreclose his amendment and he cannot support the motion unless consent is given, and even if germaneness is invoked his amendment would be considered germane.

The Senator from Louisiana oftentimes feels there is some other excuse for the Senate overruling the Chair. Senators could have easily consulted the Parliamentarian, and have found out how the Parliamentarian was going to advise the Chair. In my experience it has been true that the Chair always rules with the Parliamentarian on a matter of that sort.

So, one need be caught by surprise. Certainly, every Senator before he has been here 2 years ought to learn that so he has apprised himself of his problem, and can take the proper steps to protect the situation. If the Senator from Louisiana has an amendment that might not be germane, he could discuss that matter with the person moving germaneness and get the person to agree to ask consent for him notwithstanding the motion that the particular amendment be in order.

The purpose here is to accommodate the Senate business, keep us on the business before us. But the Senator from Louisiana certainly is one of those who recognizes it, and I am sure the minority leader recognizes that notwithstanding cloture, notwithstanding germaneness being voted, or given by unanimous consent. We ought to find a way to accommodate Senators who have amendments that in good conscience can be voted on. That can overcome the rigidity of the germaneness pressure.

As I say, if the Senate is to be on television I still think we ought to have a special amendment that would spell out just how strict we would like the germaneness rule to be.

In that way, you could have more flexibility with germaneness, and still have the benefit of such a rule.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the distinguished Senator.

Continuing now, one of my proposals was to install an electronic voting device so that the time on rollcalls could be greatly reduced and the time of the Senate conserved. Whether or not the Senate is operating under television coverage, this amendment should be adopted by the Senate. Most of our State legislatures, if not all, have electronic voting machines. I am not sure all have them. I know that West Virginia has electronic voting. The other body on Capitol Hill has electronic voting. It would save an astounding amount of time for the Senate if electronic voting were to be installed.

The first vote could continue as now, supposedly limited to 15 minutes—generally going to 20, 25, 30 minutes and in some cases an hour or more—and following that first vote, if there were votes stacked to occur immediately thereafter, when Senators reach the floor for the first rollcall they could stay around and vote on the succeeding stacked votes by machine. Those could be limited easily to 5 minutes, or however the Senate would want to limit the time thereon, thus, saving over the period of a year many days and even weeks—weeks—that are consumed entirely in nothing but the rollcalls of the Senate.

Mr. MATHIAS. Will the minority leader yield on that point?

Mr. BYRD. Yes.

Mr. MATHIAS. I have followed the minority leader, the distinguished Senator from West Virginia, in his comments today very closely. I have a high degree of harmony with his views as is often the case, I am proud to say.

Mr. BYRD. We refer to this between ourselves as the Potomac coalition.

Mr. MATHIAS. The Potomac coalition is strong and vital. I think it is not only good for the great State of West Virginia and the Free State of Maryland, but it is also good for the Nation.

On this one small point, however, I do have some reservations. My question is this. I am wondering how the minority leader deals with the occasional anomaly of errors that occur in the use of electronic voting systems. I do not ask that question out of just an abstract concern about the possibility of error. But at the time that I was a Member of the General Assembly in Maryland, there was in use in the House of Delegates an electronic voting system. I was a candidate for public office. My opponent began to accuse me of absenteeism in the General Assembly of Maryland. "This fellow is not on his job down there, so how can he be elected to any other job when he doesn't pay attention to the public business that he is already charged to do?"

I was dumbstruck. I said, well, I certainly was in Annapolis tending to my duties. My wife, who was frequently in attendance in the galleries—we were newly married in those days—was witness to the fact that I was present on the Senate floor, and sometimes a wife's testimony is not given all the credit that it should be. So we were dumbstruck. We wondered how can we right this terrible wrong, and here is this electronic voting machine, this immutable record which is supposed to be absolutely accurate.

We were really at a loss as to what to do about it. The fellow who came to our rescue was Charles Whiteford, distinguished reporter from the Baltimore Sun. He pointed out that on the tape recording of my votes there were in fact some absences, days on which I am sure I had been present fully, but also on some votes I was recorded both yea and nay on the same issue. So that, therefore, it could not possibly have been right. There was an error in the machine.

That may be a one-in-a-million chance. It may be a once-in-a-lifetime experience. But it was my experience. And therefore I have to confess to the Senator from West Virginia that it has prejudiced me against the electronic voting machines.

The second question that I would raise—since I am asking questions I will give him two to answer—is how would you schedule use of the machine? The way it was done in the House of Delegates, I think, was unfortunate because we would debate a number of issues and then, at a given hour, whatever the set hour might be, we would put 20 votes in a row. The Chair would just put the question one after another, bang, bang, bang, bang. And you would push your button, yea and nay, on 20 different issues without any individual discussion of each one at the time you voted. They had been discussed beforehand, but they were just voted bang, bang, bang, bang.

I think that decreased the amount of individual consideration given to issues. I am wondering how the Senator sees the scheduling of votes by electronics.

Mr. BYRD. First, regarding the statement with respect to the error that was made in the tallying of votes, such mistakes are presently made occasionally under the present system Second, it seems to me that, as we sometimes find, Senators who come to the floor to vote become engaged in discussions with other Senators and leave the Chamber not having voted and go back to their offices. In some instances, they have to retrace their steps and the Senate has to hold up its work until the particular Senator comes back to the Chamber and votes.

With an electronic system, all the Senator would need to do is to turn around, as he starts to go out the Chamber door, and take a look at that electronic board on the wall and see whether or not he has voted.

The way my proposal would be intended to work would be, on the first vote the Senate would have the same amount of time it now has, 15 minutes, 20 minutes, whatever. But the succeeding votes which could be stacked would be 5 minutes each. That could be determined by the majority leader with the concurrence of the minority leader. He might want to have 5 minutes for each vote and 2 minutes in between for a brief review of the matter to be voted on.

So, as to the first vote, everything would be as it is now, except that we would be voting electronically. The length of time would be the same as it is now. All Senators would earlier be put on notice that immediately following the first vote there would be 2 votes, 6 votes, 10 votes, whatever, and each would be for 5 minutes, 4 minutes, 3 minutes, or whatever.

I am thinking of 1 year in which there were about 700 rollcall votes in the Senate.

If only 10 minutes were allowed for each rollcall vote, that would be 7,000 minutes. If the usual would be allowed, 15 minutes, that would be 10,500 minutes. Translating that into hours and then days and perhaps weeks, one can see how much of a loss of time we engage in without really being aware of the tremendous accumulation of the loss of time.

Mr. LONG. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRD. Yes.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, this Senator did not have the opportunity to serve in a State legislature but he was a minute clerk in the State legislature at the age of 17 and again at 21. The experience of the Senator from Louisiana as a minute clerk was that we never had that problem, not in the State senate. If it occurred, we could have certainly handled it without much difficulty because in each session we would start out with the reading of the journal, which would be quickly dispensed with. But anyone could check the journal and see if he was recorded as voting properly. If not, he could ask that the journal be amended to show him voting as he would like to have been recorded.

In the Senate we have taken care of that problem from time to time when a Senator was not recorded, as the Senator from Maryland mentioned, even though he was here and voted. We have had Senators come to the Chamber and state that they were here, that they voted a certain way, and have asked that they be so recorded. Other Senators would stand up and say they saw that happen, they knew the Senator was there and saw him vote. If that was the case, we had to correct the RECORD to show that the Senator voted. I ask the Senator if that is not in accord with his recollection.

Mr. BYRD. Yes; it certainly is.

Mr. LONG. So we have corrected the RECORD on occasion to show that a Senator was present, that he did vote, and an error was made by the clerk.

You can do the same thing with the electronic part of it to handle that problem.

This Senator has made a suggestion that is not in the package but which he would like to urge be considered if we are going to deal with electronic voting. That is that when a Senator is absent, rather than us stalling and fiddling and faddling in order that the Senator can rush from the White House or somewhere to be recorded, that we change the law to say that consent can be given for the Senator to be recorded. I do not believe you can do it with a change in the rules; I believe you would have to change the law.

It would be to change the law to say that consent can be given, unanimous consent—which you cannot do now—that he can be recorded as how he wanted to be recorded with the understanding that it would not change the outcome. If it would change the outcome, a motion to reconsider could be made, if it had not already been made, or even with unanimous consent it can be reconsidered, and he can be offered another chance to vote.

It has bothered the Senator from Louisiana many times that we have tried to get an agreement to vote and some Senators cannot arrive in town until 3 o'clock in the afternoon and someone else has to leave town before 3 o'clock. It is very difficult to get the time to fit.

If we could change the law to permit that if a Senator shows up at any time during the day he could be recorded as voting provided it does not change the result, that would reduce the need of holding up the Senate or trying to find a time when everybody could be here simultaneously. The Senator knows how difficult that is because he has many times tried to put those agreements together.

Mr. BYRD. I do know how difficult that is. At the present time, the Chair is not allowed by the rules of the Senate to even entertain a request that a Senator be allowed to vote after the vote has been announced by the Chair.

I would like to join with the Senator and other Senators in thinking about the proposal the distinguished Senator has made. Perhaps if all Senators were so minded, the present rule would not be an obstruction to the idea.

Mr. LONG. I thank the Senator.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I do thank the distinguished senior Senator from West Virginia for his unfailing courtesy on the floor to accommodate other Members.

Mr. President, I rise today to urge the adoption of Senate Resolution 28, as reported by the Committee on Rules and Administration. I believe the time is long overdue that we begin lifting the self-imposed veil of silence that prevents the American people from having direct, instantaneous access to the Nation's business.

We have all been made painfully aware of the power that television and radio have to convey actions and ideas to the American people and the world. A week ago, we were a nation fixed to our television sets, watching the tragedy of the Challenger explosion unfold before our eyes.

Yet in the same week, we also saw the wonder of what television can do. The first photographs of Uranus and its moons have made short work of many long-held assumptions about our solar system, providing all of us a fascinating glimpse at a world far beyond our own.

Yet in all of the places that television cameras have gone, this Chamber is one of the few places on Earth that has continued to prohibit television and radio—the eyes and ears of the American people—from coverage of its proceedings.

Not everyone can come to Washington, DC, and visit the galleries to see their elected representatives at work. Allowing broadcast coverage of Senate debate will let them watch us do their work, and allow them to pass judgment on how we discharge our duties.

Take Gramm-Rudman-Hollings as an example. The process we will go through this year, which is mandated by Gramm-Rudman-Hollings, will affect almost every American in some way or form. In the last month, when we all returned home, every Member of this body was no doubt questioned by constituents about how this will be carried out.

What a benefit it would be if they could see how we carry this out. I recall last October, when we began debate on the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings measure, just how valuable and instructive television could have been as we embarked on one of the best discussions I have ever heard in this body on how this Nation's budgetary process works.

Mr. President, every item that comes before this body will not have the impact that Gramm-Rudman-Hollings has. Some items we may consider to be mundane, housekeeping-type work. But what one of us may consider mundane might be of great interest to some American out there watching. And we do engage in serious, thorough debate on a variety of issues that affect this Nation and the world. I think we have a duty to provide unfettered access to the American people, through the broadcast media, and allow them to be the judges on the importance of our actions.

As I have stated before, Mr. President, I strongly support the beginning of gavel-to-gavel broadcast coverage to all accredited organizations as soon as it is technically possible. I think that as an open society, we owe it to the American people who sent us here to give them full and complete access to our debates. But I am also aware of the concerns held by some Members about how rules and procedures of the Senate could be altered by adoption of this measure.

There have been questions—quite legitimate—on how broadcast coverage will be conducted; how it could affect the rights of the minority; how cameras will be placed; how broadcast coverage could affect the length and quality of debate.

That is why this resolution has been modified, taking a number of features from a number of proposals that have been introduced. The resolution before us now allows for a test period of closed-circuit coverage, so that technical modifications can be made and so Members can become accustomed to the necessary changes to the Chamber.

If anything, Mr. President, I think the addition of television and radio coverage will be an engine of change for the good of this body. I think it will make us more mindful of how we conduct ourselves, how we prepare for our work here, and will serve as a constant reminder to us that this institution has been, is, and will be a great deliberative body.

Anybody who has watched network television recently has probably seen one of the brief promotional announcements for this week's miniseries about Peter the Great. And in one of these announcements, an actor portraying the young Peter is shown addressing his subjects and saying, "I will drag you—kicking and screaming—into the modern World!"

I could not help but think that those of us who have been proponents of television in the Senate have felt those sentiments at one point or another. I hope now that, after several years of committee consideration and floor debate, we too will finally take the first step toward entering the modern world and allow television and radio coverage of our proceedings.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator for his statement. I think he put his finger on a very important point. There have been Members of the Senate who said they oppose televising the Senate proceedings because they fear it will bring about change. I think it will bring about change, no doubt about that. But we believe it will be positive change.

Mr. McCLURE. Will the Senator yield on that?

Mr. MATHIAS. Yes, Mr. President.

Mr. McCLURE. I appreciate the Senator's remarks. Let me point to one small item.

There have been a number of comments in times past about confining Members' speeches on the floor to the actual delivery of the speech. We have elaborate procedures about what goes into the RECORD and what does not. From time to time, there has been a horrendous notion that each Member should be able to speak about only what he or she knows; that they could not turn and consult with a staff member at their side to give information handed to them which is then incorporated into the speech.

If all our deliberations appeared on television, all of that would be open to the American public to see and evaluate. I rather suspect some of the reform that some critics have suggested is necessary would come about as a necessary evolution from the simple process of exposing it to public view.

(Mr. GORTON assumed the chair.)

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, I personally agree entirely with the Senator. His opinion is founded in American history, because this is not the first time the Senate has debated the question of letting the public view its proceedings. If we go back to the very early days of the Senate, this was one of the debated issues in the Senate.

The first Senate, in the initial session, followed the practice of the Continental Congress, which was to meet in closed session. The Senate continued through the first three Congresses to follow the practices of the Continental Congress in keeping its doors closed and keeping its proceedings entirely hidden from the public that it purported to represent.

As early as 1783, James Wilson, the delegate from Pennsylvania who became an outstanding proponent of democracy at the Constitutional Convention, offered a motion to open the deliberations of Congress to the public. He asserted, and I quote him because I think it is important in this case:

> It is important in every free country, that the conduct and sentiments of those to whom the direction of public affairs be committed, should be publicly known.

I think what James Wilson said in 1783 is pertinent today. It is the same sentiment the Senator from Idaho just expressed here. Proposals to open Senate sessions to the public were defeated four times in 4 successive years between 1790 and 1793. It was not until the fifth attempt—which occurred, it is interesting to note, in February 1794—that the Senate agreed to a resolution authorizing the opening of Senate legislative sessions to the public, in the words of that resolution, "so soon as suitable galleries shall be provided in the Senate Chamber."

There was not even physical accommodations for the public. They had to build them.

More than a year and a half went by before the galleries were constructed. That also seems consistent with current practices. Those in the electronic galleries who are awaiting construction of the new press facilities will be sympathetic with that delay in construction.

It was not until December 9, 1795, that the Senate was able to adopt another resolution, which announced that the public gallery had been completed and a second resolution adopted at the beginning of the first session of the fourth Congress, stated in part that these "galleries shall be permitted to be opened every morning, so long as the Senate shall be engaged in their legislative capacity, unless in such cases as may, in the opinion of the Senate, require secrecy, after which the said galleries shall be closed."

Mr. President, I think we have to note with some regret that our attitude on this matter was not as progressive as that of the other body, because Members of the other body had opened their doors to the public beginning with the very first meeting with a quorum being present, which occurred on April 1, 1789. One of the historians of the early years of the Senate has observed:

> Human nature being what it is, the private character of Senate sessions caused the suspicious to regard the Senate as a dark and mysterious place where clandestine cabals were hatched against the public interest—in marked contrast to the House of Representatives, where all was open and aboveboard. Others, reading the House debates each day in the public press and failing to notice any record of Senate activities, tended unconsciously to regard "House of Representatives" and "Congress" as virtually synonymous terms, ignoring the Senate almost entirely. House Members, whose speeches were often carefully prepared with an eye to how they would appear on newsprint, received a lion's share of the publicly and became, in the public mind, the real legislative leaders of the new Government.

Well, we hope that was, in fact, far from the case, but that seems to be the historian's perception of what it appeared to be. We are reliving that history today where every night Members of the House are seen on the television news going about their legislative business but the tube is silent as far as the activities of the Senate are concerned. So much of what the Senator from Idaho says today is supported by reference to the history of the Senate. I thank him for his contribution.

Mr. McCLURE. Will the Senator yield for one further comment?

Mr. MATHIAS. Surely.

Mr. McCLURE. I thank the Senator for the historical note, which certainly does provide a backdrop. I have always been somewhat disappointed that we were not able to open our galleries on the precise anniversary on which it had been done earlier, 200 years ago. Hopefully, we will get it done before then. I hope we do not have to wait longer.

Mr. MATHIAS. Certainly not for the terse Senator.

Mr. McCLURE. I certainly agree with that.

I think it marks also a fact which we have to understand in our public life today, that each one of us as we measure public opinion—and we do—each one of us who looks at our means by which we communicate—and we certainly all do—recognizes the great growth in the reliance by the American people upon the electronic media for their access to day-to-day news. I do not say that to derogate in any way the written press or even the radio media, but all recent studies indicate that major impressions are formulated by a major part of the American public today by what they see in capsulated versions of public discussions as contained in news on television. Anything that we can do to increase the breadth of that information and the access by the American public in that media of their choice to a greater range of information must be good for the American public.

We oftentimes quote from Jefferson that an informed electorate is the guardian and bulwark of our freedoms, and we sometimes neglect the necessity of disciplining ourselves by permitting access to the information upon which that electorate will be informed. This would be a tremendous step forward to that Jeffersonian idea.

Mr. MATHIAS. I thank the Senator.

(Mr. MATHIAS assumed the chair.)

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, this occasion marks the third Congress in a row during which the full Senate has taken up the matter of the public broadcasting of its proceedings. In the past, questions about issues such as rules changes, and the impact of "showboating" on the Senate's tradition of unlimited debate, have caused Members to question the wisdom of permitting public broadcasts. It appears to this Senator, however, that these questions are answered in Senate Resolution 28.

The resolution before us establishes a test period for electronic coverage of Senate proceedings. During the test period, we will have an opportunity to study the need for rules changes and have an opportunity to experience televised debate outside the public spotlight. If public broadcasting indeed damages the deliberative nature of the Senate, this should become apparent during the course of the test run. We can then refuse to approve a second resolution to extend gavel-to-gavel television coverage to the general public.

Our attention today, therefore, should focus not upon rules changes which might be needed to provide television to the public. We should instead discuss our obligation to the American public to take a vital step to strengthen one of the basic cornerstones of our political heritage—an open and accessible Government.

In Federalist paper No. 49, James Madison noted that "the people are the only legitimate fountain of power." Madison wrote that the public ought to control and regulate its Government, but that this required an informed and reasoned populace.

I can think of no better way to let the American public reach reasoned opinions on national issues than to provide them with the opportunity to listen and watch as this body debates those issues. And this is an opportunity we can provide using modern television and radio systems.

Other deliberative bodies have extended this opportunity to citizens throughout the world. International bodies such as the United Nations General Assembly and Security Council provide continuous live television feeds for use by networks and other interested parties. Our neighbors to the north in Canada are allowed to watch the proceedings in their national legislature on television. The same opportunity is offered to the Japanese people by the Japanese National Diet. In all, more than 20 national legislative bodies now permit television coverage of floor proceedings.

For the last 7 years, our own citizens have had the opportunity to watch the proceedings of the House of Representatives. Building from a modest start in 1979, interest in the proceedings of the House has been growing and will continue to grow. Access to the proceedings of the House of Representatives through the C-SPAN network is now provided to 23 million homes. This translates into nearly one-quarter of all households now having access to House debates. C-SPAN is carried by 2,000 cable systems in all 50 States, the Virgin Islands, and Puerto Rico. In my own State of Washington, more than 474,000 households enjoy access to the House of Representatives through C-SPAN.

These citizens have had an opportunity to see a part of their Government in action. According to their letters, they have gained an appreciation for the complexity of legislative issues and feel more in touch with their Government.

We in the Senate also have recognized the importance of open and accessible Government. We have passed legislation that gives the public the right to comment on environmental issues. We have enacted Sunshine laws that require Government agencies to conduct open meetings. We have passed Freedom of Information statutes to ensure that Americans have access to what is happening in their Government.

At times we have acted to open the Senate to the American people. As early as 1794, the Senate established a public gallery open to all citizens and the press. Given the importance of the 1977 debate on the Panama Canal Treaty, we opened the doors of the Senate to Americans with radio broadcast coverage.

Mr. President, how has the Senate built on this heritage of open and accessible Government? How have we in the Senate enhanced the reasoning abilities of the American people?

Instead of providing the American public with the ability to observe full and free debate on television, we have offered citizens in Washington and other States the opportunity to travel 2,000 or 3,000 miles to observe the Senate in action. We have forced the news networks to use caricatures in 1- and 2-minute spots to provide the American people with information on debate regarding matters of national importance. We have given the American public the opportunity to locate and read a CONGRESSIONAL RECORD—often a week or more after a debate—to obtain a complete record of our proceedings. I find these opportunities to follow the Senate's proceedings wholly inadequate in a nation that prides itself on its information sciences.

Mr. President, technology has provided us with the tools to let America understand the day-to-day workings and debates of the Senate, yet we have failed to take advantage of these tools to give citizens access to what is their Government. This Senator believes it is time for the Senate to open itself to the American people. I urge my colleagues to take a step toward this goal by supporting Senate Resolution 28.

Mr. President, it may well be that certain accommodations will have to be made by Members of this body in order to see to it that television can and will work in the Senate. Nevertheless, it seems to this Senator that it is up to us to accommodate to the American people, rather than to demand that the American people accommodate to us.

I have every fervent hope that the ultimate result of television in the Senate will be not only a better informed electorate but also greater attention paid to debating true major issues which come before this body and which affect the constituents we represent.

It may well be that we will find that certain parts of our debate, when we are not dealing with specific legislation, are either inappropriate or, more likely, too dull to command public interest to any great extent. Issues relating to policies of national security, to budget debates, to tax reform, and to farm policy, on the other hand, possibly should be available directly to the American people, rather than through the lens or the interpretation solely of the press. This seems to me a proposition very difficult to debate.

The present occupant of the chair, the chairman of the Rules Committee [Mr. MATHIAS] has been a thoughtful observer and a very careful participant of this movement and is to be greatly commended for having caused this debate to reach this point. I hope that he, the other Members of the Senate and the people of the United States soon have the reward of those efforts.

Mr. MURKOWSKI. Mr. President, I rise in support of Senate Resolution 29, which would permit gavel-to-gavel television coverage of our Senate proceedings. This much needed change in our way of doing business will bring an important part of our Government closer to our citizens.

From the experience of television proceedings of the House of Representatives, and some of our own Senate committee hearings, it is clear that citizens who have access to the broadcasts are watching. Some 23 million American homes can view congressional proceedings now, through the services of Cable Satellite Public Affairs Network, commonly known as C-SPAN. The latest figures indicate that as many as 30 million Americans watch an average of 12 hours of congressional proceedings per month.

These facts about viewing habits establish that legislative programming is not only in the public interest, but this is programming in which the public is interested. The public deserves this access to both Houses of Congress.

Mr. President, it is important to point out that for many Americans, particularly those in the Western States, televised coverage is the best and perhaps only access they will have to congressional proceedings.

We faced a similar situation in Alaska, which as you know is the largest State in the Union covering some 375 million acres. I note with pride that Alaska was a pioneer in televising our legislature from Juneau to communities across our State. The immense size of Alaska has elevated the importance of telecommunications, and by using the satellite system our State provides Alaskans a firsthand look at our State legislature at work.

By doing the same on the national level, televised coverage of our proceedings will give all Americans a chance to hear directly the pros and cons of an issue. Information would not have to be filtered through the media or subject to interpretations by reporters and nightly newscasters. In fact, debates affecting a specific State, which might not otherwise be reported by the press, could be seen by citizens who have a stake in the issue.

This is an appropriate time to begin televising our proceedings. Significant and controversial issues are being debated now in the Senate that have obvious long-term consequences to our future fiscal policies and foreign relations. For example, it is safe to say that many Americans are uncertain about the effect the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings amendment might have on their lives. I believe that much confusion surrounding this measure could have been avoided had Americans had a chance to see the Senate debate that piece of legislation. The Senate's historic Saturday and Sunday debates last fall provided real insight into the reasons why Gramm-Rudman-Hollings is needed, and the discussion certainly explained in detail what the measure was designed to accomplish. I am convinced that if our debate had been televised, the real problem of the budget deficit would have been more meaningful to the American public—all of whom are impacted by it.

Americans should learn more about the Senate of the United States. It is a body of the richest tradition and history. There are those who oppose televising our deliberations for fear that the unique procedures of the Senate will be misunderstood and misinterpreted by those who watch. We've all heard the remarks from our constituents who visit the Senate gallery during a quorum call, and wonder why we're not debating.

Mr. President, televising our proceedings will be a good first step for our citizens to learn about this great body. Of course, additional steps should be taken to help explain our procedures and traditions. For example, I urge the senior Senator from West Virginia to continue his discourses on the history of the Senate. I also suggest to the senatorial working group that will evaluate our procedures if this resolution passes, that they consider preparing materials that can be distributed to those viewers who have questions about our traditions and procedures.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to support this resolution. It's time that we take advantage of the technology of the 20th century and bring the Senate closer to the people.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I rise to voice my support for Senate Resolution 28 which authorizes a test period for television and radio broadcast coverage in the Senate.

In this electronic age where radio and television have become a dominant medium for information dissemination, Senate proceedings should be made available to the American public. Democracy thrives on open government and Senate Resolution 28 provides the public with an opportunity to form independent opinions from unfiltered coverage.

Radio and television coverage is important because it will:

First. Maximize public access to the legislative process;

Second. Encourage Senators to be more accountable and responsive to the people's needs; and Third. Provide the citizens of the United States with an opportunity to learn about Congress firsthand.

Mr. President, I have been a cosponsor of legislation to establish TV-radio coverage of Senate proceedings for many years. This legislation is long overdue. I regret the fact that it has been watered down by the Committee on Rules and Administration. I prefer the original bill which calls for complete coverage of all Senate proceedings on national TV. However, passage of the legislation before us today would be an inportant step toward achieving that goal.

The crucial point is this: The American people have the right to participate in our Government by watching and gaining greater understanding of the deliberations and decisions of the U.S. Senate. That is why I have always supported complete TV and radio coverage of Senate proceedings and that is why I strongly support passage of Senate Resolution 28.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I will continue now with my brief explanation of the amendments contained in Senate Resolution 28, amendments which deal with changes in the Senate rules. I hope I can be brief, because it is not my desire to keep other Senators from having a chance to speak.

The so-called 3-day rule—under which I chafed a great deal when I was majority leader of the Senate, would be changed by my proposal. It would become a 2-day rule. It would exclude Sundays and legal holidays prior to the consideration of any measure or matter. Heretofore, even though the Senate were in session on Saturdays, Saturdays did not count against the 3-day rule. If this provision were to be adopted, then no measure or matter reported by any standing committee would be considered in the Senate, unless the report of that committee would be available to Members for at least 2 calendar days, excluding Sundays and legal holidays, as I have stated.

With reference to the motion which the distinguished Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] talked about earlier, this resolution would provide that it shall be in order twice during a calendar day to move that no amendment—other than reported committee amendments—which is not germane would be in order to the measure. The motion would be debatable for no more than 1 hour. An affirmative vote of three-fifths of the Senators present and voting would be required to prohibit amendments that are not germane.

Whenever an appeal is taken from a decision of the Presiding Officer on that question of germaneness of an amendment, or whenever the Presiding Officer submits the question of germaneness to the Senate, the vote necessary to overturn the decision of the Presiding Officer or to hold the amendment germane would be two-thirds of the Senators present and voting. No amendment proposing sense-of-the-Senate or sense-of-the-Congress language that is not germane would be considered.

In the event a cloture motion is offered, two-thirds of the Senators duly chosen and sworn would be required to invoke cloture.

So the provisions in my resolution would tighten up on rule XXII, in that it would require two-thirds of those duly chosen and sworn—in other words, 67 Senators—at times when there is a full membership of 100 Senators, to invoke cloture.

The tightening up of the cloture rule in that respect would be compensated on the other side by providing that once cloture is invoked, the fun is over; because, instead of 100 hours—as at present—no more than 20 hours of consideration of the measure, motion, or other matter on which cloture has been invoked would then be available overall.

Mr. President, I thank other Senators for their patience. I have not gone into detail with respect to every change in the rules, but only those rules which I feel are most in need of change, and especially those rules changes that would help to make televised and radio coverage of the Senate contribute to a more informed public and, at the same time, preserve the unique role of the Senate as a deliberative body.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the minority leader yield?

Mr. BYRD. I am glad to yield.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, as a freshman Member of this body, I cannot for a moment speak to the question of rules changes with the kind of expertise and experience brought to this question by my distinguished senior colleagues. But I have tried to study the rules carefully, and I have spent some time reviewing the proposed changes recommended by the distinguished minority leader.

For what it is worth, this freshman Senator supports each and every one of the proposed rules changes which we have just heard discussed.

I agree with others who have said these changes should be adopted whether or not we bring the television cameras and the radio microphones into this Chamber. It is my view that if the resolution as it was reported from the committee is approved by the Senate there would be tremendous pressure on this body to actively consider and then adopt the rules changes as recommended by the distinguished minority leader.

If this body chooses to adopt the committee resolution I will be joining the minority leader and many of my colleagues in urging that this course of action be followed by the Senate. It will be difficult, in fact, for the Senate to follow any other course of action, because the test period cannot be converted into full broadcast coverage until the Senate acts again and, as stated by the chairman of the Rules Committee, we will have before us at the same time recommendations of the committee on the package of rules changes recommended by the minority leader.

Some will recommend that we adopt some or all of these rules changes now. If I felt that could be accomplished, I would be in favor of it.

My own concern, which I have expressed privately to the minority leader and to others, is that a full-blown debate on all of these rules changes now could serve the unintended purpose of holding up the resolution on broadcast coverage. If that debate can take place without holding up the committee's resolution on broadcast coverage, it will certainly serve a useful purpose, and again even if the committee resolution is adopted, as reported out by the committee, the pressure will be on the Senate to consider these rules changes.

Again, I for one support them very strongly.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GORE] for his expression of support for the rules changes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GORTON). The Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, the Senate is being asked today to consider Senate Resolution 28. As amended in the committee, this would provide for a test period for radio broadcast and closed-circuit television coverage of all proceedings in the Senate Chamber.

Senate Resolution 28 proposes an approximately 3 to 6 months test during which Senate proceedings will be broadcast live on radio and will be televised on the in-house closed-circuit congressional system.

These broadcasts will be provided free to the radio and television correspondents' gallery. Copies of the tape will be available to Senators, gallery members, including the media, and to others as may be authorized by the Rules Committee. The committee stripped from this resolution rules changes originally proposed by Senator BYRD.

Mr. President, it seems to be most unfortunate that the committee did not see fit to bring us rules to help guide the Senate's action in the TV era.

Some years ago the Senator from Louisiana opposed an effort to install gavel-to-gavel coverage in the Senate. The effort was most ably led by the senior Senator from Tennessee at that time, Mr. Baker. After considerable debate it was agreed that the matter would be referred to the Rules Committee and that the Rules Committee was to recommend a resolution with rules to accompany TV coverage.

Now, why the committee did not do that is difficult for the Senator from Louisiana to understand.

At the time we sent the resolution to the committee it was frankly my impression that the measure would come back from the committee with a set of rules covering the type of matters that the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. BYRD] has mentioned and would probably be amended on the Senate floor to accommodate the views of the entire Senate. This would give every Senator a chance to make his contribution, and in that fashion the Senate would then proceed to vote for television.

It did not happen, and this Senator can never understand why not.

After considering the matter for some time the committee reported back the same thing all over again, basically television coverage immediately in the Senate, and said that no rules change would be in order or was necessary.

That to me, Mr. President, could lead us to a very unfortunate situation. There is no doubt in the mind of the Senator from Louisiana that Senators will talk a great deal more than they have in the past if the Senate is on television under its existing rules.

Just to give one example. A very thoughtful Senator who seldom makes a speech on the Senate floor and is much admired and respected and draws the attention of the Senators when he does speak, a very persuasive and effective Senator, put it this way to me. He said:

> Under the existing set of rules and procedures I address the Senate about once a month. If the Senate were under television coverage as it stands today, I would have to speak about once a week so my constituents would understand that I was here looking after their interest and taking care of their problems.

That 4-for-1 increase in speaking is something that you can anticipate under the Senate rules as they exist to date, and this Senator has yet to hear a convincing argument that it would not happen if the Senate were on television under the rules as they exist now.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GORE. The most convincing argument in my view is the experience of the House of Representatives in this regard. Similar predictions were made in advance of the decision by the other body to open its proceedings to television coverage.

A recent survey of the debate time before television coverage and after television coverage indicates that there has not been an increase in the number of speeches made by individual Members of the other body and there has not been an increase in the amount of time consumed by individual speeches.

There has been an increase in the number of what they refer to as 1-minute speeches with which my colleague is quite familiar. But some have argued that even that is not a bad result.

Certain changes in this institution after we get some familiarity with television might include, just as an example, a change from 15-minute special-order speeches to 5-minute special-order speeches if our experience indicated that the speeches at the beginning of the day were going to proliferate.

But overall, I want to return to the point, which I believe constitutes a convincing argument, the experience of the other body was that the number of speeches and the length of speeches did not increase after the introduction of television coverage.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I am not at all persuaded by that argument, and it was made in the Senate before.

The House has a Rules Committee. Before a measure is brought before the House, the Rules Committee meets. It holds its hearings. It decides how long the measure should be debated, if it is going to be debated at all. It decides how many amendments can be offered and how long those amendments can be discussed. It is very closely and strictly limited.

So, the leadership of the Rules Committee, working with the Speaker, and that is generally regarded as the Speaker's committee, the Rules Committee over there, and the Speaker, with the help of the Rules Committee, can very closely limit the amount of debate in the House. It has always been that way. So the situation is entirely different.

Under the rules of the Senate, a Senator, as this Senator at this moment is doing, can take the floor and talk just as long as his legs and his lungs will hold him, and Senators do.

I could stand here, if I wanted to, and talk until midnight. I could talk until the following midnight, when I was the age of the Senator from Tennessee, I can assure him.

Mr. MATHIAS. Will the Senator yield for a brief comment?

Mr. LONG. Yes.

Mr. MATHIAS. I just want to put the case that the Senator from Tennessee has put in a slightly different way. I understand what the Senator's concern is, and it is a reasonable concern. He understands human nature and we all like to preen and strut, as Shakespeare put it, to strut for our hour, our brief hour, upon the stage. We know it is brief and we know we are on the stage only a certain time and we want to make the most of it.

Mr. LONG. "And then is heard no more."

Mr. MATHIAS. And will be heard no more. We all want to get ahead of that hour when we are heard no more. So the Senator is talking about human nature. I think that his concern is real and genuine and I do not make light of it.

But, as the Senator from Tennessee has said, the experience in the House is otherwise. There is another human factor that comes into that, and that is the fear of looking foolish. It is one thing to look foolish in an empty Chamber, it is another thing to look foolish when the eyes of 225 million Americans are upon you. And that is a powerful discipline.

But, beyond that, the point the Senator from Tennessee has made is supported by the study made by the Rules Committee, a very careful study made by the Rules Committee of the effect of televising legislative proceedings in many of the legislatures of the States in the Union and in many national legislatures of other nations. We could not find a single case where there was a substantial increase in the amount of debate that resulted from the televising of the proceedings, with this exception: The first week or two, people may have been a little more verbose and they would preen themselves before the camera. But that discipline of not wanting to look foolish soon took effect and Members calmed down, quieted down, and spoke with greater clarity, with more precision, with greater conciseness than they have ever spoken before.

So I hope that the Senator from Louisiana would let me put in his hands, within the next day or so, a copy of that report looking at the experience in other legislatures, not just the House of Representatives, but other legislatures, which may be helpful in addressing the very real and very genuine concern that he has about the Senate.

Mr. GORE. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I will yield in 1 minute, but I want to respond to the Senator from Maryland before I yield further.

I am not convinced by what the Senator has said.

Mr. MATHIAS. I do not expect the Senator to be convinced. All I said is, I would like him to study the record, just study the record.

Mr. LONG. Please let me go forward. I say to the Senator. I am not convinced by what the Senator said because he is not referring me to somebody whose rules I thoroughly understand. If he is referring to the House of Representatives, I have told the Senator my opinion about that. I do not know what the rules are in Sweden or Timbuktu or God knows where else around the world.

I do know something about the rules in the Louisiana Legislature. In the Louisiana Legislature, that would be no problem, because all that fellow who has a bill up there has to do is to move the question. And if he has a majority of the votes, you would proceed to vote. He could call his bill up and make his presentation. Having done so, he usually waits for the other side to make their presentation. After both sides have had a chance to be heard, at anytime he feels like doing it from that point foward, if he has the votes for his bill, he can get up and move the previous question. And if he has the votes, they will vote the question, which means they will now vote on the bill and that means no further debate. So they vote. One could very well limit debate in a situation like that. We do not have such a rule here.

The Senator talks about how someone can make himself look foolish by talking at great length. Let me tell the Senator that now and then a speaker comes along who is speaking about what people agree with out there, who makes sense to people, and he starts getting wires, "Keep up the fight; carry on."

For example, the Senator from Louisiana was here when we had the vote on either the cigarette or gas tax, as I recall. Senators wanted to go home that night. I am sure the Senator from Maryland recalls it because if he was here, he was vexed that a Senator from North Carolina thought he was going to speak against the measure.

Now, for the Senate, that was very unpopular, because we made up our minds how we would vote. All we wanted to do was vote and get out of here. It was late at night and it was late in the session.

The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. EAST], bless his heart, started speaking. And, mind you, nobody wanted to hear any of it.

Well, the Senator from Louisiana went to his hideaway and turned on the squawk box to hear what the man was saying. The more he heard it, the more he thought, "Well, boy, we are lucky that speech is not being heard by the folks down in North Carolina, because all those tobacco farmers or other folks would be sending in wires and letters and telephone calls saying, 'JOHN, keep up the fight. That man up there is the only man here who is for the people. He is a man we can count on to speak up for what is good for America.' "

I could just picture JOHN EAST getting bushels and barrels of telegrams and the cloakrooms getting calls, every booth in the cloakroom ringing, to convince JOHN to carry on, keep up the fight—"we are with you 1 million percent."

When a Senator gets that kind of help and he has got the Senate against him, but he knows he has millions of people out there for him, wiring him and making themselves heard, can you not hear the man carry on? I guarantee you that he would not have shut up for the next 6 hours if it was within his power to keep going. That is the kind of encouragement one can have when he has the support for what he is saying and what he is doing, even though he is badly outnumbered.

Now, this Senator has seen those situations where you have two sides that are very well divided but where both sides have strong support, and one who is speaking for what his people want, even though he is in the minority, receiving all those calls from back home to keep up the fight. I could just see him going on and on.

As a matter of fact, I am sure the Senator has had occasion in his vast worldly experience to speak before a hometown crowd, get going with what the crowd really likes and they pour it on him and then he goes on and on, and the crowd hoots and cheers.

Mr. MATHIAS. As my dear friend, the Senator from Louisiana knows, it does not require televising the Senate to get that reaction. We have gotten that reaction. In fact, I have seen Senators on the floor go on and on, even without television. So I do not think that will make all that negative a change.

Mr. LONG. Well, Mr. President, if the Senator from Maryland can inspire the Senator from Louisiana to get excited, as sometimes happens, think what the people of Louisiana can do when they tell their Senator: "Carry on the fight."

I can just see the Senator from Ohio [Mr. METZENBAUM] making his fight to make those rich people pay some taxes and see the people calling and wiring and saying, "Keep up the fight; keep up the fight, HOWARD. Go to it, old boy. Tell those people and get with it. Don't let up for a moment."

And as hard as it is to make that man stop when he thinks he is fighting a hopeless cause, I know it would be that much tougher when he has those wires and letters from the folks back home encouraging him to carry on his fight. And if he were 10 years younger, he would talk about twice as long, also, just knowing that he thought like the rest of us. Some of us cannot stand and talk as long as we did when we were younger.

I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I just wanted to cite the cumulative record in the other body and, in doing so, note that it is not at all uncommon for the other body to report measures to the floor under an open rule. In fact, a great many of the debates which take place in the other body take place without constraints, other than the so-called 5-minute rule, which is very frequently observed in the breach with the common procedure of asking unanimous consent to proceed for an additional 10 or 15 minutes.

If the hypothesis put forward by the senior Senator from Louisiana is correct that the presence of cameras has the overall effect of quadrupling the amount of time that normal human beings will wish to speak about the matters which come before the body for consideration, surely that would have been reflected in the experience of the other body.

And yet, in 1978, before television coverage was available in the other body, they were in session and debating for 1,015 hours. The following year, after television coverage was allowed, that number dropped to 974 hours. The following year, in 1980, it dropped again to 901 hours. In 1984, it was 853 hours. I do not have the comparable figure for 1985 yet. But my point is, human nature is largely the same in both bodies.

Though the rules are different, the effect of televising speeches on the behavior of the Members of the other body should not be all that different from what it would be here in this body. And the self-correcting mechanism inherent in the television medium to which I referred earlier, I think, is the reason for this dropoff in the amount of time consumed in debate in the other body after the introduction of television coverage. As the Senator from Louisiana said earlier, there are constraints on the amount of time someone can speak—how long he can stand on his feet, how long his wind holds out, how long he can ward off exhaustion.

Television introduces yet another constraint: How long that Senator can continue speaking before his or her constituents have had it, and let that Senator know through communications to his or her office that it is not going over very well.

I think that is something that would protect this body from the abuse of television broadcast coverage which our different rules would certainly make technically possible.

Mr. METZENBAUM addressed the Chair.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, let me claim my right to the floor, then I will yield to the Senator from Ohio or anyone else.

Mr. President, as to the motion that the rules of the House are so different from those of the Senate, I am just not for a moment convinced that the Senator is correct about that matter. When a person seeks recognition in the House, I see the Presiding Officer say "For what purpose does the gentleman rise?" If the Presiding Officer ask it over here, he will say,"It is none of your business for what purpose I rise." [Laughter.]

"I will tell you after I have been at it for a while."

So it is just a completely different operation.

I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I had not really intended to join this debate, but I thought I would come over just to express a few observations in support of the concept of television in the Senate.

I think one of the strongest——

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I yielded for a question. The Senator has a way of making some great speeches.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I thought the Senator had yielded. I apologize.

Mr. LONG. I yielded for a question. I have some material I want to discuss. I will be glad to yield for a question or for a brief statement.

Mr. METZENBAUM. It is going to be a brief statement.

Mr. LONG. About 1 or 2 minutes?

Mr. METZENBAUM. That is correct.

Mr. LONG. I yield for that.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I thank the Senator from Louisiana.

I think one of the strongest reasons to have television in the Senate is because our rules need changing. Our rules need changing with respect to the manner in which we vote, the length of time we spend voting with respect to postcloture debates, or with respect to electronic voting, and a number of other ideas that should be changed.

I remember it was not too many years ago that it was proposed, and there was a committee appointed by Senator BYRD and Senator Baker, if my recollection serves me right, to move along in this very area. As a matter of fact, the distinguished Senator from Louisiana and I both served on that committee. My recollection was that the Senator from Hawaii, Senator INOUYE, was the chairman of that committee.

I remember so well that we had come to an agreement as to the limitations that should be put upon debates, and subsequent to cloture. To the best of my knowledge, the Senator from Hawaii on behalf of those of us on this side of the aisle made several representations to the other side indicating we were prepared to move forward along that line. I am informed nothing came of it, and, in fact, that there was no response.

I do not stand here in order to point the finger, or to say somebody is to blame. But I think I, as one who has not hesitated to use the Rules of the Senate in accordance with the language of those rules, feel very strongly that they should be changed. I think the cloture vote ought to require less than three-fifths. I am prepared to say that I will vote for a bare majority. I would be prepared to say that postcloture there would be maybe no debate—no debate at all once cloture is invoked. That is the end of it.

I said many times on the floor as well as in the Democratic caucuses that as long as the rules are what they are I see no objection to any Member using those rules but that the rules should be changed, and we would be a better body when they are.

My view, I say to the Senator from Louisiana, is exactly the opposite of his; that it might cause at the inception some to have the excitement of being on continuous television, and talking on ad infinitum. I do not think that would wear very well with the public. I think that this is a major step in the right direction to open to the public—and I realize there are limitations in this proposal. But it is a step in the right direction to open the Senate floor to more information to people of this country.

I hope we will try this experiment, and see if it will work. I might speak at greater length. I indicated to the Senator from Louisiana I would not impose upon his courtesy in permitting me to make this statement, but I do appreciate it very much. I stand here only for the purpose of saying I think television in the Senate would help us move this body a long way forward with respect to our time.

Mr. LONG. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, I am delighted to hear the Senator say that he thinks the rules should be changed. I agree that they should be changed. I frankly think that if television in the Senate is to come, we ought to insist if we can—insofar as this Senator is concerned, I would certainly insist if we were going to have television in the Senate—that we make some changes in these rules to accommodate certain pressing matters such as those discussed by the Senator from West Virginia, which, incidentally, were in the resolution. I see a line to strike them out. But they were there. I heard the Senator from Tennessee say he favored every one of them.

Some of those sugestions, may I say, are some that the Senator from Louisiana had on occasions suggested to the Senators, including the Senator from West Virginia. For example, this matter by which you would not have to invoke cloture to impose germaneness. You could just make a motion for germaneness, and with 60 percent vote for germaneness. You could do this rather than have a limitation of time, if all you really wanted to do was have the benefit of a germaneness rule rather than try to limit everybody's right to speak.

But, in any event, there are certain things that need to be done. And you wonder why. Why, Senator, is a motion to proceed still subject to unlimited debate? A motion to proceed to consider a bill? I am like the Senator. I gave unanimous consent to bring this bill up today. I did not object. But I have many times debated the motion to proceed purely as a dilatory tactic. I ought to feel, well, that gives me a better chance to make more speeches because you can make the motion to proceed.

Has the Senator debated a motion to proceed? I know I have.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I certainly have. Frankly, I think there is no reason for that to be a debatable motion. But those are the rules of the Senate. So we all have the privilege of using those rules. But that does not mean we should not change the rules.

Mr. LONG. I would join the Senator in changing them.

I will tell you frankly, Senator, television means I am going to do more talking. I will say that right now. People are not going to have to say, "Where is old RUSSELL? Why don't we hear from him?" They will hear from old RUSSELL.

Mr. BYRD. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. BYRD. I would like to see the Senator from Louisiana make more speeches. I was disappointed to hear the Senator state the decision which he had been pondering for a long time; namely, that he was going to leave the Senate after this year. I dare say if he goes on television making speeches and letting the listening Americans get the point of his arguments, there might be a great ground swell for him to change his mind. I would like to see him change his mind.

Mr. GORE. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. GORE. If the introduction of television into this Chamber will cause the senior Senator from Louisiana to speak more frequently and give Members of this body the benefit of his advice on more occasions, the Senator has perhaps inadvertently introduced a powerful argument in favor of opening up this Chamber to broadcast coverage.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I will be glad to make more speeches provided other Senators do not do the same thing. [Laughter.]

But if there are going to be 99 other Senators making more speeches, thanks, but, no, it would be better if I would make less.

Many years ago there was a member of the Chamber of Commerce in Shreveport who asked me to make a speech. He came by my office subsequently and asked how I enjoyed the occasion. I said, "I did not enjoy it a darn bit. I would have been glad to not make a speech if you had not called on all these other fellows to make speeches. Why do you not draw straws next time and let one or two make speeches instead of all of them?"

Some of them were irritated because I said the honest truth as I saw it. If I had to hear all those other fellows make their speeches, I would just as soon not make mine.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. METZENBAUM. The Senator was addressing himself to the germaneness question. The Senator from Ohio, the Senator from Louisiana, the Senator from West Virginia, from Tennessee, Texas, and New Mexico have all seen on the floor of the Senate time and time again there is an appropriations bill and some amendment is added to it that has nothing to do with the subject matter. I remember when Warren Magnuson was here. He used to almost cry, "Why do you have to put all these amendments on the appropriations bills?" There were almost tears in his eyes.

I just heard the Senator from Louisiana say something about 60 votes in order to determine a question with respect to germaness. I sort of wonder whether the Senate would be a better body if once the Parliamentarian had decided that something was nongermane, from that point on and henceforth as far as that bill is concerned, there would be no appeal. That would be a final decision, that it was not germane and, therefore, it does not get onto that bill.

I think we all recognize the Parliamentarian is the objective arbiter of what is and what is not germane. The question is it bears on schools, or it is abortion, it is busing, or any one of those issues, and so many others as well. It is something far out having nothing to do with the legislation. We then have the question of, is it germane? That is submitted to the body. The people do not really vote on whether it is or is not germane, but vote on the matter by how they feel on the subject.

Mr. LONG. I vote on the issue of germaneness. This Senator may, on one or two occasions, have been persuaded to go along with what appeared to be an advantage to his State or with the fear of being misunderstood by a very large group, but the Senator will find very few cases where this Senator has not supported the Chair on a matter of germaneness.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I was not talking about the Senator but of the body as a whole.

Mr. LONG. It makes me resentful that others do not do the same thing. It is our duty. We hire a man to do that job, a fellow doing his dead level best, as the Almighty gives him the power to reason and see it, has done his duty and advised the Chair. The Parliamentarian and the Chair have both done their duty. Then to overrule them to me is just wrong and we should not do it.

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. BYRD] suggested we require a two-thirds majority. That would help a lot to sustain the Chair. I might even be willing to make it a three-fourths majority. I do not think the Senator will be able to persuade the Senate to go along with something that says it is not subject to appeal, but to require a larger majority might be sold to the Senate. The Senator and I seek the same objective. I would like to move as far as we can in that direction. I think it might be two-thirds to some or three-fourths.

I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, I have not been alone in my concern about this issue. When a proposal for broadcast of Senate floor proceedings was considered in April 1982, Members of the Senate debated the impact this would have on the Senate and its procedures. As a result of that debate, the Senate approved a resolution which recognized that regulations and rule changes needed to be considered for the proper implementation of television and radio coverage.

I voted in favor of Senate Resolution 20 during 1982 because I believed that it reflected the Senate's recognition that changes in our rules and precedents were warranted prior to the introduction of television coverage of our proceedings. I am still of this opinion regarding the Senate's intention in the passage of Senate Resolution 20.

When television was again considered in 1984, the Senate then refused to limit debate on a proposal that called for live gavel-to-gavel coverage, without rule changes. I believe this, too, reflected the view that the Senate needs to consider rules and regulation changes before broadcast coverage is authorized.

The issues before the Senate have not changed. We still have an obligation to address the impact that television coverage will have on this body in order to assure fairness and to preserve the traditions of the Senate.

There are some, Mr. President, who contend that the test period called for in Senate Resolution 28 answers the problems that previously faced the Senate in our consideration of this issue. It is suggested that a test period will help identify the rules changes that will become necessary as a result of the introduction of television. I strongly disagree with this view.

The test period called for in Senate Resolution 28 will do nothing to address the fundamental concerns that many of us share regarding the impact of television on the Senate as an institution. All this test period will do is help us determine where cameras should be placed, how much lighting will be required and how we can best present ourselves to the public.

Mr. President, my reservations about television coverage of Senate proceedings are not based on my concern for where cameras should be placed, the amount of lighting required or any of the mechanical aspects of television coverage. Rather, my concerns are rooted in my regard for the Senate as an institution and for its role as a deliberative body. I do not believe that the test period provided for in Senate Resolution 28 can serve to test this sort of impact.

Simply stated, a test period providing for closed circuit television coverage will do nothing to test the propensity of Members to tailor debate for broadcast to the public at large, since the public will not receive live television broadcasts during the test period. The incentive for Members to give lengthy speeches for "home consumption" will not be present during this test period. The principal concerns that most of us have about the impact of television on the Senate and on debate within the Senate will not be addressed by this test.

For this reason, Mr. President, I must oppose Senate Resolution 28, as reported by the Rules Committee. This resolution does nothing to address the primary problems with television that the Senate has recognized in the past. All this resolution does is seek to avoid the hard choices and decisions concerning revision of the Senate rules and precedents that will be required if the Senate is to conduct its business properly when we are presented with the opportunity to play to a larger audience.

I do not believe that we should use the proposal for a test period as a way in which to avoid the difficult choices regarding rules changes that we know will be necessary to accommodate television. Neither should we go through the motions of a test period that would do nothing to solve the real problems regarding debate that are the cause of concern.

When the issue of televising Senate proceedings has come before us previously, I have spoken at length of the dangers this action presents to the Senate as an institution. Since I continue to believe television coverage would not be of benefit to the Senate or the country, I think it is necessary for us to consider again the problems that television coverage would likely bring.

We all know that television does not simply record actions. Television helps shape events and television will shape our actions in the Senate. I believe that we must decide whether this will help the Senate conduct its business and serve its role in our Government.

The major purpose of debate on the Senate floor in our representative form of Government is to persuade 50 other Senators elected by the voters of their States to support your position on an issue.

There are times when it is clear that most Senators have made up their minds about how they will vote on a proposal. In those instances, speakers channel the debate to the points that are important to those undecided Senators.

What will persuade them? What factors will they consider in making up their minds? Undecided Senators are the audience to address, not the television audience, under our present situation.

Television will encourage us to use the Senate floor in ways that are unnecessary and ways that are not helpful to the decisionmaking process. It will encourage us to appeal to the electorate, to our constituents, and to those we hope will vote for us in some future election.

We can do that elsewhere. There is no need for us to do that on the Senate floor. It will be harmful to the institution of the Senate if we do.

Mr. President, one of the ways I suspect Senators will be tempted to use a televised Senate floor is to secure their own reelection or to campaign for a higher office. I do not think this should surprise any of us. We are political animals and many of our numbers have aspirations to continue their careers by seeking other offices.

However, I do not understand why we should provide what will amount to free television time for incumbents to run for office as well as for carrying out their official duties. And in terms of television coverage, it will be impossible to separate the two activities.

Mr. President, I am not so naive as to believe that the Senate Chamber is not currently used to make speeches or introduce bills that are primarily for home consumption. The incentive to use the Senate floor to make speches that do not further the business of the Senate would be so much greater if that speech could be beamed to all our constituents and those we hope to make our constituents in future elections. We would in fact be making Senators who are candidates an offer they could not refuse.

This offer would be at a cost to the Senate in dollars and in our ability to discharge the business of this Nation. The number of speeches would increase. At $515 per page, the cost of printing the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD would increase. I have no doubt the Senate would be in session longer hours, increasing the cost of operation.

I know Senators can debate this, but I firmly believe we shall be in session twice as many hours if we are on television. Longer hours means that the doorkeepers, those at the desk, the pages, and all others over a period of time will necessarily have to be accommodated, either by very large pay increases or by simply hiring more of them. That runs up the cost of Government, Mr. President, for which the taxpayers will pay.

That is interesting when one looks at the polls. The polls I have seen indicate that when asked the question, "Would you like to see the Senate on television?" The majority tend to say Yes until you raise the issue of cost. When the question is asked, "Do you think the Senate ought to be on television even if it costs the taxpayers $5 million a year?" Then the answer comes in resoundingly No by an overwhelming majority.

In my judgment, Mr. President, these sessions will require a great deal more time. It will mean that we will have to print a much longer RECORD, it will mean that we will have to have a great number of additional doorkeepers and other personnel. So it will cost a great deal more than any estimate I have seen.

That is not unusual in this Government, to have someone bring us an estimate that proves to be in error. I have seen some estimates that proved to be in error by as much as 100 to 1 in my service in the Senate. So that would not be surprising, to see another estimate very much out of line, that would estimate the cost at a minimum which proves to be much greater than one anticipates.

In all fairness, Mr. President, I do not believe this action can be characterized as opening up a closed Senate. There is public access to what we do here. The galleries are open. The press has complete access to what transpires here. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is available in every depository library in the country.

I also do not believe that the presence or absence of television cameras is the deciding factor of whether a Government body or agency is open and responsive to the people. Surely the absence of television in the Oval Office does not mean that the Presidency and its workings are not responsive to the public and its needs.

Mr. President, I firmly believe that television coverage will result in longer and more unnecessary speeches which will crowd an already overloaded Senate schedule. I will admit, honestly, that our behavior would be changed by television coverage. We would be forced to speak on the Senate floor more frequently to impress the voters that we are taking care of their business.

Notice that none of us say we would speak more frequently because we had something important to say or because speaking on the Senate floor would be the most effective way to accomplish our official duties. We will do so because that is the best way to get on television and be seen by our constituents.

In real terms, this cannot be better illustrated than by looking at recent Senate consideration of the 1985 farm bill. This bill was the product of extensive negotiations and compromise which took place over the entire first session. This legislation addressed issues running the gamut from farm credit to commodity programs to food stamps.

All of us have constituents in our State who are going to be affected by this legislation and who will want to know what efforts we have taken to help them out with their particular needs. Because of this fact, I believe that if floor debate concerning the 1985 farm bill had been televised to the public, this would have encouraged each and every one of us to speak at greater length about the problems facing farmers in our State and what actions we were taking to solve these problems.

These additional speeches would have considerably extended debate on legislation which already took over 2 weeks to consider. This fact is especially crucial given the fact that most farm programs were about to expire only a few short weeks after the farm legislation was finally approved.

My own behavior concerning the farm bill discussions serves as a prime example. During the entire 2-week debate on this legislation, I spoke for approximately 5 minutes—5 minutes on a piece of legislation that was probably one of our most important accomplishments in the first session of Congress; 5 minutes on a comprehensive package that we hope will begin to alleviate the serious problems that are now threatening the livelihoods of our Nation's farmers.

This 5 minutes of speech does not, of course, reflect the concern I have for these hardworking people. The need for relief was no stronger exhibited than in Louisiana, where farmers have faced further setbacks in 1985 due to hurricanes and floods. Over the past year, I have worked long hours, as many Senators have for their constituents, to assure that the farm legislation included the assistance needed to get Louisiana's agricultural community back on its feet.

I chose not to speak for more than 5 minutes on the farm bill, because it would have not served any purpose other than reiterating points that other Senators made during the debate. Had the debates been televised for public consumption, I almost certainly would have spoken at considerably greater length.

Mr. President, there are many agricultural products important to Louisiana's economy, among them soybeans, cotton, rice, and sugar. Although these growers are facing serious problems, I did not speak directly concerning each of these crops, because their concerns were amply brought out in the debate by other Senators. Had the debates been televised, I would have felt obliged to make a speech addressing my efforts to assist each of these groups.

Why would I have felt compelled to make such statements? The answer, of course, is so that my constituents would know that I was doing everything within my power to see that their interests were being carried forward. One could hardly blame a Louisiana soybean farmer for thinking that this Senator did not do anything for him if he sees that other Senators are extolling the plight of soybean farmers and he does not witness one utterance from his own Senator.

Mr. President, I believe that the current methods of informing constituents of our actions are entirely sufficient. For example, when the farm bill was approved, I am sure most of us issued newsletters or targeted mass mailings detailing our accomplishments. Some of us even secured time in the Senate recording studio to produce local feeds for our districts. That these costs are now made public every quarter would lead even those Senators with the best intentions to use television to inform the public back home and not necessary for meaningful debate.

As the second session of Congress unfolds, we are faced with difficult decisions of even greater proportion and impact than the farm legislation just completed. Most notably, this week with the President's State of the Union Address begins the long and arduous process of implementing a Federal budget.

This year for the first time these budget decisions will, be made under the guiding force of the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings law. The President will be recommending a budget which, in line with Gramm-Rudman-Hollings, must not exceed $144 billion. Yet, with the current assumptions, this will require deficit reduction efforts around the $60–$80-billion range.

More than ever before, these decisions will affect each and every one of our constituents. No single group is likely to be spared the impact of some of the tough decisions the President and the Congress will be called upon to make to bring deficit spending under control.

Should debate on the budget be televised to the public, there can be no doubt in my mind that considerable time will be devoted to Senators either impressing upon the need to reduce Government spending or explaining why they had no choice but to vote for a budget cut which adversely affects a program important to an interest in their States. This discussion will not benefit the Senate's approach to formulating a fair budget nor will it be particularly enlightening for other Senators. It will be purely and simply for home consumption.

The same forces at play do not even need mentioning when the full Senate gets around to deliberating a major tax bill scheduled for later this year. As the years go on, the issues will not get any easier to resolve and television will not aid us in our effort to find answers.

Mr. President, 50 years ago, when my father was a Senator, the U.S. Senate met and conducted the Nation's business for about 6 months out of the year. Today, we meet all year long and still do not manage to get our work done. I hate to think how this problem we already face might be compounded should television coverage of Chamber proceeding begin without the rules changes that would surely be necessary to ensure that the Senate operates properly.

Mr. President, I have announced that I will not seek reelection. I will serve in this body for another 11 months. Whatever decision is made on televising the Senate, I will not have to live with it for very long, if at all. The concerns I am expressing are my concerns for how television would change this institution.

Because of the 37 years I have spent here, I will always care about this fine institution. As a citizen, I will continue to be affected by the laws passed here when I retire. I do not want to see any changes that will make the special role Senators are required to perform more difficult.

Mr. President, I firmly believe that the Senate is expected to provide a strong measure of statemanship in our Government. As Senators, the Constitution provides that we should take a "second look" at legislation before passing it. The 6-year term allows Senators to take a longer range view on controversial issues.

Our procedures of unlimited debate, agendas set by the full body, rather than a Rules Committee, are examples of the unique qualities of the Senate that are present for a reason. They better allow the Senate to fulfill the role of providing for the national interest as well as the concerns of our respective constituencies.

History has shown that the Senate serves as a bastion for the minority. A strong measure of protection is provided where the heat of an issue can cool under the statesmanship of the Senate.

Over the course of history, the Senate has fulfilled its purpose. Despite strong popular support, the Senate has defeated many bad bills which are now recognized as such. Likewise, the Senate has risen to many challenges to ratify treaties and pass legislation that were extremely controversial because the national interest required the Senate to do so.

Sponsors of this resolution providing for television coverage have yet to show us how the opportunity for every Senator to perform on television will preserve and protect this Nation from the follies of expediency. Until they can prove the Senate will be better able to fulfill its role in creating laws to govern this Nation, we should not move forward in this area.

I yield the floor.

Mr. BYRD addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Democratic leader.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, I compliment the distinguished Senator from Louisiana on his statement. It is a thoughtful one. It is a provocative one. It is eminently clear to me, in listening to his statement, he is still searching for the truth, searching for the facts on which he and the Senate can base a judgment, one that will be the right judgment.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that all statements for and against television and radio coverage in the Senate appear as if uninterrupted in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BYRD. I also ask unanimous consent that that some same order obtain with respect to each day that the Senate debates the subject of TV and radio coverage of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BYRD. So that those who read the RECORD will be able to read, in an uninterrupted flow, the statements and colloquies in respect to what I consider a very important debate on a very important action which the Senate hopefully will take.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, I think that all Senators who have participated in the debate today have made a great contribution to the Senate, regardless of the position they took with respect to the pending resolution. I believe the discussion has been constructive and helpful and will focus the attention of Senators on the matters that are important.

I should like to repeat something which the Senator from Tennessee read earlier, because I think it is important for us to recognize the scope of what is before the Senate today. It is not worldwide, global broadcasting of the Senate. It is a test. In that test is included the contemplation of rules changes.

As the Senator from Tennessee did earlier in this debate, I read from page 4 of the report:

> It is the intention of the Committee that the rules changes be considered concurrently with the closed-circuit television broadcast test.

The closed-circuit television broadcast test—that is what we have before us. That is the decision we must make, and that is the decision I think we helped to focus on by the discussion today.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MATHIAS. I yield.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the Senator from Louisiana made several cogent points earlier. There was one which caused me to want to comment briefly, and I have resisted the temptation; but since my colleague has returned to it, I want to make one very small point.

The Senator from Louisiana made the argument that the test period is defective, in the sense that since it is not open to the public, we cannot fully ascertain what changes would be worked upon the Senate by such coverage.

The distinguished chairman of the committee points out the limited scope of the resolution itself; and because of that limited scope, there is nothing whatever in this resolution that would prevent the Senate from deciding, at the conclusion of this test, that it wished to then embark upon a second, more venturesome test period during which the signal would be made available to the public, not in perpetuity but for a limited period of time, during which we could ascertain what additional impacts might come upon the Senate by virtue of the signal being made available more widely.

I believe that even during the closed-circuit test period, we will be able to better ascertain the kind of impact such coverage is likely to have on the institution. But if we decided that the Senator from Louisiana is correct and that this test is not sufficient to tell us what it will be like to have coverage available to the country as a whole, then at the conclusion of this test we could say, "Let's have another test, a little more venturesome this time; make it available to the public for 90 days," as the House of Representatives did, as an example, and at the end of that test period have another decision point, to see whether or not we want to declare that this is now the full-time policy of the Senate.

Mr. MATHIAS. The Senator is correct.

The key point that I think the Senator from Tennessee makes is that nothing permanent can happen in the Senate until there is further action by the Senate and by the Rules Committee, that nothing will change permanently, that this is looking at the situation, feeling our way along.

As the former representative from Virginia, Governor Tuck, used to say, "measuring the water." That is all we are doing—we are just measuring the water.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MATHIAS. I yield.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, when we asked the Rules Committee to give us some rules changes that would be necessary for television, several years ago—mind you, even from one who sponsored the resolution, joined as a cosponsor, to send the resolution to the Rules Committee, asking them to propose changes that are necessary and needed with television—we received the answer back that no changes would be necessary. I do not think that is right. I think that is wrong.

Now, here, we see the suggestion, "We think the change would be necessary, but we will have to pass a further resolution before the thing is made available to the public at large."

In my judgment, there is every reason to assume that if those sponsoring the resolution were able to bypass the question of rules, then when the test period is over and we have the cameras in here and the lighting and the TV's in everybody's office, the argument will be made: "It's too big a bother. It would take too much time. We might get bogged down. The heck with all these things about the rules. Let's put ourselves on nationwide television and worry about the rules later."

At that point, the sponsors would be in a lot better position to resist the changes in the rules than they are, in my judgment, when they are seeking the first authority.

In my judgment, I say to the Senator, these rules changes can be done. I do not know how one who has never tried to pass a rules change can say it cannot be done.

I recall that when I joined with a bipartisan group when Mr. Baker was the majority leader, we proposed to him to pass some changes in the rules which would expedite his passing the legislative program under his leadership.

Why he never moved with it absolutely defies this Senator. When you have leaders on the Democratic side willing to go along with the Republican leader, I do not know why no effort was made. But it was not. If you are not going to make the effort, it is a cinch you are not going to pass anything.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator from Maryland yield?

Mr. MATHIAS. I yield.

Mr. BYRD. The distinguished Senator from Maryland has accurately stated the content of the resolution in this respect. But I would hope that we would all try to remain flexible on this point, because it just may be that as the debate goes on, there would be a kind of coming together of the minds of Senators, There might develop something of a package, who knows, which would see the trial period proceed and which, at the same time, would put some rules changes into effect "permanently," to use the word as used by the distinguished Senator from Maryland.

The resolution does provide for a trial period. It provides for another resolution at the end of the trial period. That resolution would have to come from the Rules Committee, be adopted in connection with establishing TV and radio coverage of the Senate permanently. Also any rules changes that might have been thought of or considered during that trial period would wait until that resolution came out of the Rules Committee and was adopted here.

But if we could just keep ourselves flexible, who knows? This Senate may want to change its mind with respect to this very resolution and it may indeed decide to go forward with the test period and make some of the rules changes now, because, as I have argued—and I hope most Senators will agree with me—there are some rules changes that are needed in this Senate whether or not we have television. I hope we get both.

Would the Senator agree with that, that there is a need for us to be flexible?

Mr. MATHIAS. I perceived the distinguished minority leader has a kind of a glimmering. It may not yet be a vision but it is an intimation that a vision may be about to break upon his consciousness.

I want to share that vision with him. I certainly will do nothing to obscure that vision as it is in a formative stage in his mind. I think that vision might address itself to the concerns of the Senator from Louisiana which would be a consummation devoutly to be desired.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I take my chair.

Mr. MATHIAS. I think we have accomplished something today and I hope we have. I will close this day's debate with the admonition of the minority leader that our minds should stay flexible.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, I rise in support of Senate Resolution 28, authorizing a test period for live broadcast coverage of Senate floor proceedings.

As a supprter of previous measures to allow broadcasting of Senate proceedings, I expressed my belief that such broadcasts would enhance the public awareness of the issue before Congress, and would lead to a better understanding of the actions of individual Senators and the Senate as an institution.

I remain convinced that this coverage of Senate proceedings would better inform the American people of the activities of one of its most important, and unique, Government institutions.

The dignity and traditions of the Senate can be maintained, I believe, even if it permits the broadcasting of its proceedings by live radio and television. It is important that we in the Senate utilize the technology that is available to provide new insights and educational experiences that will inspire renewed interest in and better understanding of our National Government.

Early in the history of the Senate, the decision was made to open its doors and conduct sessions before the press and the public who could observe from the galleries. In the context of our modern electronic era, it is time we extend this openness to all the American public, even though they are not all in the galleries.

I commend the Rules Committee for favorably reporting this measure. I am hopeful that the Senate will agree to this test period, and I am confident that its success will lead to permanent, nationwide broadcasts, and a better informed public.

ODE TO JOHNSTON-LEAHY

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, last January 29, my colleague, Senator LEAHY, and I sent around a Dear Colleague, attaching legislation which has since become Senate Resolution 320. We were both surprised and pleased to see that what has become Senate resolution 312 was actually introduced before ours was introduced.

So Senator LEAHY and I have a little poem that we would like to read. It is called: "Ode to Johnston-Leahy," and it goes as follows:

A rose by any other name may smell as sweet,
But our bill without our names would not be as neat.
We mailed our "Dear Colleague" on January 29,
And were surprised on the 30th to find ours last in line.

But we'll stand not on ceremony,
Though our pride may be battered.
Imitation, after all, should make us feel flattered.

S. Res. 312, we'll join and offer praise aplenty
For it's exactly the same as S. Res. 320.
Together the Budget Committee we can now pester
For bipartisan defeat of this year's sequester.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that we be added as cosponsors of Senate Resolution 312, and I thank the distinguished Senator from West Virginia for allowing us to speak on an unrelated matter. I might say I hope that we will have the opportunity even after TV in the Senate to offer unrelated poems at various times in the work of the Senate. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ABDNOR). Without objection, it is so ordered.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Saunders, one of his secretaries.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

As in executive session, the Presiding Officer laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(The nominations received today are printed at the end of the Senate proceedings.)

ANNUAL REPORT OF THE U.S. ARMS CONTROL AND DISARMAMENT AGENCY—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT RECEIVED DURING THE RECESS—PM 103

Under the authority of the order of the Senate of January 3, 1985, the Secretary of the Senate, on January 31, 1986, during the recess of the Senate, received the following messages from the President of the United States, together with an accompaying report; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

To the Congress of the United States:

In my letter of transmittal attached to the 1984 United States Arms Control and Disarmament Agency Annual Report, I remarked that I viewed with great seriousness the negotiating commitments of January 1985 as an opportunity to reduce significantly the inventories of offensive nuclear weapons systems. Much has happened during the past twelve months to encourage me in that view. Not only have our arms control delegations continued their efforts to reach agreements with their Soviet counterparts, but I have had an opportunity to discuss with Soviet General Secretary Gorbachev many of the issues that divide our two countries. We agreed to expedite the negotiations on reducing the numbers of nuclear offensive weapons and to continue our discussions on the issue of strategic defense as well as on many other important bilateral issues. Furthermore, the Soviet leader and I agreed to future meetings, which might give further impetus to the arms control process.

This 1985 annual report, the United States Arms Control and Disarmament Agency's 25th consecutive report, provides an in-depth survey of all of the work undertaken during the year in support of negotiating agreements to reduce the number of nuclear weapons, to abolish chemical weapons, to reduce the numbers of U.S. and Soviet troops in Central Europe, to seek correction for Soviet noncompliance with existing arms control agreements, and to continue efforts to enhance peace and security and make possible the reduction of military spending worldwide.

ORDER TO SUSPEND AUTOMATIC SPENDING AND TO SEQUESTER OR REDUCE BUDGETARY RESOURCES—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT RECEIVED DURING THE RECESS—PM 104

Under the authority of the order of the Senate of January 3, 1985, the Secretary of the Senate, on February 1, 1986, during the recess of the Senate received the following message from the President of the United States, together with accompanying papers; which, pursuant to Public Law 99-177, was referred jointly to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry, the Committee on Appropriations, the Committee on Armed Services, the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs, the Committee on the Budget, the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation, the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, the Committee on Environment and Public Works, the Committee on Finance, the Committee on Foreign Relations, the Committee on Governmental Affairs, the Select Committee on Intelligence, the Select Committee on Indian Affairs, the Committee on the Judiciary, the Committee on Labor and Human Resources, the Committee on Rules and Administration, the Committee on Small Business, and the Committee on Veterans' Affairs:

To the Congress of the United States:

In accordance with the Balanced Budget and Emergency Deficit Control Act of 1985, I herewith report the issuance of the Order to affected agencies to suspend automatic spending increases and sequester or reduce budgetary resources consistent with the Comptroller General's January 21 sequestration or reduction determinations required by the Act, to eliminate the $11.7 billion deficit excess for Fiscal Year 1986. This Order is effective March 1, 1986, unless modified by enacted alternative deficit reduction legislation. A copy of the Order is enclosed.

Heads of Executive, Legislative, and Judicial branch agencies have further calculated and are sending to the Congress detailed reports of the base and reduction or sequestration amount by programs, projects, and activities. These calculations are in compliance with the Comptroller General's report.

RONALD REAGAN.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 1, 1986.

ORDER

EMERGENCY DEFICIT CONTROL MEASURES FOR FISCAL YEAR 1986

By the authority vested in me as President by the statutes of the United States of America, including section 252 of the Balanced Budget and Emergency Deficit Control Act of 1985 (hereafter referred to as "the Act"), I hereby order that the following actions be taken immediately to implement the required sequestration or reduction determined by the Comptroller General in his report dated January 21, 1986, under section 251 of the Act;

(1) Each automatic spending increase which, but for the passage of the Act would be first paid on or after the enactment of the Act during fiscal year 1986 is suspended as provided in section 252(a)(6) and subject to provisions set forth in sections 255, 256, and 257 of the Act. The programs with such 1986 automatic spending increases subject to reduction in this manner, specified by account title, are: Central Intelligence Agency retirement and disability system fund; Civil service retirement and disability fund; Comptrollers general retirement system; Foreign service retirement and disability fund; Military retirement fund; National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration retirement; Railroad Retirement Tier II; Retired pay, Coast Guard; Retirement pay and medical benefits for commissioned Public Health Service officers; Special benefits, Federal Employees' Compensation Act; National Wool Act; Special milk program; and Vocational rehabilitation.

(2) New budget authority and unobligated balances amounts for major National Defense functional category (050) are sequestered according to the procedures set forth in section 252(a)(2) of the Act.

(3) For non-defense accounts in the Federal budget, the following are sequestered: new budget authority, new loan guarantee commitments, new direct loan obligations, and spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, as amended, and the reduction of obligation limitations, for each account and for each program, project, and activity, as defined pursuant to section 252(a)(1)(B)(i) of the Act, or each budget account activity as defined pursuant to section 252(a)(1)(B)(ii) of the Act.

(4) For accounts making payments otherwise required by substantive law, the head of each Department or agency is directed to modify the calculation of each such payment to the extent necessary to reduce the estimate of total required payments for the remainder of the fiscal year (a) where payments are not made from spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, as amended, to the level of remaining budgetary resources or (b) where payments are made from spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, as amended, to the estimated level of payments included in the Comptroller General determination on January 21, 1986, of required sequestration or reduction action.

(5) For accounts making commitments for guaranteed loans and obligations for direct loans subject to limitation otherwise required by substantive law, the head of each Department or agency is directed to modify the calculation of such commitments or obligations to the extent necessary to conform to the limitations established by the Act and specified in the Comptroller General determination of January 21, 1986.

(6) Each Department or agency head may, to the extent not otherwise prohibited by law, use existing authority to deobligate balances of budgetary resources as necessary to apply the required reduction or sequestration in as uniform a manner as possible for any person or other recipient entitled to payments under any formula-driven calculations specified in the substantive law. Deobligations may include budgetary resources obligations for which checks have not been issued or funds not otherwise disbursed (funds obligated but unexpended).

Also, the head of each Department or agency shall report the programs, projects, and activities information required by section 252(a)(5) (A) and (B) to the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House, the Director of the Office of Management and Budget, and the Comptroller General, as instructed by the Director of the Office of Management and Budget in Bulletin No. 86-7. For those programs in the National Defense function that have already been reported by program, project, and activity, no additional report is necessary. The reports of the Departments and agencies are hereby incorporated in this Order.

I further direct the Director of Central Intelligence to report the programs, projects, and activities information required by section 252(a)(5) (A) and (B) on a classified basis to the appropriate committees of the Congress for the National Foreign Intelligence Program consistent with paragraphs 1 through 3 of this Order and to so advise the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House, the Director of the Office of Management and Budget, and the Comptroller General, as instructed by the Director of the Office of Management and Budget.

In accordance with section 252(a)(6)(A), amounts suspended, sequestered or reduced under this Order shall be withheld from obligation and amounts suspended or sequestered shall be permanently cancelled as of March 1, 1986, unless alternative legislation is enacted prior to that date.

This Order shall be reported to the Congress and shall be published in the FEDERAL REGISTER.

ALTERNATIVE DISPUTE RESOLUTION PROMOTION ACT

Mr. McCONNELL. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce the "Alternative Dispute Resolution Promotion Act of 1986." This bill addresses the growing crisis of confidence in our civil justice system. In my opinion, it helps chart a course back to a sensible balance between free and unfettered resort to the courts and recognition of the need for a more pragmatic, responsible approach for dealing with civil disputes.

Hardly a day goes by that we do not hear or read of the dramatic increase in the number of lawsuits filed, of the latest multimillion verdict, or of another small business, child care center, or municipal corporation that has had its insurance canceled out from under it. Just this week, I learned that the Louisville and Jefferson County metropolitan sewer district has had its insurance canceled. Despite its best efforts, it has not been able thus far to find additional insurance. Those businesses and corporations that are able to retain their insurance are often met with increases in premium costs of 100 percent, 200 percent or more.

Why are insurance rates increasing so dramatically? Why are the courthouses so crowded, despite the addition of over 100 Federal judges in the last 8 years? Because, quite simply, everyone is suing everyone, and most are getting big money. I know of one case in Louisville in which the parents of a young girl allowed her to help her uncle cut heavy duty reinforcing wire for concrete construction. The wire had been rolled into a coil for shipment, and would naturally recoil when rolled out and released. Yet the uncle let this 9-year-old girl hold down the wire, and while he looked away, the construction wire sprang back and struck the girl. The parents, who were fully aware of what the girl was doing, nevertheless sued the manufacturer for $750,000 for failing to warn the 9-year-old girl of the danger. Fortunately, the jury in that case returned a verdict of zero against the company. Yet despite an offer of settlement by the defendant, the case dragged on for 2 years, ending with a 3-day trial, and the legal fees were tens of thousands of dollars.

Nor is this an isolated incident: Consider these examples:

A burglar accidentally fell through a painted-over skylight while he was stealing lights from the roof of a public school. The sued the school district and recovered $260,000 in damages plus a continuing income.

In New York City, a man attempted suicide by jumping in front of a subway train. The man was injured but did not die; he sued, claiming the driver should have put the brakes on faster. The New York Transit Authority paid $650,000.

In Cleveland, an associate professor of political science compiled a study ranking American cities in terms of their "quality of life." He gave the city of Tulsa, Okla., poor marks. The city went into U.S. District Court and sued the professor for $26 million in damages.

Many cases like these could be resolved without filing a lawsuit, or could be settled much earlier than the present adversarial-oriented system allows.

Mr. President, when grievances are legitimate, and cannot be settled by negotiation or arbitration, an injured party has every right to seek redress in court. No one would disagree with that. But the courts ought not be used to find a deep pocket for every injury regardless of responsibility. Nor should legitimate grievances that must be brought to court become the object of years of discovery and other legal machinations, most devoted as much to generating large fees as to furthering the case.

Yet without a doubt, our present civil justice system promotes litigation, almost for litigation's sake. What is most disturbing about this state of affairs is that so little good comes from so much litigation. Indeed, this crisis will most likely reserve its harshest consequences for American consumers. When obstetricians withdraw from their profession, the quality of health care for all of us suffers. When drug manufacturers remove a product from the market, those most vulnerable are denied their only means of help. And when firms announce price increases primarily to cover rising insurance costs, it is all of us who will pay more through higher prices.

The problem is even starker when viewed from a statistical perspective. The number of lawsuits in recent years has increased almost geometrically. Between 1978 and 1983, some 12 million cases were filed in State courts. From 1940 to 1984, civil cases in Federal courts increased from 35,000 to cover 260,000 a year. Federal product liability suits more than doubled from 1978 to 1984. As the number of cases filed has increased, the dollar amount of settlements and awards has increased as well. In 1983, there were 360 personal injury cases with awards of $1 million or more—13 times as many as in 1975. The average product liability award has increased from $345,000 to over $1 million in the last 10 years, while the average medical malpractice award approached $950,000 last year.

These figures simply can't be justified. But they can be explained, for the true beneficiaries of the litigation explosion are the lawyers. Some figures indicate that as often as not, more than half the money transferred by these lawsuits goes to plaintiffs' lawyers. In asbestos litigation $62,000 of the average award of $101,000 goes to lawyers. This month's ABA Journal even featured "the new plaintiffs' elite bar" on its cover. Like the hovering hoard of lawyers picking apart the remains of the Jarndyce estate in Dickens' classic, Bleak House, the lawyers in todays courts often end up the only winners.

Mr. President, the bill I've introduced today seeks to help end the mad romance we as Americans have developed with the civil litigation process. Quite simply, my bill requires lawyers to advise their clients of the alternatives to litigation, alternatives such as extra-judicial dispute resolution techniques. It also permits a party to a lawsuit to make an offer of settlement or to engage in alternative dispute resolution techniques, with sanctions for unreasonably failing to accept such an offer.

Part of the concept for this legislation comes from the revision to Federal rule of civil procedure 68 as proposed by the advisory committee of the Judicial Conference of the United States. That body has recognized that the purpose of promoting settlement that rule 68 meant to serve has largely been unfulfilled. The legislation I present today embodies all of the suggested changes, but goes on to encourage not only offers of settlement, but also offers to resolve the matter with other techniques. This may be an important path to quicker, more efficient resolution. Rather than engaging in a cat and mouse game of outrageous settlement demand followed by miserly counteroffer, parties to litigation will be encouraged to put their cards on the table, look each other in the eye, and put an end to the matter.

If the court determines that the settlement offer or the ADR offer was unreasonably rejected, the court would have the power to impose monetary sanctions. The court's sanction authority will expressly permit attorney fees to be awarded against either party. Mr. President, this is an important feature of the bill. The Supreme Court has recently acknowledged, in Marek versus Chesney, decided June 27, 1985, that a party who unreasonably refuses a settlement offer is liable for the additional court costs that resulted, and that this amount should include the extra attorney fees. This bill will make it clear that those fees are available in all litigation.

Recently, writing in a Washington newspaper, Mr. Stephen Green wrote that the United States has become a lawyer's paradise. But that paradise may well become anything but idyllic for the rest of us. As Mr. Green noted:

> The explosion in litigation and jury awards has brought wealth to lawyers. But the consequences for the rest of the nation have been severe. Unless reform is forthcoming, confidence in the civil courts will continue to decline, and the judicial system will be perceived as merely a spoils system for the bar.

We in the Senate have an obligation to see that reform is forthcoming. My bill will require, for the first time, that the parties to a lawsuit are fully aware of their options, and that they have the opportunity to exercise their options in a timely way.

I do not mean to imply that most lawyers are unethical, or that they needlessly multiply the cost of lawsuits. I am a lawyer myself, as are many of us here in this body. But by the nature of the adversarial process, and the ethical code under which lawyers operate, we cannot expect the legal profession to solve this problem without guidance and prodding.

If we can wean ourselves of this unrelenting, adversarial battle called litigation, we can expect some real relief from the ever rising cost of insurance, as well as of goods and services. Perhaps we can also step back just a bit, to a more realistic view of our own rights and obligations that come from living in a complex world. Fundamental civil justice reform is important to each of us, and I am considering other proposals in addition to that introduced today. This new approach alone will not solve all the problems, but it will begin the process, and will help us shut off the fuel firing the engines of litigation.

Mr. President, I would ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in its entirety at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2038

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, This Act may be cited as the "Alternative Dispute Resolution Promotion Act of 1986".

FINDINGS AND PURPOSE

SEC. 2. (a) The Congress finds and declares that—

(1) the traditional litigation process is unsuited to the timely, efficient, and inexpensive resolution of disputes among businesses and individuals involved in civil disputes;

(2) alternative dispute resolution techniques, including mini-trials, mediation, and arbitration offer more cost-effective resolution of such disputes and contribute to efficient use of resources in the Nation's economy; and

(3) the Federal Government has an interest in encouraging the use of such alternatives to the civil litigation process, to increase efficiency in interstate commerce, and to not impede economic output with prolonged litigation.

(b) It is the purpose of this Act to encourage the use of such alternative dispute resolution techniques, and to encourage the disposition of civil disputes in the most economic and efficient manner possible.

ALTERNATIVE DISPUTE RESOLUTION OPTIONS

SEC. 3. (a) The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure are amended by inserting between Rule 16 and part IV, the following:

"Rule 16.1. Advice and Certification by Counsel

"(a) ALTERNATIVE DISPUTE RESOLUTION OPTIONS.—At any time after 90 days and before 180 days after service of the summons, each attorney who has made an appearance in the case and who represents one or more of the parties to the action shall, with respect to each party separately represented, advise the party of the existence and availability of alternative dispute resolution options, including extrajudicial proceedings such as mini-trials, and third party mediation, court supervised arbitration, and summary jury trial proceedings.

"(b) NOTICE.—Each such attorney shall, not later than 180 days after an action is commenced, file notice with the court certifying that the attorney has so advised his client or clients, and indicating whether his client will agree to one or more of the alternative dispute resolution techniques.

"(c) ORDER BY THE COURT.—In the event all parties to an action agree to proceed with one or more alternative dispute resolution proceedings, the court shall be notified of such acceptance of such offer and shall enter an appropriate order governing the conduct of such alternative proceedings. Entering an order governing such further proceedings shall constitute a waiver by each party subject to the order of the right to proceed further in court.

"(d) DECISION INADMISSIBLE.—Neither the acceptance nor the refusal of any party to the action to engage in such alternative dispute resolution proceedings shall be admissible as evidence in any further proceedings in such action. In the event an offer made pursuant to this rule is rejected, the court shall proceed with the action as if no such offer had been made."

PROCEDURE FOR ALTERNATIVE DISPUTE RESOLUTION

SEC. 4. (a) Rule 68 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedures is amended to read as follows:

"Rule 68. Offer of Settlement and Alternative Dispute Resolution

"(a) OFFER OF RESOLUTION.—At any time more than 60 days after the service of the summons and complaint, but not less than 90 days (or 75 days in the case of a counteroffer) before trial, any party may serve upon any other party, but shall not file with the court, a written offer to—

"(1) settle a claim for such money, property, or other relief as the offeror shall specify in the offer, and enter into a stipulation dismissing the claim; or

"(2) allow judgment to be entered accordingly.

Alternatively, or in conjunction with such offer, any party may serve upon any other party an offer to engage in such extra-judicial alternative dispute resolution techniques as the offeror may desire, or such judicially supervised alternative dispute resolution techniques as are available in the court in which the action is pending. The offer shall remain open for 60 days unless a written withdrawal is served on the offeree prior to acceptance by such offeree. An offer that remains open may be accepted or rejected in writing by the offeree. An offer that is neither withdrawn nor accepted within 60 days shall be deemed rejected. The fact that an offer is made but not accepted does not preclude a subsequent offer. Evidence of an offer is not admissible except in proceedings to enforce a settlement or to determine sanctions under this Rule.

"(b) SANCTIONS FOR DELAY.—If, upon a motion by the offeror within 10 days after the entry of judgment, the court determines that an offer of settlement or an offer to engage in alternative dispute resolution was rejected unreasonably, resulting in unnecessary delay and needless increase in the cost of the litigation, it shall impose an appropriate sanction upon the offeree. In making such determination the court shall consider all the relevant circumstances at the time of the rejection, including (1) the then apparent merit or lack of merit in the claim that was the subject of the offer, (2) the closeness of the questions of fact and law at issue, (3) whether the offeror had unreasonably refused to furnish information necessary to evaluate the reasonableness of the offer, (4) whether the suit was in the nature of a test case, presenting questions of far-reaching importance affecting non-parties, (5) the relief that might reasonably have been expected if the claimant prevailed, and (6) the amount of the additional delay, cost, and expense, including the additional attorney fees, that the offeror reasonably would be expected to incur if the litigation should be prolonged.

"(c) GUIDELINES FOR SANCTIONS.—In determining the amount of any sanction to be imposed under this Rule the court also shall take into account, (1) the extent of the delay, (2) the amount of the parties' costs and expenses, including any reasonable attorney fees incurred by the offeror as a result of the offeree's rejection, (3) the interest that could have been earned at the prevailing market rates on the amount that a claimant offered to accept, to the extent that the interest is not otherwise included in the judgment, and (4) the burden of the sanction on the offeree. Unless the court specifically finds that such burden so far outweighs the other circumstances, including the interests of encouraging settlements and avoiding needless and protracted litigation that are sought to be furthered by this Rule, the court shall impose a sanction in an amount not less than the added court costs and fees incurred as a result of the failure by the offeree to accept the offer that is the subject of the motion.

"(d) EXCEPTION.—This Rule shall not apply to class or derivative actions under Rules 23, 23.1 and 23.2.".

(b) The table of Rules for the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure is amended by—

(1) inserting between the item relating to Rule 16 and part IV, the following:

"16.1. Advice and Certification by Counsel.

"(a) Alternative Dispute Resolution Options.

"(b) Notice.

"(c) Order by the Court.

"(d) Decision Inadmissible.".

(2) amending the item relating to Rule 68 to read as follows:

"68. Offer of Settlement and Alternative Dispute Resolution.

"(a) Offer of Resolution.

"(b) Sanction for Delay.

"(c) Guidelines for Sanctions."

S. 2040. A bill to amend title VIII of the act commonly called the Civil Rights Act of 1968, to revise the procedures for the enforcement of fair housing, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

FAIR HOUSING AMENDMENTS ACT

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, 2 weeks ago the Nation observed, for the first time, the Federal holiday dedicated to the dream of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. On that day, we rededicated ourselves to making Dr. King's dream a reality. Today, I am proud to join with a bipartisan group of my colleagues to place back on the Nation's agenda a major piece of unfinished business left behind by the hero we honored last month. Our bill would strengthen and expand the fair housing legislation enacted in 1968, just days after Dr. King's assassination. We call on our colleagues in the Senate and in the House of Representatives to carry forward Dr. King's dream by adopting the fair housing amendments bill during this Congress.

This is substantially the same as the bill that my colleagues and I introduced in the past three Congresses. It parallels a companion bill passed by the House in 1980, which died during a lameduck session of the Senate.

The problem this bill addresses is discrimination in the housing market; discrimination because of race, color, religion, sex, national origin, handicap, or familial status. Martin Luther King knew only too well the effect of segregated housing—for racial or other reasons—on all of America.

The main weapon in the legal arsenal against housing discrimination is Title 8 of the 1968 Civil Rights Act, known as the Fair Housing Act. That legislation has made a difference. But it has been clear for years that the impact of this landmark legislation has been limited by two factors: Its enforcement mechanisms are too weak, and its coverage is too narrow to combat the discrimination that persists in the housing market. The Fair Housing Amendments Act will cure these shortcomings and substantially strengthen our efforts to eradicate housing discrimination.

When a person sets out to rent or buy a home, he or she becomes involved in the "real estate chain." That chain is comprised of several links, including the real estate sales agent; the apartment building agent; the bank, savings and loan, or mortgage company that may be needed to finance the home purchase; the appraiser who determines the value of the home upon which the mortgage amount is based; the insurance company which determines the fire, flood, theft, and other risks which the home may have and sets an insurance premium to be paid; and the secondary mortgage market entities known as "Freddie Mac," "Ginnie Mae," and "Fannie Mae" which purchase the mortgage from the bank, thrift, or mortgage company.

At each step of the real estate chain, the potential exists that the homeseeker will encounter some form of unfair treatment. Unhappily, the evidence shows that this potential is often realized.

In 1980, the Department of Housing and Urban Development estimated that each year in this country there are 2 million instances of racial discrimination in housing. This does not begin to count the instances of housing discrimination against those with physical or mental disabilities and against families with children.

Housing discrimination can run the gamut, including:

Discriminatory advertising or false representation. A person may be told that an apartment has been rented or a contract has been offered on a house when, in fact, it has not.

Racial steering. This is the case when a real estate agent only shows houses in certain neighborhoods or fails to show homes in an "off limits" neighborhood, even when the homeseeker inquires about them; or where the rental agent for several apartment buildings only tells the prospective renter of vacancies in certain of his buildings.

Blockbusting. This occurs when unscrupulous real estate agents deliberately show houses in a predominantly white block only to blacks and then encourage remaining whites to sell, thereby producing multiple sales for themselves and causing so-called white-flight or neighborhood turnover.

Redlining. This is a subtle form of racial discrimination, whereby property insurance companies either refuse to write fire, hazard, and theft insurance or charge an unfairly high insurance premium in certain neighborhoods because of the racial composition of the neighborhood.

Discriminatory financing. Lenders may require larger downpayments or impose other restrictive terms—for example, "due on sale" clauses; a shorter term mortgage if you buy in certain neighborhoods, or if you happen to be black or a woman or disabled.

Discriminatory terms of rental. This may mean an unusually large security or cleaning deposit which is not standard for all other units owned or managed by the same company

Unfair discrimination in property valuation by real estate appraisers. The property appraisal report is a critical piece of paper for the mortgage lender because it, in large part, is the basis upon which the lender determines how large a mortage he will provide. It is also used by sellers and realtors to determine the asking price of a home. An appraiser may discriminate by undervaluing a property because of the race, sex, or national origin of the current residents or neighbors.

The Fair Housing Amendments Act that we are introducing today extends the protection of our civil rights laws relating to housing to two additional classes of people: Handicapped persons and families which children.

The Urban Institute estimates there are 23.3 million adults disabled by physical or mental impairments, in addition to 2 million disabled persons who are institutionalized. By the year 2000, the U.S. Census Bureau estimates, there will be 32 million Americans over the age of 65 years, and thus, more prone to physical frailties, disabling diseases, and mental impairments.

With our continued emphasis on deinstitutionalization, more disabled persons—many of them our own parents, brothers, sisters, and children—will be seeking independent living in residential settings. Housing discrimination against disabled persons continues their dependency on family and institutional care at huge economic and social costs.

The complaints of housing discrimination against families with children continue to mount at State and local human relations agencies. But, in many instances those agencies are unable to take action because their State law does not prohibit such discrimination. From coast to coast families with children are forced to double up, split up, or go homeless because they encounter outright exclusion in their search for decent housing. The shortage of family housing is an artificial one. The supply as well as the demand is there. The only thing preventing the market from functioning freely is discrimination.

Four HUD studies have documented the degree to which the housing market is closed to families with children. One national survey found that only one-fourth of all rental units accept children with no restrictions. In commenting on this study, the Washington Times called the situation "Dread Babies" and called for an outlawing of housing discrimination against children.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the February 2, 1984 Washington Times editorial appear at this point in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD.

DREAD BABIES

Jonathan Swift suggested we eat the pesky kids. As members of a civilized society, we merely banish them, along with their parents, from our midst. That's the current state of real estate in America, where a child is about as helpful in the search for a home as a record of arson and mass murder.

A 1980 survey by the Department of Housing and Urban Development showed that 25 percent of rental housing was unavailable to families with children, and that another 50 percent had restrictions on age and number. That's three-quarters of the rental housing in the U.S.

And plenty of subdivisions of single-family homes don't allow kids either. Two Florida cases have families fighting eviction notices because they had the termerity to have babies after they moved into restricted areas. "We knew we were wrong when we had the baby," said one mother. You'd think we'd committed an unnatural act.

What she had done is disturb the "tranquility factor," and little mercy is shown the offender, whether it be a child, a chainsaw, or a barking dog. In one case, a homeowner group went to court to remove a 7-month-old child. Tempers have flared; we fear that if all else fails, the offending party might be removed with a pitchfork.

Which is not to say the tenants in childless apartments or neighborhoods don't have a justified complaint. They have chosen this barren ground because for one reason or another they don't like having children around. When their expectations are shattered, they have a right to gripe.

But we can find no justification for banning babies in the first place. Is this any different than banning people because of their race, color, or other unwilled characteristics? Is private property a defensible concept when such a large segment of our society, thanks to this most Scrooge-like of exclusionary rules, is welcome only in certain neighborhoods?

The practice militates against family life, and expecially against families just beginning, which often first flower in an apartment or rented house when a home of their own is still a distant dream. Housing discrimination, whether on account of race, color, creed, or birthdate, is abhorrent. It should be outlawed.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr President, all of these forms of discrimination in the housing market can effectively deny the home buyer or renter equal access to housing. They must be ferreted out, reported to the proper authorities, and remedied; and restitution must be made to the apartment hunter or home buyer. This is where the enforcement provisions of the Fair Housing Amendments Act come into play.

Our bill is intended to ensure that all the actors who form the links in the real estate chain operate without discrimination to do the job which the consumer—the renter or buyer—pays them to perform.

Under the current fair housing law, there are no incentives or procedures to quickly resolve housing discrimination complaints between the parties. There are basically two methods of recourse: Conciliation by HUD, or a State, or local human relations commission; or going to court. Neither has proved effective.

Less than 1 percent of the instances of discrimination find their way into the HUD formal complaint process. HUD receives about 4,500 housing discrimination complaints from individuals each year.

Of those, HUD refers about two-thirds to "substantially equivalent" State and local agencies for disposition. Of the 1,500 remaining with HUD, the Department decides to resolve only one-third. Of the roughly 500 cases, then, that HUD determines to resolve, only about one-half are successfully conciliated.

No wonder no one has much faith in the existing HUD conciliation system to resolve discrimination complaints. Landlords, prospective tenants, sellers, and prospective buyers are all dissatisfied with the status quo.

The only alternative to conciliation is to go to court. But for most individuals in the housing market, going to court is simply out of the question. It is intimidating, confusing, time-consuming, and costly for all parties.

Under current law, too many of those who discriminate in the housing market can continue to do so with impunity. The Fair Housing Amendments Act will make it costly and painful to discriminate in housing and will be a strong deterrent.

Mr. President, our bill establishes an administrative hearing and decision process as a backup to the present conciliation process.

A similar administrative enforcement mechanism is used by 28 Federal agencies—including the Social Security Administration; Occupational Safety and Health Administration; the Mine Safety Review Board; and the National Labor Relations Board—to hear and decide individual "garden variety" cases expeditiously. "Pattern or practice" housing discrimination cases, as well as zoning and land use cases, will continue to be reserved to the Attorney General to pursue in Federal court.

What we have here in the Fair Housing bill is a kind of peoples' court, or small claims court, where the two parties come and tell it to the judge without the fancy and expensive trappings of a courtroom proceeding. It is quick, inexpensive, with mandated time deadlines by which the investigation and conciliation must be concluded; a hearing, if warranted, must commence; and a decision must be made. The procedure is predictable and fair to both parties.

If the complainant successfully proves to the administrative law judge that discrimination occurred, the judge may order the respondent to cease and desist from the discriminatory practice; order him to pay the complainant's out-of-pocket costs; and order the unit to be rented or sold to the complainant. The law judge may also order that the victim be "made whole" by awarding compensatory damages for the pain, humiliation, and suffering he or she suffered by the discriminatory act. Punitive damages may also be assessed.

The bill continues the present HUD referral of complaints to those States and local agencies which HUD certifies have a "substantially equivalent" enforcement mechanism and provide the same protections, remedies, and judicial review as those contained in the Federal law. To enable those States and localities to maintain their "substantially equivalent" status under the amended act, the bill continues that recognition for 4 years. The sponsors want to continue enforcement by State and local human rights agencies and anticipate that HUD could continue to refer cases to them, except for classes of people not covered by the State or local statute.

The bill also preserves an individual's opportunity to pursue a case in court if he or she so desires, rather than pursuing an administrative remedy.

And it leaves undisturbed current case law with respect to who is entitled to file a complaint. Both the person directly encountering discrimination, as well as auditors or testers who verify the complaint, and are entitled to truthful information concerning the availability of housing, have standing.

On the other hand, the administrative process protects the respondent from frivolous lawsuits, protracted litigation, expensive court costs and attorneys' fees, and from adverse publicity which frequently surrounds a court case.

The bill my colleagues and I am introducting today has been fine-tuned after extensive consultation with those with direct experience handling housing discrimination complaints. They include the Department of Housing and Urban Development, State and local human relations commissions, private litigators, fair housing centers, disability groups, civil rights groups, and members of the real estate construction, sales, rental, and management industries.

The bill reflects their experience with the existing conciliation process and with the courts. We are pleased to have found some common ground with the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development with respect to the use of an administrative enforcement mechanism; an increase in the proposed court civil penalties as a strong deterrent; and a streamlining of procedures and time by eliminating the proposed Fair Housing Review Commission of previous bills. In addition, we have made every effort to rely in our bill on existing, proven procedures such as HUD's complaint filing, investigation, and conciliation regulations (24 CFR Part 105).

Like all of his predecessors, Secretary Pierce recognizes that the enforcement provisions of our current fair housing law are inadequate. As the Secretary has noted, "without strong and certain enforcement, including substantial penalties, many who discriminate may never enter the conciliation process." I joined Secretary Pierce last year in Baltimore to commemorate the enactment of the 1968 fair housing law. I was heartened by the Secretary's remarks then and his deep commitment toward moving fair housing amendments into law. At that time Secretary Pierce stated: "Past efforts have resulted in separate legislative proposals, delaying achievement of our goal to strengthen fair housing. The differences of these separate proposals are too small, the common ground too broad, for us to allow victory to elude us. That is why we're working with congressional leaders * * * in an effort which I'm confident will bring enactment of strengthened enforcement this year." I have talked with Secretary Pierce within the past week and I know that his commitment is strong and positive.

Mr. President, President Reagan, in describing his goal for fair housing legislation, has emphasized that it should "place the leadership in enforcement where it belongs, with the Federal Government rather than with the individual victim." The bipartisan coalition of Senators cosponsoring this bill along with the many groups, agencies, and individuals who have worked so tirelessly over the years for enactment, support that goal and believe the Fair Housing Amendments Act will make that goal a reality.

This legislation has been endorsed by the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, a coalition of 185 organizations representing blacks, Hispanics, Asian Americans, disabled persons, women, senior citizens, churches, and labor; by the National Committee Against Discrimination in Housing, a 36-year-old nonprofit association of more than 70 public and private fair housing organizations working at the State and local level to achieve equal housing opportunity; by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; by numerous State and local human rights commissions; by the American Council of the Blind; by the National Association of Private Residential Facilities for the Mentally Retarded; by the Paralyzed Veterans of America; by the Federal Administrative Law Judge Conference; by the National Association of Real Estate Brokers; and by a host of former Federal officials, Republicans and Democrats alike, who have testified on behalf of this bill before House and Senate Judiciary subcommittees.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that six letters to me from those persons and organizations appear at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., said his dream was "deeply rooted in the American dream." Part of that dream is a decent home in the neighborhood of one's choice. Today, 18 years after the death of this drum major for justice, housing discrimination prevents millions of Americans from realizing that dream. What a fitting memorial to Dr. King it would be for this Congress to take up his challenge and make part of his American dream a reality by enacting this fair housing bill.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of this bill and an explanation of its principal provisions be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"(iii) The Secretary may also investigate housing practices to determine whether a complaint should be brought under this section.

"(B) Upon the filing of such a complaint—

"(i) the Secretary shall serve notice upon the aggrieved person acknowledging such filing and advising the aggrieved person of the time limits and choice of forums provided under this title;

"(ii) the Secretary shall, not later than 10 days after such filing or the identification of an additional respondent under paragraph (3), serve a notice, accompanied by a copy of the original complaint, of the alleged discriminatory housing practice on the respondent and advising such respondent of the procedural rights and obligations of respondents under this title;

"(B) Such notice, in addition to meeting the requirements of paragraph (1), shall explain the basis for the Secretary's belief that the person to whom the notice is addressed is properly joined as a respondent.

"(b) INVESTIGATIVE REPORT AND CONCILIATION.—(1) During the period beginning with the filing of such complaint and ending with the filing of a charge or a dismissal by the Secretary, the Secretary shall, to the extent feasible, engage in conciliation with respect to such complaint.

"(3) A conciliation agreement arising out of such conciliation shall be an agreement between the respondent and the aggrieved person, and shall be approved by the Secretary.

"(5) Each conciliation agreement shall be made public.

"(6)(A) With respect to each investigation under this section, the Secretary shall prepare a final investigative report containing—

"(i) the names and dates of contacts with witnesses;

"(c) FAILURE TO COMPLY WITH CONCILIATION AGREEMENT.—Whenever the Secretary has reasonable cause to believe that a respondent has failed to comply with a conciliation agreement, the Secretary shall refer the matter to the Attorney General with a recommendation that a civil action be filed under section 814 for the enforcement of such agreement.

"(d) PROHIBITIONS AND REQUIREMENTS WITH RESPECT TO DISCLOSURE OF INFORMATION.—(1) No individually identifiable information derived from an investigation under this title may be made public other than in the course of proceedings under this title.

"(2) Nothing said or done in the course of conciliation under this title may be made public or used as evidence in a subsequent proceeding under this title without the written consent of the persons concerned.

"(3) Whoever makes public any information in violation of this subsection shall be fined not more than $25,000 or imprisoned not more than six months, or both.

"(4) Information derived from an investigation, shall be made available to the aggrieved person and the respondent at any time upon request, as shall any final investigative report relating to that investigation.

"(e) REFERRAL FOR PROMPT JUDICIAL ACTION.—If the Secretary concludes, during an investigation of a complaint, that prompt judicial action is necessary to carry out the purposes of this title, the Secretary shall refer the matter to the Attorney General, with a request that a civil action be commenced under section 814(b).

"(f) REFERRAL FOR STATE OR LOCAL PROCEEDINGS.—(1) Whenever a complaint alleges a discriminatory housing practice—

"(A) within the jurisdiction of a State or local public agency; and

"(B) as to which such agency has been certified by the Secretary under this subsection; the Secretary shall refer such charge to that certified agency before taking any action with respect to such charge.

"(2) Except with the consent of such certified agency, the Secretary, after that referral is made, shall take no further action with respect to such charge unless—

"(A) the certified agency has failed to commence proceedings with respect to the charge before the end of the 30th day after the date of such referral;

"(B) the certified agency, having so commenced such proceedings, fails to carry forward such proceedings with reasonable promptness; or

"(C) the Secretary determines that the certified agency no longer qualifies for certification under this subsection with respect to the relevant jurisdiction.

"(3)(A) The Secretary may certify an agency under this subsection only if the Secretary determines that—

"(i) the substantive rights protected by such agency in the jurisdiction with respect to which certification is to be made;

"(ii) the procedures followed by such agency;

"(iii) the remedies available to such agency; and

"(iv) the availability of judicial review of such agency's action; are substantially equivalent to those created by and under this title.

"(B) Before making such certification, the Secretary shall take into account the current practices and past performance, if any, of such agency.

"(4) During the period which begins on the date of the enactment of the Fair Housing Amendments Act of 1986 and ends four years after such date, each agency certified for the purposes of this title on the day before such date shall for the purposes of this subsection be considered certified under this subsection with respect to those matters for which such agency was certified on that date.

"(5) Not less frequently than every five years, the Secretary shall determine whether each agency certified under this subsection continues to qualify for certification. The Secretary shall take appropriate action with respect to any agency not so qualifying.

"(g) REASONABLE CAUSE DETERMINATION AND EFFECT.—(1) If the Secretary—

"(A)(i) has not approved a conciliation agreement before the end of the 100th day after the date of the filing of the complaint; or

"(ii) certifies before the end of such period that conciliation of the complaint has been engaged in, and that additional conciliation efforts are unlikely to be successful; and

"(B) determines, after an investigation under this section but not later than the end of the 100th day after the filing of the complaint, that reasonable cause exists to believe that a discriminatory housing practice has occurred or is about to occur;

the Secretary shall take action under paragraph (2).

"(2)(A) If the Secretary is required to take action under this paragraph, the Secretary shall, except as provided in subparagraph (C), immediately issue a charge, on behalf of the aggrieved person filing the complaint, for further proceedings under section 812.

"Such charge—

"(i) shall consist of a short and plain statement of the facts upon which the Secretary has found reasonable cause to believe that a discriminatory housing practice has occurred or is about to occur;

"(ii) shall be based on the final investigative report; and

"(iii) need not be limited to the facts or grounds alleged in the complaint filed under section 810(a).

"(C) If the Secretary determines that the matter involves the legality of any State or local zoning or other land use law or ordinance, the Secretary shall immediately refer the matter to the Attorney General for appropriate action under section 814, instead of issuing such charge.

"(3) Unless the Secretary is required to take action under paragraph (2), the Secretary shall promptly dismiss the complaint. The Secretary shall make public disclosure of each such dismissal.

"(4) The Secretary shall not issue a charge under this section regarding an alleged discriminatory housing practice after the beginning of the trial of a civil action commenced by the aggrieved party under an Act of Congress or a State law, seeking relief with respect to that discriminatory housing practice.

"(4) The Secretary and administrative law judges may administer oaths and affirmations for the purposes of this title.

"(f) FINDINGS AND CONCLUSIONS, AND ORDER.—(1) After the hearing under this section, the administrative law judge shall promptly make findings of fact and conclusions of law.

(2) If the administrative law judge finds that a respondent has engaged or is about to engage in a discriminatory housing practice, such administrative law judge shall promptly issue an order for such relief as may be appropriate, which may include—

"(B) Notwithstanding such chapter, however, venue of the proceeding shall be in the judicial circuit in which the discriminatory housing practice is alleged to have occurred, and filing of the petition for review shall be not later than 30 days after the date of service of such order.

"(i) COURT ENFORCEMENT OF ADMINISTRATIVE ORDER UPON PETITION BY SECRETARY.—(1) The Secretary may petition any United States court of appeals for the circuit in which the discriminatory housing practice is alleged to have occurred or in which any respondent resides or transacts business, or the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, for the enforcement of the order of the administrative law judge and for appropriate temporary relief or restraining order, by filing in such court a written petition praying that such order be enforced and for appropriate temporary relief or restraining order.

"(2) The Secretary shall file in court with the petition the record in the proceeding. A copy of such petition shall be forthwith transmitted by the clerk of the court to the parties to the proceeding before the administrative law judge.

"(j) RELIEF WHICH MAY BE GRANTED.—(1) Upon the filing of a petition under subsection (h) or (i), the court may—

"(A) grant to the petitioner, or any other party, such temporary relief, restraining order, or other order as the court deems just and proper;

"(C) enforce such order to the extent that such order is affirmed or modified.

"(2) Any party to the proceeding before the administrative law judge may intervene in the court of appeals.

"(3) No objection not made before the administrative law judge shall be considered by the court, unless the failure or neglect to urge such objection is excused because of extraordinary circumstances.

"(4) The findings of the administrative law judge with respect to questions of fact shall not be set aside unless such findings are unsupported by substantial evidence on the record taken as a whole.

"(k) ENFORCEMENT DECREE IN ABSENCE OF PETITION FOR REVIEW.—If no petition for review is filed under subsection (h) before the end of the 45th day after the date of the service of the administrative law judge's order, the administrative law judge's findings of fact and order shall be conclusive in connection with any petition for enforcement—

"(1) which is filed by the Secretary under subsection (i) after the end of such day; or

"(2) under subsection (l).

"(l) COURT ENFORCEMENT OF ADMINISTRATIVE ORDER UPON PETITION OF ANY PERSON ENTITLED TO RELIEF.—If before the end of the 60th day after the date of service of the administrative law judge's order, no petition for review has been filed under subsection (h), and the Secretary has not sought enforcement of the order under subsection (i), any person entitled to relief under the order may petition for a decree enforcing the order in the United States court of appeals for the circuit in which the discriminatory housing practice is alleged to have occurred.

"(m) ENTRY OF DECREE.—The clerk of the court of appeals in which a petition for enforcement is filed under subsection (k) or (l) shall forthwith enter a decree enforcing the order and shall transmit a copy of such decree to the Secretary, the respondent named in the petition, and to any other parties to the proceedings before the administrative law judge.

"(n) ATTORNEY'S FEES.—Any prevailing party may be awarded a reasonable attorneys' fee as part of the final order in any administrative proceeding based on a charge issued by the Secretary, or by the court, in any proceeding for review or enforcement of such an order, as part of the costs. "ENFORCEMENT BY PRIVATE PERSONS

"SEC. 813. (a) CIVIL ACTION.—(1)(A) An aggrieved person may commence a civil action in an appropriate United States district court or State court not later than two years after the termination of an alleged discriminatory housing practice or a noncompliance with a conciliation agreement entered into under this title to obtain appropriate relief with respect to such discriminatory housing practice or noncompliance.

"(B) The computation of such two-year period shall not include any time during during which a administrative proceeding under this title was pending with respect to a complaint or charge under this title based upon such discriminatory housing practice or the discriminatory housing practice to which such conciliation agreement pertains.

"(2) An aggrieved person may commence a civil action under this subsection whether or not a complaint has been filed under section 810(a) and without regard to the status of any such complaint, but if the Secretary or a State or local agency has obtained a conciliation agreement, no action may be filed under this subsection by the aggrieved person with respect to the alleged discriminatory housing practice which forms the basis for such complaint filed with the Secretary except for the purpose of enforcing the terms of such an agreement.

PRINCIPAL PROVISIONS OF THE FAIR HOUSING ACT OF 1986

PURPOSE

The bill provides an additional means (as an alternative to court suit) to redress housing discrimination complaints. It does this by means of a speedy, fair, and inexpensive decision process for all parties in cases where persons allege that they have been denied housing because of their race, color, religion, sex, national origin, handicap, or familial status.

It broadens the classes of persons protected from discrimination housing practices to include handicapped persons and families with children. And it codifies a number of court decisions interpreting and clarifying Congressional intent in the Fair Housing Act of 1986.

It does this by amending the Fair Housing law (Title VIII of the Civil Rights Act of 1968.

FILING A COMPLAINT

When a person believes he or she has been treated unfairly in the housing market because of race, color, religion, sex, national origin, handicap, or familial status, he or she may file a complaint with the local HUD office.

The complaint is investigated by an agency representative to determine if it is valid. During this time, the agency attempts to conciliate between the parties. If the agency has no reasonable cause to believe the complaint is true, it must dismiss it without further proceedings.

If the agency has reasonable cause to believe the complaint is true and conciliation has not been successful, the agency files a charge on behalf of the complainant before an administrative law judge.

However, zoning or land-use cases shall be referred by HUD to the Justice Department for further investigation and court action, if warranted.

REFERRAL OF COMPLAINT TO STATE OR LOCAL AGENCY

HUD shall certify a State or local agency as "substantially equivalent" if the rights, remedies, availability of judicial review, and procedures of that state or locality are substantially equivalent to those created in this bill. Such agencies shall be recertified every five years.

HUD currently has certified 90 state and local agencies. The certification of such agencies shall continue for four years, when they will be reviewed by HUD for continued certification. They would continue to receive, investigate, hear, and decide HUD-referred cases under the bill, except for cases involving classes not protected by their controlling statute. Such cases would be processed by HUD until such time as the state or locality's statute was amended to include such persons (i.e. handicapped persons and families with children).

CONCILIATION

The first method to attempt to resolve housing discrimination complaints is by informal means. HUD, acting in the public interest, investigates the complaint, interviews witnesses, reviews records, and takes statements. Based on this evidence, HUD makes a determination either to resolve the issue or not to resolve the issue. A Final Investigation Report (F.I.R.) is then prepared. The parties are brought together by HUD (or the "substantially equivalent" state agency) to resolve the issues. This process, currently used by HUD and some "substantially equivalent" state and local agencies, encourages the two parties to resolve their differences in private in their own best interests through a signed agreement. This agreement may provide for binding arbitration.

ADMINISTRATIVE ENFORCEMENT

Should the parties fail to reach a conciliation agreement, this bill provides for an administrative hearing process.

Independent administrative law judges (ALJs) hear the case, decide the facts, and render a decision. HUD represents the aggrieved person before the ALJ. Each party may call, question, and cross examine witnesses. The proceeding is a public one on the record and subject to the Administrative Procedures Act.

The complainant has the right to intervene in this hearing. The decision of the administrative law judge may be appealed to the federal court of appeals for the credit in which to discriminatory practice is alleged to have occurred.

The final order of the ALJ, whether a finding against a respondent or a dismissal of a charge, shall be made public. Aggrieved persons retain their right to pursue a private lawsuit up until the time an administrative hearing commences.

Similar types of administrative enforcement procedures are used by 28 other federal agencies and departments.

RELIEF

If, after an initial investigation, HUD believes prompt action is necessary, such as to keep the housing unit available until the charge is resolved, then the Secretary of HUD may ask the Attorney General to seek a temporary restraining order (TRO) or a preliminary injunction from the court. The effect of a TRO is to hold the unit in dispute off the market until a conciliation agreement is reached or until an ALJ renders a final decision.

If discrimination is found by the administrative law judge, equitable and declaratory relief (including cease and desist orders) as well as compensatory and punitive damages may be awarded.

If the aggrieved person chooses to go to court, the relief a court may award includes injunctive relief, compensatory, and punitive damages. In addition, the court may assess a civil penalty against a respondent of up to $50,000 for the first offense and up to $100,000 for a second offense. Such penalties have a deterrent effect, discouraging the respondent from discriminating again and violating the law.

This authority to grant all necessary relief provides the real enforcement power for Title VIII and ensures that the victim is made 'whole' by the process.

Reasonable attorney fees and expert witness fees may also be granted to the prevailing party.

AGGRIEVED PERSONS

"Aggrieved person" repeats current law and is defined as those both directly and indirectly affected by a discriminatory housing practice.

ADDITIONAL PROTECTED CLASSES

Two additional groups of persons are added to Title VIII of the Civil Rights Act to protect them from housing discrimination:

1. "Handicapped persons", as defined in Sec. 504 of the Rehabilitation Act.

This provision permits reasonable modifications to a rental apartment or house by a handicapped person, at his or her expense, in order to make access to the unit by that person or persons substantially equal.

Modifications to the apartment or house shall not be at the expense of the owner. At the landlord's request, the handicapped person must return the unit to its original condition when he or she vacates.

2. Familial Status" is also added as a protected class.

This means families with children are protected from housing discrimination. However, the bill does not bar exclusion of families with children from publicly-assisted housing for the elderly or from bona fide retirement communities. Furthermore, reasonable local occupancy and other codes limiting the number of persons per unit would continue to apply.

OTHER PARTICIPANTS IN THE REAL ESTATE CHAIN

The bill codifies existing case law with respect to a number of other participants in the real estate chain who are subject to the Fair Housing law.

Mortgage lenders are prohibited from refusing to lend ("redlining") and from charging additional fees, or requiring different terms and conditions in a loan in certain city neighborhoods because of the race of the neighborhood residents. Likewise, property insurers, real estate appraisers, and mortgage purchasers are explicitly cited as subject to the Fair Housing Act's coverage.

IMPLEMENTING RULES AND REGULATIONS

HUD is requird to issue rules and regulations to implement this act, to submit an annual report to Congress on progress in eliminating discrimination in housing, and to provide advice and assistance to persons of low and moderate income in need of housing assistance.

LEADERSHIP CONFERENCE ON CIVIL RIGHTS,
Washington, DC, November 15, 1985.

Hon. CHARLES MATHIAS,
U.S. Senate, Russell Senate Office Building, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR MATHIAS: The Leadership Conference on Civil Rights (LCCR), composed of 185 national organizations representing Black, Hispanic and Asian Americans, labor, major religious groups, women, the handicapped, minority businesses and professions and the aged strongly supports and urges the enactment of the Fair Housing Amendments Act of 1985.

Housing discrimination persists as evidenced by HUD's estimate that at least two million incidences of unlawful victimization occur annually. This figure does not reflect the increasing number of overt and even violent acts directed against minority families who move into all or predominantly white neighborhoods. Where one lives is key to access to employment opportunities and educational facilities. Yet housing choice is the most elusive civil rights objective and, consequently, constitutes a major obstacle to securing other civil rights assured under law.

Clearly, the weaknesses in the existing fair housing law—Title VIII of the Civil Rights Act of 1968—account for much of the failure to eliminate the policies and practices that deny minorities and women choice and perpetuate segregated residential patterns. The proposed amendments would correct the law's deficiencies by providing an effective administrative remedy for individual victims of discrimination. Further, it would extend protection to disabled persons and families with children who find it increasingly difficult to find accessible and suitable affordable housing.

This effort to strengthen Title VIII has had bipartisan support since 1977 and in 1980 passed in the House by a wide margin and failed in the Senate only because of time constraints.

We cannot let more time elapse in securing legislation that will cure the deficiencies in the existing law, deficiencies that with passage of time reinforce the wrongs the law was enacted to remedy.

We are gratified that you are again taking the lead in seeking these essential legislative changes. We look forward to working with you.

Sincerely,

BENJAMIN L. HOOKS,
Chairperson.
RALPH G. NEAS,
Executive Director.

NATIONAL COMMITTEE AGAINST DISCRIMINATION IN HOUSING,
Washington, DC, February 3, 1986.

Senator CHARLES MCC. MATHIAS,
U.S. Senate, Russell Senate Office Building, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR MATHIAS: This is to express the full endorsement and support of NCDH and its 75 affiliated Fair Housing Centers for the Fair Housing Amendments Legislation that you and other key members of the Congress are introducing.

This legislation is the product of nine years of Congressional effort to provide needed changes to strengthen the Federal Fair Housing Law. The Bill represents a long process of honing and refining these changes to reflect the current realities of housing discrimination and to deal with housing discrimination problems forcefully and effectively.

Despite the fact that Fair Housing has been the law of the land since 1968, housing discrimination in various forms remains rampant. HUD has estimated that some two million incidents of illegal racial discrimination occur annually. HUD, with no enforcement authority, receives only some 4,000 complaints annually. NCDH documented the fact last October that racial discrimination in housing is a "very severe" problem throughout the United States.

Discrimination against handicapped persons is acknowledged by HUD and everyone else as a major problem. Housing discrimination against families with children has been documented—by NCDH and others—as a widespread problem of nationwide dimensions.

These facts strongly suggest at least two needed major amendments:

1. A speedy, effective mechanism to secure fair housing rights without the necessity of resort to lengthy, expensive litigation.

2. Protection for handicapped persons and families with children, neither of whom are now protected under the Federal Fair Housing Law.

Further, there is a need to clarify ambiguities in the law by incorporating the body of judicial decisions interpreting those ambiguous provisions into the Fair Housing Act.

The Fair Housing Amendments Bill would meet those needs effectively.

First, it would provide for a simple, expeditious, and inexpensive means of housing discrimination victims to secure their federally protected fair housing rights—administrative enforcement—not as a substitute, but as an alternative, to litigation.

Second, it would add fair housing protection to handicapped persons and families with children—people who now are unprotected by Federal Law.

Third, it would resolve ambiguities of coverage in the way the courts have resolved them.

Similar legislation was first introduced in the Congress in 1977—some nine years ago. It consistently has received strong bipartisan support and, indeed, almost was enacted in 1980.

Recent events—in Philadelphia and elsewhere—highlight the prevalence and pervasive nature of housing discrimination nearly 18 years after enactment of the Federal Fair Housing Law. These events, as well as factual studies and investigations, demonstrate the urgent need for speedy enactment of this important legislation.

We congratulate you and the able Congressional staff that have crafted this superb Bill. NCDH and its affiliates fully support it and will do all we can to help secure enactment in this—the Fifth Congress to consider this needed legislation.

Sincerely,

MARTIN E. SLOANE,
Executive Vice President.

AMERICAN COUNCIL OF THE BLIND,
Washington, DC, January 2, 1986.

Senator CHARLES MCC. MATHIAS, Jr.,
Russell Senate Office Building, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR MATHIAS. The American Council of the Blind (ACB) is the nation's largest advocacy organization of blind and visually impaired persons. The Council's national office in Washington, D.C. serves as a hub for the activities and programs of its fifty-three state affiliates and seventeen special interest and professional organizations. As a membership organization, comprised primarily of blind and visually impaired persons, ACB and its members strongly support the Fair Housing Amendments Act of 1985.

Title VIII of the Civil Rights Act of 1968, also known as the "Fair Housing Act", prohibits discrimination in the sale, rental, financing or marketing of housing against any person because of race, color, religion, sex, or national origin. Unfortunatley, persons with disabilities are not a protected class under the current Fair Housing Act. Recent estimates indicate that one out of every six people in the United States has a disability, and as many as one out of every twenty-two persons may be classified as "severely handicapped". ACB urges the enactment of the proposed amendments, which would extend the protection of the Fair Housing laws to handicapped persons.

The American Council of the Blind is hopeful that Congress will recognize that the Fair Housing Amendments Act of 1985 is an important piece of legislation to and for disabled persons. It is necessary to protect all classes of individuals against the evils of discrimination. Thank you for taking the lead in re-introducing this bill.

Yours sincerely,

ORAL O. MILLER,
National Representative.

WASHINGTON, DC, December 27, 1985.

Hon. CHARLES MCC. MATHIAS, Jr.,
Russell Senate Office Building, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR MATHIAS: As former Assistant Secretary for Fair Housing and Equal Opportunity, I strongly endorse your bill, The Fair Housing Amendments Act.

I had the privilege of serving in the Department of Housing and Urban Development with Moon Landrieu and the late Patricia Roberts Harris, both of whom made this legislation one of the Department's principal legislative priorities.

You may recall Secretary Harris' testimony before the Subcommittee on the Constitution in March of 1979:

There is no mechanism today existing to insure access to housing by discriminated against members of this society. In the absence of an administrative procedure that makes it possible for an agency of the Federal Government, or through States agencies with similar powers, to enforce the end of housing discrimination—in the absence of that—the present policy of excluding people by a variety of methods will continue. . . .

What has happened in this society is that a small part of the society has been denied opportunity for access to housing based usually upon race or obvious national origin.

It is the special condition and opportunity, it seems to me, that this body and the society at large ought to be opposed to—that an individual can say to me that because of my particular ethnic background I may not purchase housing which almost everybody else similarly situated might purchase, which has nothing to do with my ability to purchase or occupy that house. That goes contrary not only to the protections of the Constitution but to some basic common-law attitudes toward restrictions on the alienation of property.

Senator, fair housing has been the last civil rights issue to gain national attention. Yet, it is literally a question of where people live and how they live. Our society can ill afford to squander its time and energy maintaining segregated housing.

Since the Department's testimony in 1979, this bill has been passed by more than a two-thirds bipartisan vote in the House of Representatives. It was stalemated, as I need not remind you, in the lame duck session of the Senate in 1980.

The time has come for the Congress and the Senate, in particular, to confront the national problem of discrimination in housing and provide a remedy.

Sincerely,

STERLING TUCKER.

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION FOR THE ADVANCEMENT OF COLORED PEOPLE,
Brooklin Heights, NY, January 6, 1986.

Hon. CHARLES McC. MATHIAS, Jr.,
Russell Senate Office Building,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR MATHIAS: The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People again joins in endorsing the Fair Housing Amendments Act. This bill is an important part of the unfinished civil rights agenda facing this nation.

The NAACP has enjoyed a good relationship with you during the past years in drafting this bill and working for its enactment. We are determined to redouble our efforts to make fair housing a priority of this second session of the 99th Congress.

Access to housing is still limited to minorities and thousands of Americans encounter discrimination in the housing market daily. Your bill assures that persons encountering such discrimination are guaranteed a hearing and a resolution of their dispute in a timely and economical way.

The Fair Housing Amendments Act would fulfill that long-overdue civil rights commitment to our fellow Americans and ensure the promise of the Civil Rights Act of 1968.

Sincerely,

BENJAMIN L. HOOKS,
Executive Director.

SENATE RESOLUTION 328—EXPRESSING THE SENSE OF THE SENATE ON THE IMPORTANCE OF INTERNATIONAL OBSERVERS AND NAMFREL DURING PHILIPPINE ELECTIONS

Mr. DECONCINI (for himself and Mr. LAUTENBERG) submitted the following resolution; which was considered and agreed to.

S. RES. 328

Whereas, on February 7, 1986, the Republic of the Philippines will hold an election for President and Vice President;

Whereas, the government and people of the United States have a longstanding friendship with the Philippines based on democratic principles and institutions;

Whereas, the United States seeks to perpetuate that relationship and has a strategic interest in the preservation of access to two military bases in the Philippines for the security of the Pacific region;

Whereas, restoration of democratic institutions in the Philippines is one essential element necessary to restore the confidence of the Filipino people in their government and to stem the growth of the communist insurgency;

Whereas, President Marcos, other officials of the Government of the Philippines, the opposition party UNIDO, and the National Citizen Movement for a Free Election (NAMFREL) have indicated their willingness to cooperate with a delegation of international observers;

Whereas, President Reagan has appointed an official United States delegation of Members of Congress and distinguished Americans from the private sector to observe the February 7 election.

Whereas, a decision to limit access to polling places by international observers would seriously impair observation and would detract from the credibility of the election result;

Whereas, it has been the experience that international observers to the elections of 1982 and 1984 in El Salvador and more recently, Guatemala, were not limited access to polling places and greatly increased the fairness and credibility of those elections;

Whereas, NAMFREL is experiencing difficulty in organizing its citizens monitoring activities, particularly with regard to the "quick count" which is essential to a credible election: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Senate hereby—

(1) reaffirms its support for genuine, free, and fair elections in the Philippines scheduled for February 7, 1986;

(2) stresses the critical importance of NAMFREL in permitting the Filipino people to monitor the conduct of the election and of NAMFREL's "quick count" in monitoring the tabulation of the results;

(3) stresses the importance of the presence of international observers at such elections;

(4) urges the Governments of the Philippines to permit direct access to the polling places for such international observers;

(5) expresses its support for the official United States delegation sent by the President to observe the February 7 election; and

(6) reaffirms its commitment to the principles spelled out in House Concurrent Resolution 232, as passed unanimously by the Congerss on November 14, 1985.

SENATE RESOLUTION 329—AUTHORIZING TESTIMONY OF A SENATE EMPLOYEE

Mr. DOLE (for himself and Mr. BYRD) submitted the following resolution; which was considered and agreed to:

S. RES. 329

Whereas, in the case of United States v. Joseph V. Herrera, Cirminal No. 85-223, pending in the United States District Court for the District of New Mexico, the defendant has obtained a subpoena for the testimony of Sal Ceballos under the name of Sal Fresquez, an employee in Senator Bingaman's Las Cruces office;

Whereas, by the privileges of the Senate of the United States and Rule XI of the Standing Rules of the Senate, no evidence under the control or in the possession of the Senate can, by the judicial process, be taken from such control or possession but by permission of the Senate;

Whereas, when it appears that the testimony of an employee of the Senate is needful for use in any court for the promotion of justice, the Senate will take such action thereon as will promote the ends of justice consistent with the privileges and rights of the Senate: Now, therefore be it

Resolved, That Sal Ceballos is authorized to appear and to testify in the case of United States v. Joseph V. Herrera, except concerning matters which may be privileged.

SENATE RESOLUTION 330—ESTABLISHING A SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON FAMILIES, YOUTH, AND CHILDREN

Mr. DENTON (for himself, Mr. MOYNIHAN, Mr. MATHIAS, Mr. BENTSEN, Mr. DURENBERGER, Mr. GRASSLEY, Mr. HATCH, Mr. HEFLIN, Mr. HOLLINGS, Mr. INOUYE, and Mr. SPECTER) submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration:

S. RES. 330

Whereas the family is the fundamental social unit and family formation and the successful rearing of youth and children may be more difficult than ever before in our nation's history;

Whereas the weakening of the traditional family unit constitutes a sensitive and complex social problem involving intense unhappiness of men, woman and children;

Whereas family instability and deteriorating family relationship are destructive of the physical and mental health and economic well-being, especially of youth and children, but also of many other members of unstable or broken families;

Whereas family instability is substantially associated with the impoverishment of children and increasing rates of teenage alcohol and drug abuse, adolescent pregnancy, teenage suicide and juvenile delinquency;

Whereas nearly one-quarter of the children in the United States today live in poverty as measured by the Census Bureau;

Whereas the poverty rate for children, particularly young children under age 6, is far higher than that for any other age group;

Whereas one-third of all children now being born in the United States may expect to be on public assistance before reaching age eighteen;

Whereas the generation long trend toward increasing child dependency on public assistance, child abandonment, child abuse, and child exploitation is to be resisted and reversed;

Whereas it is essential to address the nation's alarming rate of family disintegration and raise the public and governmental levels of understanding of the problems of families, youth and children;

Whereas it is imperative that government and private policies strenthen famiies and foster responsibility by addressing the causes of family disintegration, and assisting and encouraging preventive measures;

Whereas commencing with the establishment of the Children's Bureau of 1912, the executive branch has maintained a continuous if not always vigorous concern for the welfare of families, youth and children;

Whereas policies affecting families, youth and children are considered and acted upon by several, different standing committees; and

Whereas it is necessary to enhance the Senate's ability to conduct comprehensive oversight of Government and congressional activities affecting families, youth and children: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That (a)(1) there is established a special committee of the Senate to be known as the Special Committee on Families, Youth, and Children (hereafter in this resolution referred to as the "special committee"). (2) Vacancies in the membership of the special committee shall not affect the authority of the remaining members to execute the functions of the committee, and shall be filled in the same manner as original appointments are made.

(3) The special committee shall adopt rules of procedure not inconsistent with the rules of the Senate governing standing committees of the Senate.

(c) The chairman may establish such subcommittees of the special committee as he considers appropriate, but each such subcommittee shall be composed of not less than four members.

SEC. 2. (a) It shall be the duty of the special committee to—

(1) make a full and complete study of the impact of government policies on families, children and adolescents, including the matter of health, income maintenance, welfare, education, employment, care of dependents of all ages, nutrition, adoption, foster care, and other concerns of children, adolescents, and families generally; and

(2) study the use of practicable means of encouraging the development of public and private programs and policies which will assist families, youth, or children.

(b) The special committee shall submit an annual report, and such other reports as the special committee considers necessary, to the Senate on the results of any investigation and review conducted under subsection (a).

(c) No proposed legislation shall be referred to the special committee, and such committee shall not have the power to report by bill or otherwise have any legislative jurisdiction.

SEC. 3. (a) For the purposes of this resolution, the special committee is authorized to—

(1) make expenditures from the contingent fund of the Senate;

(2) employ personnel;

(3) hold hearings;

(4) sit and act at any time or place during the sessions, recesses, and adjourned periods of the Senate;

(5) require, by subpoena or otherwise, the attendance of witnesses and the production of correspondence, books, papers, and documents;

(6) take depositions and other testimony;

(7) procure the services of individual consultants or organizations thereof, in accordance with the provisions of section 202(i) of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946; and

(8) with the prior consent of the department or agency of the Federal Government concerned and the Committee on Rules and Administration, use on a reimbursable basis the services of personnel of any such department or agency.

(b) With the consent of the chairman of any other committee of the Senate, the special committee may utilize the facilities and the services of the staff of such other committee of the Senate, or any subcommittee thereof, whenever the chairman of the special committee determines that such action is necessary and appropriate.

(c) The chairman of the special committee or any member thereof may administer oaths to witesses.

(d) Subpoenas authorized by the special committee may be issued over the signature of the chairman or any member of the special committee designated by the chairman, and may be served by any peron designated by the member signing the subpoena.

SEC. 4. Expenses of the special committee under this resolution shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the special committee, except that vouchers shall not be required for the disbursement of salaries of employees paid an annual rate.

SEC. 5. The committee list of paragraph (3)(c) of rule XXV of the Standing Rules of the Senate is amended by inserting at the end thereof the following:

"Special Committee on Families, Youth, and Children..... 11".

Mr. DENTON. Mr. President, I rise today along with my distinguished colleagues from New York, Mr. MOYNIHAN, and from Maryland, Mr. MATHIAS, to submit a resolution to establish a Senate Special Committee on Families, Youth and Children. The measure is cosponsored by the Senator from Pennsylvania, Mr. SPECTER, my distinguished colleague, and senior Senator from Alabama, Mr. HEFLIN, the Senator from South Carolina, Mr. HOLLINGS, the Senator from Utah, Mr. HATCH, the Senator from Hawaii, Mr. INOUYE, the Senator from Iowa, Mr. GRASSLEY, the Senator from Minnesota, Mr. DURENBERGER, and the Senator from Texas, Mr. BENTSEN.

The proposal focuses on one particularly critical issue: The pressing need to provide a comprehensive approach to governmental policy affecting families, youth, and children.

The American family is undergoing a siege of immense proportions. A number of recent reports, news articles, and television specials have called attention to what columnist William Raspberry has described as the plight of the growing underclass—teenage mothers, jobless and disconnected young fathers—on eroded values and deteriorated families. In a column that reviewed the excellent book "Family and Nation" by my distinguished colleague from New York, Mr. MOYNIHAN, William Raspberry underscores an important point: Family stability is so important to the health of the Nation that we had better start looking at our national policies in terms of their effect on the family.

Mr. Raspberry goes on to observe:

If the special attention lately given the plight of the black family is expanded to include the white family, which is also far less stable than it once was, it might help us to understand, right across political lines, the crucial importance of strengthening the American family.

Mr. Raspberry concludes that it is now time to talk about the direction of reform and time to start searching for different directions. I agree, and so do the other cosponsors of this legislation.

The present state of family crisis, involving the need for social and welfare reform, together with my experience in conducting hearings on the issue of the broken family while I was chairman of the Senate Subcommittee on Family and Human Services, convinces me that something must be done immediately to provide both a comprehensive approach and innovative solutions. This is a bipartisan issue. As Senator MOYNIHAN has stated:

The prospect that the needs of the families might be the means for bringing liberals and conservatives together on matters of policy is intriguing and real.

In my work in Congress, I have witnessed concern for the family expressed by conservative as well as by liberal legislators, by Democrats as well as Republicans. This issue cuts across the political spectrum. I believe that our concern for the well-being of the institution of the family, and about the problems facing families, youth, and children, is universally shared by all Americans.

As I am sure that many of my colleagues are keenly aware, for too many years now the Senate has lacked a vehicle for a comprehensive examination of policies, legislation, and national trends as they affect the well-being of our Nation's families and children. At best, our attention to the needs of families has been fragmented among an assortment of different legislative committees and subcommittees. At worst, we have essentially ignored those needs.

Yet, one way or another, the policies that our Federal Government establishes by law or by regulation can play a major role in promoting either family unity or family disintegration, and can provide either a positive environment for children growing into adulthood, or a negative one.

Major reforms are needed in social and welfare programs. Current budgetary constraints require the development of innovative and multidisciplinary solutions to the problems facing families, youth, and children. We must develop new ways to involve participation and partnerships between both the public and private sector in funding and providing necessary services.

Budgetary consideration precipitated by recent legislation, notably the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings amendment, require that budget cuts be made in many programs. That should be done in an intelligent fashion, taking a comprehensive approach in viewing governmental policy affecting families, youth, and children. In addition, creative approaches must be developed to encourage more participation by the private sector in those areas. The reforms and cuts in budgets or programs should be the product of a rational, coordinated national policy that supports family strengths and encourages individual responsibility, while retaining a compassionate response for those people in need. In relation to the budgetary initiatives spurred by Gramm-Rudman-Hollings, I note that Senator HOLLINGS is a cosponsor of this proposal to create a special committee.

Mr. President, the special committee being proposed today would be a permanent committee composed of 11 members appointed by the President pro tempore of the Senate on the recommendations of the minority and majority leaders. The committee would have no legislative jurisdiction.

The special committee would have the mandate to make a comprehensive study of matters affecting families, children, and adolescents, including, but not restricted to, health, income maintenance, welfare, education, employment, care of dependents of all ages, nutrition, adoption, foster care, and other concerns of children, adolescents, and families generally. It would be asked to encourage and promote public and private policies and programs that assist families, youth, and children.

The committee would act as an educational clearinghouse and a forum for the exchange of ideas on proposals. Designed to act as a coordinating body that would address a wider range of issues than any one committee or subcommittee is currently able to consider, it would not conflict, duplicate, or take away power or jurisdiction from any existing committee or subcommittee that presently deals with family issues.

The addition of the special committee will strengthen policy formation. The Senate has recently modified the committee process by deleting certain subcommittees. Nonetheless, the existing Senate system needs to be further streamlined by providing for a concise approach to the formation of family policy. The current system does not consolidate policy formation, but instead divides responsiblity among several Senate committees and subcommittees, according to narrow jurisdictional limitations.

It should be emphasized that, by adding a special committee to study, evaluate, and provide a concise overview of the condition of the Nation's family and youth, the legislation supports the effort to streamline the committee process by providing an official focal point for the proper consideration of policy formation for the entire range of problems and governmental policies that affect families and children.

There is no doubt in my mind about the absolute necessity for the special committee. Legislators who authorize programs and pass laws that may have an adverse impact on the family are often uninformed about the potential negative effect of their actions, and may be unaware of the existence and relationship of certain legislation and other bureacratic action because of the organizational mismatch and failure of coordination that exists under the present system.

The U.S. House of Representatives already has a Select Committee on Children, Youth, and Families that provides a comprehensive overview of programs, policies, and trends that affect families and our Nation's youth.

One of the problems facing the Senate is the fact that the current committee structure diffuses accountability for these areas. It is time that we in the Senate recognize that the seriousness of existing problems mandates that we approach the issues in as comprehensive a fashion as does the House of Representatives.

There must be an intelligible overview of how social and welfare programs interrelate and operate. The existing system is a mass of confusion. Budget cuts and reforms require that there be some overview of the entire range of current social and welfare programs. Responsibility for the multitude of programs is divided among various committees, subcommittees, and departments, each limited by its specific grant of jurisdiction. The jurisdictional limitation defines in a narrow fashion both the programs that will be administered or reviewed as well as the constituency to be served by the reviewing process.

The need for an overview special committee is recognized by its cosponsors, who include leaders of existing major Senate committees and subcommittees having jurisdiction over issues related to family and children, or who head Senate caucuses on the subject. Senator HATCH is chairman of the Senate Committee on Labor and Human Resources. Senator SPECTER is chairman of the Senate Subcommittee on Juvenile Justice, and is cochairman of the bipartisan Senate Children's Caucus. The measure is also cosponsored by Senator MATHIAS, who is chairman of the Senate Rules Committee. In a letter to Senator MOYNIHAN, Senator MATHIAS stated that the "time is ripe" for such a committee, and said the Rules Committee would hold hearings on the proposal.

No social or welfare reforms can be made without the cooperation and consensus of liberals and conservatives, both Democrat and Republican. The bill has been initiated and is supported by Senators representing a broad political spectrum. It has not been imposed upon them, but is the product of their jointly shared belief that immediate efforts must be taken from a unified viewpoint if we are to understand the problems of family dissolution, childhood poverty, the growth of single parent families, and the things that contribute to and enable family formation and strength. Again, they are bipartisan issues, and their proper disposition is critical to our national health. As Senator MOYNIHAN has said, liberals and conservatives must find common ground in seeking solutions to the problems. Because of the importance of coming to terms with the issue, both liberals and conservatives have joined together to cosponsor the measure.

I have had much opportunity to study the effect of various Government policies on the family, in my capacities as a member of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, as a member of the Judiciary Subcommittee on Juvenile Justice, as the former chairman of the Labor and Human Resources Subcommittee on Family and Human Services, as a member of the Special Committee on Aging, and as the chairman of the bipartisan Senate Family Caucus.

I have heard testimony from many citizens who believe that the disintegration of the family unit, and the failure to form cohesive, binding relationships, results in tragic consequences for individual men, women, and children, as well as for society as a whole.

Family stability faces many problems. Increases in the rate of divorce, the rate of juvenile delinquency and crime, child abuse, missing children, runaway youth, teen suicide, and the incidence of alcohol and drug abuse reflect a society that is disintegrating.

There is no question that the family is the fundamental social unit of any civilization. No society has found an adequate substitute for the family to assume the all-important responsibility of rearing children.

History demonstrates that there has never been a nation that became great or survived without healthy attitudes and policies toward the institution of the family. The mandate in our Constitution "to promote the general welfare" includes a governmental responsibility to ensure that the integrity of the institution of the family is not eroded by national policy, or by a total lack of national policy.

A simple review of statistics indicates that the family is now in a worse period of crisis than ever before in our Nation's history. The United States has the highest divorce rate in the world. The annual rate of divorce has increased 700 percent since 1900. Roughly one out of every two marriages now ends in divorce. Divorce shatters families and the individuals composing them, and creates untold misery and unhappiness for innumerable husbands, wives, children, grandparents, and other distressed family members.

In spite of the high levels of marital dissolution, researchers have discovered that, according to social indicator studies, most people, regardless of social, demographic, or economic status, want to be married, and rank a happy, stable family situation, including marriage, among their highest aspirations.

Yet family instability continues to increase. According to one estimate, single-parent families are forming at 20 times the rate of two-parent families. One result of that unfortunate trend is that more and more children go without attention from a parent during the day, as growing numbers of single mothers are forced into the work force to provide for children without help from a husband.

According to information provided by the Census Bureau, the number of families headed by women increased by 84 percent between 1970 and 1985. During that same period, the increase in married couple families has only been 13 percent. That represents an enormously disproportionate increase in families headed by women. Of that number two-thirds of the female-headed families involve single-parent situations. Most of that increase is because of separation or divorce.

The number of children living with only one parent has more than doubled since 1960. In 1977, Census Bureau experts estimated that 45 percent of all children born then would live in a single-parent home at some time before reaching age 18. Today, that figure has risen so that, according to one estimate, 60 percent of all children born in 1985 will spend a meaningful portion of their lives in a single-parent situation before they reach the age of 18. Experts predict that approximately 40 percent of the young women who are currently in their late twenties today will be a single parent at some time in their lives.

The formation of families and the successful rearing of children have become more difficult than ever before. As healthy parental influence has diminished, we have seen the results in rising rates of juvenile problems. We see great confusion among our young people about the direction and purpose in their lives, which is reflected in alarming statistics, provided by the October 1985 report from the Business Advisory Commission of the Education Commission of the States:

Teenage pregnancy and childbirth rates have grown for all teens, regardless of ethnicity and socioeconomic status. More than 1 million teens become pregnant each year. Most of those teenagers do not marry.

Arrests of people under age 18 for drug abuse increased sixty-fold between 1960 and 1980. Arrests for drunkenness among high school seniors rose by 300 percent between 1960 and 1980.

The homicide rate for nonwhite teens increased 16 percent between 1950 and 1978, while the rate for white teens increased an astounding 232 percent.

Young people under age 21 account for more than half of all arrests for serious crimes. In 1960, 18 to 24 year olds accounted for only 18 percent of all arrests; by 1980, they accounted for 34 percent.

On April 23, 1985, the Subcommittee on Juvenile Justice held a hearing on the serious problem of juvenile arson. According to statistics provided by the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the number of arrests for arson for 1983 was estimated at 19,800 for 84,700 offenses. Thirty-eight percent of those arrested were under 18 years of age, and 62 percent were under 25. The statistics may actually underestimate the problem of juvenile arson, since it is believed that only a small percentage of the fires set by juveniles are actually reported.

Statistics indicate the existence of other areas of concern. The problem of runaway children is reaching epidemic proportions. Current estimates place the number of homeless youths at 1.3 to 2 million each year, but it may be as high as 4 million. There are many parents and families who do not take their responsibilities and rights seriously.

Members of the Senate Caucus on the Family were privileged to hear Father Bruce Ritter, a Franciscan priest and executive director of Covenant House in New York, speak about the problem of broken families and homeless children. Father Ritter has made his life's ministry of aiding children who come from troubled homes and troubling situations to become victims of the sex industry around the Times Square area of New York. The majority of the children are not runaways. They are throwaway children with literally no place else to go.

Those children are a dramatic reminder of what can come when materialism and hedonism win out over the fundamental values of love and respect for others. We cannot downgrade the responsibility of adults, both mothers and fathers, for the caring for and raising of their children. We need leadership from many segments of society, from both the public and private sectors, to see that families are competent and that they remain willing to fulfill their responsibilities for nurturing our Nation's children.

The lack of nurturing can have tragic consequences. According to reports, a teenager commits suicide every 90 minutes. In my capacity as a member of the Judiciary Subcommittee on Juvenile Justice, I participated in hearings on youth suicide during the 98th and 99th Congresses. According to the American Psychiatric Association, the incidence of suicide among young people aged 15 to 24 has risen by 300 percent during the last 30 years. Specifically, the rate climbed from 4.1 per 100,000 in the 1950's to 12.5 per 100,000 in 1980. A National Conference on Youth Suicide was held in June 1985 with the stated objectives of increasing national awareness and encouraging expanded, community-based strategies for addressing the problem. The Youth Suicide National Center and the Office of Human Development Services of the Department of Health and Human Services, through an excellent example of a private/public partnership, produced an outstanding conference report. Yet, we have only begun to scratch the surface of the problem.

Family instability has economic as well as social implications. It is substantially associated with the impoverishment of children. Nearly one-quarter of the children in the United States today live in poverty as measured by the Census Bureau. The poverty rate for children, particularly for young children under age 6, is far higher than that for any other age group. According to estimates, one-third of all children now being born in the United States may expect to be on public assistance before reaching age 18.

The problem is a sensitive and complex one. Through a combination of factors, which include lack of parental involvement and negative role models irresponsibly promoted by television, movies, popular songs, magazines, media personalities, and other influential sources, our society is failing to encourage the responsible restraint and self-discipline among our young people that alone will enable them to assume the responsibilities for parenthood and the formation of lasting family bonds. Far too many young people are not making a successful transition to productive adult lives. That is a matter of concern, particularly because, as one report on the subject so aptly concluded, youth are the key to our country's economic prosperity and social development.

Mr. President, the family is the key to our country's future, just as it was to our development in the past. We must carefully evaluate the myriad of Federal policies and programs that apply to everything from social and welfare issues to economic policy and that may directly or indirectly erode the foundation of the traditional family.

We must see to it that Federal policy appropriately supports and promotes the stability and health of the traditional family unit and does not weaken it or attempt to replace it. We must see to it that our national leaders do not ignore the inherent strengths of the family, but rather, act to enhance them.

Mr. President, I hope that my colleagues will join in supporting the proposal to form a permanent Special Committee on Families, Youth, and Children. Through careful planning and good stewardship, the overall cost of the special committee could be relatively low. The price of doing nothing is very high.

This could become the Congress that pays more than lipservice to the needs and aspirations of America's families. The special committee could provide the impelling force toward a more coherent and cohesive set of Federal family policies.

The breakdown of the traditional family unit is one of the Nation's most serious crisis, for family instability and deteriorating family relationships are destructive to the physical and mental health and economic well-being of men, women, and children. Curing that epidemic would be profitable to the people involved and to the Nation as a whole. As one commentator concluded: "Short of a world war, it is hard to imagine anything more wasteful of people and money than the current destruction of so many of our families."

The long-term nature of the problems involved, and the critical importance of maintaining and strengthening family structure over the long term, mandates that a permanent vehicle be established in the Senate to accomplish these essential tasks.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I rise today to join with my colleagues, Senators DENTON and MATHIAS, in introducing legislations to establish a Senate Special Committee on Families, Youth, and Children. This proposal is cosponsored by several of my colleagues, Senators HATCH, BENTSEN, GRASSLEY, HOLLINGS, DURENBERGER, INOUYE, SPECTER, and HEFLIN.

The idea to create such a special committee is not new to the Congress. A similar committee has been operating, quite effectively so, in the House for 3 years now, providing that body and its Members with valuable research and analysis of all matters pertaining to American families and children. Like the House committee, the Senate special committee which we propose would have no legislative jurisdiction. It would function more as an oversight committee, studying and evaluating the entire range of problems and Government policies that affect families and children.

In April of last year, I had the honor of delivering the Harvard University Godkin Lectures. The subject I chose: family policy. Nearly 20 years ago, in an introduction to a paperback edition of Alva Myrdal, "Nation and Family," I wrote:

> In the nature of modern industrial society no government, however firm might be its wish, can avoid having policies that profoundly influence family relationships. This is not to be avoided. The only option is whether these will be purposeful, intended policies or whether they will be residual, derivative in a sense, concealed ones.

This proposition was clear then as now.

The Senate needs an official focal point for these important matters. Family policy is no one's business at present. The assertion that it ought not be anyone's business is easily enough defeated in a fair-minded argument. That is, by noting that the policy is at present implicit and that the only question is whether it is to be avowed. As my able colleague, Senator CHARLES MCC. MATHIAS, Jr., has aptly pointed out, "Just about every social, economic and ideological unit in the country has a lobby and a respondent government policy—except our most basic unit, the family."

In the Senate, responsibility for the legislative issues pertaining to American families and children has long been splintered among several different standing committees and subcommittees. Only the separate caucus on children and the caucus on families, led so ably by Senators DODD, SPECTER, DENTON, and DECONCINI, have proved forums to air and consider these matters. But the time has come for the Senate to give these critical issues the visibility, attention, and resources which only official committee status can provide. The Senate has found it proper and necessary to create a Special Committee on Aging, established in 1961, and for this year has granted it an annual operating budget of $1.2 million. Surely, children deserve no less.

President Theodore Roosevelt created one of the first official forums expressly to explore the problems of children in 1909, when he assembled a special White House Conference on the Care of Dependent Children. Three years later, the Federal Government acting on the recommendation of that conference, established the Children's Bureau in the Department of the Interior. The Bureau was given the charge to "report upon all matters pertaining to the welfare of children and child life," which in those early days included:

> The questions of infant mortality, the birth rate, physical degeneracy, orphanage, juvenile delinquency and juvenile courts, desertion and illegitimacy, dangerous occupations, accidents and diseases of children of the working classes, employment * * * and such other facts as have a bearing upon the health, efficiency, character, and training of children.

Real progress has been achieved in addressing many of these problems over the past 74 years, but many of them—particularly those related to proverty and family disintegration—have actually intensified. It is chilling to note that over 21 percent of our Nation's children, some 13.3 million, now live below the poverty line—a poverty rate higher today than in 1965. Earlier in this decade, with the help of a range of institutions, I was able to show that fully one-third of all American children born in 1980 would likely be on welfare (AFDC) before reaching age 18.

In contrast—and perhaps owing to the early work of the Senate Special Committee on Aging—poverty among elderly Americans has virtually disappeared. Unhappily, children have taken their place as the poorest age group in our society. Poverty among the very young in 1984 was seven times greater than that for the old. Taking into account the value of noncash benefits, elderly poverty in 1984 was about 2.6 percent, compared to 17.5 percent for children under age 6. The United States today is probably the first society in history in which children are distinctly worse off than adults.

There are large numbers of poor persons in the United States, and they are disproportionately young: nearly 40 percent of our Nation's poor are children. The age bias of our poverty problem is illustrated by the following poverty rates for 1984: 24 percent among children under age 6; 20.3 percent among children aged 6–17; 12.4 percent among persons aged 65 and over; and 11.7 percent among adults under age 65.

The elevated poverty rates among children are directly related to astonishing changes that have taken place in the American family structure. In his 1984 Presidential address to the Population Association of America, University of Pennsylvania professor Samuel H. Preston spoke of "the earthquake that shuddered through the American family in the past 20 years." Put simply, poverty has become inextricably associated with family structure. Year-to-year increases in poverty rates of children have been linked to a range of economic factors, including the rapid inflation of 1979–80 and the serious recessions of 1980 and 1981–82. But over the last two decades, rising poverty among children has been principally associated with one particular change in family structure, the rise in female-headed households. Last year, for the first time, there were more female-headed families (3.5 million) than married-couple families in poverty. More than half (54 percent) of all children living in female-headed families are poor; two-thirds of black children in female-headed families are poor and three-fourths of children of Spanish-origin in such families are poor. The link between poverty and the rise in female-headed homes is documented by estimates from the Congressional Research Service. If the proportion of children in female-headed households had not increased over the past 25 years, there could have been 3 million fewer children in poverty in 1983.

A Census Bureau report released last summer indicates that single-parent families with children now account for more than one-quarter of all family groups, almost double the 1970 proportion of 13 percent. Careful work done by demographers Arthur Norton and Paul Glick has enabled them to forcast that 60 percent of all children born in 1984 can expect to live in a one-parent family before reaching age 18. Even more disturbing, analysis by Mary Jo Bane and David Ellwood in "The Dynamics of Children's Living Arrangements" indicates that by 1994, 87 percent of all black youth and 46 percent of all white youth under age 18 will have spent some part of their childhoods in a single-parent family.

Mr. President, I do not claim that a Special Committee on Families, Youth, and Children will solve these problems, but it will help us better understand them. We arrange ourselves here in the Senate with respect to subjects; only in the rarest of circumstances do we define objects, in this case children and families, as the pertinent unit. Our experience in the Senate gives perhaps the best example of how the traditional way of looking at children and families as a subject conceals important trends we ought to have discerned much earlier. Establishment of a Special Committee on Families, Youth, and Children will undoubtedly help us in this process. Let's try.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

RIGHT TO COUNSEL

● Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, I have been deeply concerned by this administration's efforts to undermine the right of all citizens to the effective assistance of counsel, which is guaranteed by the sixth amendment to the Constitution. This is a problem of concern not only to the legal community, but to all Americans who value our constitutional protections.

I recently delivered the keynote address at a national conference held at Harvard Law School, focusing on this important issue. I ask permission that the text of my remarks be printed in the RECORD.

The text follows:

SENATOR JOHN KERRY: KEYNOTE ADDRESS, CONFERENCE ON DEFENDING THE RIGHT TO COUNSEL

I am delighted to be here today. As a former prosecutor and former criminal defense lawyer, it is a pleasure to be able to participate in this forum with a group of such distinguished colleagues.

The topic of this conference, defending the right to counsel, is both timely and important. I am reminded of William Shakespeare's play, Henry VI, Part II, in which he has one of the villains boast that when the rebellion succeeds, "The first thing we do, let's kill all the lawyers." Some people think that is what the Reagan administration is trying to do today. Perhaps it would be worth remembering that in the Shakespeare play, the idea of killing the lawyers was suggested as a means of producing anarchy, not as a way of solving society's problems.

However, to paraphrase another quote from Shakespeare, I come here to praise lawyers, not to bury them. I come to praise all of you for the efforts that you are making to defend the right to counsel, and to pledge my support and solidarity with those efforts.

Unfortunately, not everyone in the current administration agrees with this point of view. Today, the right to "effective assistance of counsel", guaranteed by the sixth amendment to the Constitution, is under attack as never before. Examples of these attacks are all around us, and all of you are familiar with them. The weapons used in these assaults on the right to counsel include subpoenas issued to lawyers which order them to provide testimony and documents containing incriminating evidence against their clients to the grand jury. They include search warrants permitting Government officials to raid attorney files in the search for incriminating evidence against their clients. We have seen the use of spies and electronic surveillance to discover the contents of attorney-client meetings and conversations. The Justice Department has used the recently enacted criminal forfeiture statute to seize attorney's fees. And, most dangerous of all, this administration has begun to prosecute attorneys for nothing more than the vigorous defense of their clients.

These pernicious tactics serve several objectives of this administration. One of the principal objectives is the destruction of the attorney-client privilege, which is the oldest privilege at common law. They have attempted to undermine the confidentiality of attorney-client conversations and correspondence. These tactics had the effect of creating a "chilling effect" on client disclosures to lawyers, and of turning lawyer and client against each other by creating conflicts within the attorney-client relationship; and directly threatening attorneys with the deprivation of their livelihood, or even with jail.

If there are those who believe that these are only idle threats, consider the case of a courageous Boston attorney, Barry Wilson. Mr. Wilson, a member in good standing of the Massachusetts and Boston Bar Associations, spent approximately 4 months of last year in the Federal Correctional Institution in Danbury, CT. His crime? Vigorous defense of his client, and of his client's sixth amendment right to counsel.

Actually, Mr. Wilson was never convicted of any crime. He was sent to jail for refusing to answer the questions of a Federal grand jury in Rhode Island that was investigating his client's alleged role in a drug-smuggling operation. The U.S. attorney for Rhode Island claimed that the communications between Mr. Wilson and his client came under the so-called crime-fraud exception and therefore were not privileged. Mr. Wilson argued that to disclose confidential attorney-client communications would violate his client's constitutional rights, and the attorney-client privilege. It would also have had the not-so-incidental effect of destroying Mr. Wilson's ability to earn a living as a criminal defense lawyer. It seems that the Justice Department has systematically singled out the most effective criminal defense attorneys for special attention in this regard.

Barry Wilson had the courage of his convictions, and was willing to go to jail for them. But his example serves as a chilling reminder to the legal community of what can happen when the power of the Justice Department is not held in check.

These assaults on the criminal defense bar are just part of the broader background of this Justice Department under the Reagan administration. They are part of a larger disrespect for the very process of law contained in the Constitution, and dating back to the English common law. This administration has attacked the very foundations of the attorney-client privilege. Three hundred years of law have developed the importance of this privilege. Countless law review articles have been written about it, and the Supreme Court has affirmed its importance many times. But under "Reagan justice", this privilege has begun to erode.

In the name of fighting crime, this administration has placed the Constitution in a secondary position. The short-term rewards of this strategy are tempting, but the long-term implications are enormously destructive.

The basic dilemma inherent in this debate was stated succinctly by senior circuit judge David L. Bazelon in a law review article in 1981, entitled: "The Morality of the Criminal Law". Judge Bazelon, focusing on the Reagan Administration's efforts to combat crime by eroding the protections of the fourth, fifth, and sixth amendments, posed the question: "Must we compromise the most basic values of our democratic society in our desperation to fight crime?" His answer, and mine, is no.

As Judge Elbert Tuttle has written: "The only way the law has progressed from the days of the rack, the screw, and the wheel is the development of moral concepts." These moral concepts include the right to effective assistance of counsel, and the protection of the attorney-client privilege.

Under our judicial system, accused persons are guaranteed the right to have counsel, because this is a right upon which all other rights in the Bill or Rights depend. It would be fundamentally inconsistent with the sixth amendment if the Government could convert this basic right into a legal minefield which, instead of protecting the client, would become the source of his destruction. Surely this was not the intent of the framers of the Constitution.

In the past 5 years, since President Reagan took office, there have been an enormous number of cases reported around the country where prosecutors were seeking information from lawyers about their clients. Attorneys who have researched this issue have found that 10 years ago, there were very few of these type of cases reported; 15 years ago, they could be counted on the fingers of one hand. But today, they are becoming commonplace.

There is a movement by the Government today to go to attorneys as one of the first sources of information about their clients, instead of the last. After all, attorneys are an easy mark. They are bound by ethical standards, compelled to tell the truth, and they know a lot.

The Reagan Justice Department quickly realized that attorneys were a valuable source of information about their clients. And the administration has been very clever in starting their erosion of the attorney-client privilege by trying to get information on client fees. Fees, after all, are a discrete corner of the privilege. Some may ask, "What is the harm in requiring an attorney to report information about fees paid by clients? Couldn't this information be useful to law enforcement officials in detecting criminal activity?" But the answer is not so simple. Perhaps there are times when it is appropriate to require reporting of information about fees. But where do you draw the line? As all of you know, it is not so easy to draw a "bright line" between protected and unprotected information.

In some cases, information about clients' fees may tend to incriminate the client. But the client has a right to believe that his interests and the attorney's are one and the same for the purposes of representation. That client should not be forced to choose between his rights under the fifth amendment, or his right to counsel under the sixth amendment. He should not have to choose between giving up his attorney, or his right against self-incrimination.

And once we start down this slippery slope, where do we stop? When we start allowing our constitutional protections and common-law traditions to erode, it is difficult to see where that process will end.

I fear that what we have seen so far is only the tip of the iceberg. As many of you know, the U.S. Attorney for Massachusetts has recently filed suit to enjoin a rule promulgated by the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts which would protect attorneys against arbitrary subpoenas to a grand jury without prior judicial approval. In the course of that proceeding, the U.S. attorney filed an affidavit indicating that, last year, he filed 50 subpoenas to attorneys. Of these, only three were challenged by motions to quash, and only these three received judicial attention. What this may indicate is that many attorneys are succumbing to this form of intimidation, and are not vigorously protecting their clients' confidences.

In fact, these subpoenas and other forms of intimidation have a profound effect on how attorneys must think when they represent a client. An attorney must ask himself or herself, "Am I protecting myself?" instead of focusing on the interests of the client. The time, energy, attention, and resources of the attorney are diverted from the representation of the client to self-protection by the attorney, to the detriment of both attorney and client.

Some of the courts have also contributed to this process or erosion. In a recent case here in the first circuit, United States v. King, a Government agent working for the FBI was planted in the courtroom with a hidden microphone, which he actually placed between the defense attorney and his client. He also took a bugging device into the courthouse lockup to record conversations between the attorney and his client.

The court ruled that the attorney had not shown any concrete evidence of prejudice to his case as a result of these actions, and said that the law would not provide a remedy unless such a showing was made. This ruling in effect gives the green light to prosecutors to engage in wiretapping and bugging of opposing counsel. For the U.S. Government to employ these kind of tactics brings to mind an earlier chapter in our history, one that many of us hoped had been permanently closed—the era of Richard Nixon, John Mitchell, and Watergate.

At present, these tactics have been employed primarily against attorneys in cases involving drugs, organized crime, or politically unpopular defendants. But it appears that prosecutors are now coming to view buggings, informants, subpoenas, free seizures, and jail sentences as weapons in their arsenal to be used against any attorney who has the temerity to represent a defendant in a ciminal case. These tactics are more reminiscent of those used against defense lawyers in certain totalitarian countries, than anything in the American tradition.

More than 170 years after the adoption of the sixth amendment, the Supreme Court's landmark decision in Gideon v. Wainwright breathed life into the right to counsel by assuring representation for indigents in State trials. The Gideon decision in 1963 was a great step forward toward the goal of equal justice for all in America. But today, under "Reagan Justice", we are seeing steps in the other direction.

Criminal defense attorney John Wall, a former Federal prosecutor, has commented that "for 200 years in this country we have made some judgments. You get 'em fair. You don't use the rack to get confessions, you don't call a priest to testify against a penitent, and you don't call lawyers to testify against their clients."

But the Reagan administration is trying to change the rules. They have demonstrated in many ways their disregard for the traditions of an independent judiciary, a strong private bar, and for the role of Government in assuring equal rights for all Americans. They have even tried redefine the meaning of the Constitution of the United States.

Recently, Attorney General Edwin Meese called for a jurisprudence of "original intention". What Mr. Meese meant by this, apparently, was the judges and Supreme Court Justices should decide constitutional questions on the basis of the "original intention" of the Founding Fathers, rather than on the basis of their own view and opinions. On the face of it, this is a proposition to which no one could object. But like so many of the pronouncements emanating from this administration, this one contains more that a small element of "doublespeak".

The truth is, as historian Henry Steele Commager has pointed out, that the Founding Fathers were wise enough to realize that they could not foresee every eventuality, and were farsighted enough to couch their intentions in terms which would be open to future interpretation. The Founding Fathers understood that it would be impossible to foresee all of the possible contingencies that might arise in the future, and, in their wisdom, they wrote in general terms which would give guidance to future generations of lawmakers without shackling them to the 18th century.

For an Attorney General today to presume that he understands the "original intention" of the Founding Fathers better than the generations of lawmakers, Justices, and constitutional scholars who have come before him is indeed, as Justice William Brennan put it, "Arrogance cloaked as humility".

It does not require a great constitutional scholar, though, to discern the "original intention" behind such phrases as "equal justice under law", "effective assistance of counsel", or "liberty and justice for all". Surely these eloquent phrases speak for themselves. If they mean anything, they must mean that all of our citizens must have equal access to our system of justice.

This administration has repeatedly tried to deny that access by denying the right to counsel to those who are weak or politically unpopular. One means by which they have tried to achieve this objective is by attempting to eliminate the Legal Services Corporation. They have repeatedly proposed to eliminate all funding for that organization. Failing that, they have appointed members to the Board of LSC who have advocated crippling cuts and major changes in the services provided, which would seriously damage the ability of LSC to provide legal services to the poor.

They have also adopted a new tactic—conducting raids on legal aid offices around the country. These raids have included wholesale rifling of confidential files, resulting in violations of the attorney-client privilege. They are very similar, in fact, to some of the raids which have been conducted against criminal defense attorneys.

The purpose of the raids on legal aid offices is ostensibly to conduct "audits" and "monitoring" of legal aid lawyers. But the real purpose of these raids is the same as the purpose behind the harassment tactics directed at the criminal defense bar. That purpose is intimidation, and destruction of the attorney-client relationship.

This administration has attempted to stack the deck in their favor in many ways. Perhaps the most insidious are their attempts to hand-pick a Federal judiciary which will guarantee, in advance, the results which Mr. Meese and company wish to achieve.

I have been deeply concerned by this administration's approach to judicial nominations. President Reagan seems to be determined to leave as his legacy a judiciary composed of Federal judges who share his conservative views. But what kind of legacy will it be? In his first 5 years, President Reagan made 224 appointments to the Federal Judiciary. Of these, only 13 were members of minority groups, and only 19 were women. By contrast, President Carter appointed 40 women, and 55 minority judges, during his 4 years in office, out of a total of 258 appointments. The fact is, President Reagan's record on judicial appointments is a disgrace.

Throughout two centuries, our Federal judiciary has been a model institution, one which has insisted on the highest standards of conduct by our public servants and officials, and which has survived with undiminished respect.

Today, I fear that this institution is threatened in a way that we have not seen before. The threat endangers the fundamental integrity of our judiciary, and thus the quality of our entire system of justice. It risks undermining the respect that we have always maintained for our judiciary, and even the balance of powers as set forth in our Constitution.

This threat is that of the appointment of a judiciary which is not independent, but narrowly ideological, through the systematic targeting of any judicial nominee who does not meet the rigid requirements of litmus tests imposed by the far right.

We are seeing attempts to prejudice justice itself through the exclusion of any candidate for a judgeship in the Federal courts who does not commit himself or herself to the narrow political beliefs of the right wing of one of our Nation's two political parties. I am sorry to note that there are some of my colleagues in the U.S. Senate who have been at the forefront of this effort to mold the judiciary. I am even sorrier to note that their efforts are supported by the Attorney General, and the President of the United States.

Our judiciary is too important to permit anyone to compromise its independence or integrity, yet that could well be the result of these current efforts. In my view, the advice-and-consent role of the U.S. Senate is too important to be abdicated. We need to pay closer attention to judicial nominees from here on. If it takes more time, it takes more time. But it will be time well spent. This Nation cannot afford to give a blank check to the extremists of one party, to hand over to them the ability to shape the nature of our judiciary well into the next century.

Fortunately for all of us, there are still some voices of reason and restraint to give us guidance on these difficult issues. And, as usual, the State of Massachusetts is leading the rest of the Nation in progressive thought. As I mentioned earlier, the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts has recently promulgated a rule which requires prior judicial approval before a prosecutor can issue a subpoena against a lawyer for information about a client. This rule is a direct response to the abuses of the Reagan-Meese Justice Department. And needless to say, the Justice Department has filed suit to try to enjoin the Massachusetts rule, and prevent it from becoming a model for other jurisdictions.

But other States would do well to emulate the example of Massachusetts. The American Bar Association has now recommended the adoption on a national basis of a rule like the one first adopted by the Massachusetts bar.

Under the new rule in Massachusetts, all prosecutors would be required to obtain a ruling from a judge indicating that the information they seek is not privileged and is necessary to the investigation. In Massachusetts, issuing a subpoena to a lawyer without prior judicial approval is now officially what it is in fact—an unethical practice.

Let me emphasize that this rule is not an impediment to aggressive, effective prosecution. But it does prevent the abuse of subpoena power by the prosecution.

It might be appropriate at this point for me to mention that I was once a prosecutor in Massachusetts myself. For several years, I was the first assistant district attorney of Middlesex County, the largest county in Massachusetts. I was in charge of the administration of the district attorney's office, and I am very proud of what we were able to achieve. I led an investigation and successful prosecution of organized crime in Massachusetts. We also started a rape counseling program, a victim-witness assistance program, an organized crime unit, and a white-collar crime unit. And we were able to dramatically cut down on the backlog of criminal cases.

As a prosecutor, I won my share of cases, and I put my share of criminals behind bars. But I did it fairly. I played by the rules. I didn't find it necessary to wiretap the defense counsel, to subpoena opposing counsel and try to turn them into government informants against their clients, or to seize their hard-earned legal fees. I didn't find it necessary to throw an opposing lawyer in jail in order to win a case against his client. We never even considered those kind of underhanded tactics. And let me add that we were able to fight crime effectively without using those kind of tactics.

I've also seen it from the other side, as a criminal defense lawyer. When I was in private practice, I once represented a man who had been wrongly charged with murder, and was able to get him freed. I know from first-hand experience what Attorney General Meese does not—that not all those accused of crimes are in fact guilty of committing those crimes. When I was a criminal defense lawyer, I fought just as hard for my clients as I fought to get convictions when I was a prosecutor. That's what our adversary system of justice is all about—each side vigorously represents their client to the best of their abilities.

Because I've seen it from both sides, I think I understand the nature of our adversary system. And I know, as you do, that the greatest danger to our system of justice is to change the rules, as this administration is trying to do—to stack the deck in favor of one side and against the other. That's not justice, and that's not the American way.

At the same time, let me make it clear that I am in no way defending those lawyers who do cross over the line and knowingly become involved in criminal activities. I am not naive enough to think that there are not some lawyers who will turn a blind eye to their clients' involvement in drug deals, or organized crime. Some may even be actively involved in criminal conspiracies. I am not an apologist for those lawyers, nor should you be. Perhaps there are times when we should require lawyers to disclose the sources of their fees, when there is strong indication that criminal activity is involved. I am an advocate of strong and effective action against crime. And I think we need to recognize that the American public feels the same way.

Part of the reason why the public supports President Reagan is that they perceive him as being tough on crime. There is a feeling that courts have been more concerned with the rights of criminals than with the rights of victims. We need to change that. We need to take tough action against street crime, organized crime, and white-collar crime. But we also need to preserve our constitutional protections against those who would do away with them in the name of fighting crime. The American people elected Ronald Reagan, but they did not give him a mandate to make Clint Eastwood the Attorney General, or to appoint Rambo to the Supreme Court.

There is no doubt that, under this administration, the right to effective assistance of counsel is endangered in a way that we have not seen before. And with it, our adversary system of justice is in jeopardy. It may be that this is a problem which needs to be addressed by Federal legislation. The House Judiciary Committee has already held hearings on fee forfeitures and related issues, and the Senate Judiciary Committee will follow in the near future. While I am not a member of the Senate Judiciary Committee, I will follow those hearings with great personal interest. As a former prosecutor and criminal defense lawyer, I will ask the chairman of the committee for permission to testify personally before the Judiciary Committee about the threat to the right to counsel, and to the adversary system itself, which is being created by this administration's efforts. And if those hearings show a need for legislation on the Federal level, let me assure you that I will be the first to introduce it, and to fight for it.

As a U.S. Senator, I intend to continue to stand up for the individual civil liberties, for the right to counsel and for the constitutional rights of all Americans. I will continue to fight for an independent judiciary, and for a strong and independent private bar. I am going to fight for these things because I care deeply about these issues. I have been out there in the trenches with all of you. I have seen the criminal justice system from both sides, and I know how it's supposed to work. And that's the way I want to see it work—with full, fair, and vigorous adovcacy, on both sides.

Ultimately, it comes down to all of use. Men and women of conscience, like yourselves, have an obligation to fight for the things that we believe in. If we want the system to work, we have to make it work. Each and every one of us has a role to play in that struggle. And if at times we get discouraged, and feel that we are fighting against the odds, we would do well to recall the words of a great American jurist, Judge Learned Hand:

"Liberty lies in the hearts of men and women. When it dies there, no constitution, no law, no court can save it."

Thank you.●

SENATOR D'AMATO ATTACKS PIRATING OF INTELLECTUAL PROPERTY

● Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, last year, the International Trade Commission reported that the international theft of certain U.S. property rights cost U.S. companies and individuals approximately $8 billion. As shocking as this is, it is all the more reprehensible that most of this piracy takes place in countries that have tremendous trade surpluses with the United States—both on account of a surge in their exports to our shores and their efforts to keep their markets artificially closed to U.S. goods.

The property rights at issue are called intellectual property rights—specifically, copyrights. Books, records, tapes, and computer programs expropriating without fear of punishment by their own governments.

Indeed, it was revealed recently that even the Africa famine relief record "We Are the World" had been illegally reproduced in the Far East and sold—depriving starving people in Africa the fruits of the charitable efforts of American musicians.

Mr. President, the Senator from New York [Mr. D'AMATO] has been a leader in the fight to bring attention to the theft of U.S. copyrighted materials, as well as other forms of intellectual property such as trademarks and patents. Recently, the New York Times printed an article by the Senator that highlights but a few of the negative effects caused by this piracy, and I believe that it would be of great benefit for our colleagues to review his comments. I therefore ask that a copy of the article by the Senator from New York be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

ENOUGH PIRATING OF U.S. GOODS

(By Alfonse M. D'Amato)

WASHINGTON.—Pirates are seizing the United States' intellectual property. They are undermining our capacity to market our creativity. If they are not stopped, America's dwindling edge in the realm of intellectual property will be wholly lost. This would spell the nation's demise as a global economic power.

The nation's hard-won technological lead in some fields is threatened by European, Japanese and advanced third world companies whose practices weaken our patent, copyright and trademark laws. These laws provide the legal framework for protection of intellectual property—inventions such as recorded music and biotechnology.

Copyright constitute an especially significant aspect of intellectual property. More than 5 percent of our gross national product derives from the production and distribution of copyrighted works domestically and internationally. In 1985, these activities contributed an estimated $170 billion to the G.N.P.

According to the United States International Trade Commission, our trading partners have illegally reproduced and are marketing about $8 billion worth of copyrighted works. This unauthorized duplication of someone else's creative work includes books, musical recordings, video cassettes and computer programs.

If that's not bad enough, pirates undersell American competitors, because they bear no creative costs and pay no royalties. They simply appropriate proceeds that rightfully belong to creators of products.

In one of the most egregious examples of pirating, Japan exports to this country optical wave guide fibers that were made from our own technology! This directly results from unauthorized use of a patented process developed by an American company.

Every year, our phonograph record industry suffers huge losses of revenue as a result of counterfeit tapes and records illegally manufactured and sold here and abroad. In northern and western Europe, such practices account for about $55 million in lost sales each year.

Every year, pirates sell abroad nearly $1 billion in English language books, the vast majority of which are published here. This represents a substantial sales loss to publishers.

A number of advanced developing countries—notably South Korea, Taiwan, Argentina and Yugoslavia—do not provide adequate patent protection for the products of American pharmaceutical companies. The result: Producers in these countries flood the home and international markets with low priced, pirated drugs at the expense of firms that have invested billions of dollars in developing and marketing them.

These obvious infringements of copyright laws represent only the tip of the iceberg. There are numerous less-visible infringements—computer software, for example. Inadequate international copyright-protection laws enable foreign copyright violators to steal America's market share in this vital economic sector.

Even when such unsavory practices are absent, arbitrary and time-consuming application procedures in a number of countries make it difficult, if not impossible, for United States producers to market their inventions overseas.

Take the recent case of Standard Oil of Ohio which, after nearly 10 years of trying, only recently received permission from the Japanese to market its structural ceramic products in their country. Even this small, long-delayed victory was due only to revelations about Japanese attempts to frustrate the application that came out at a Congressional hearing in Binghamton, N.Y., and a later meeting with a high-ranking Federal trade negotiator.

America's negotiators at the trade talks in Geneva in September (for which preparations begin next week) must put the intellectual-property issue at the top of the agenda. We must make it clear we expect all countries to respect our intellectual-property laws and that they should convey the message to all companies pirating our products. What is needed is a new code against counterfeiting that would require international controls. Failing that, America should seriously re-examine trade relations with countries, especially in Southeast Asia, that enjoy preferential access to our marketplace.●

APPROPRIATIONS STATUS REPORT

● Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, just prior to the adjournment of the first session of the 99th Congress, the Congress completed action on the fiscal year 1986 continuing appropriations resolution. I placed in the RECORD at that time the preliminary scoring of the continuing resolution and its relationship to the congressional budget, the President's budget request, and the House- and Senate-passed bills. Today, I ask that a table showing the final scoring of the fiscal year 1986 continuing resolution (H.J. Res. 465 Public Law 99-190), and summary tables of Senate appropriations and congressional action to date, be placed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

Mr. President, the conference agreement on House Joint Resolution 465, further continuing appropriations for fiscal year 1986, provides $365 billion in budget authority and $214.9 billion in outlays for various Federal agencies. When outlays from prior-year budget authority and other actions completed, possible later requirements, and other adjustments are taken into account, the Senate Appropriations Committee is $11.2 billion in budget authority under and $1.1 billion in outlays over its overall 302(a) "crosswalk" allocation under the fiscal year 1986 budget resolution (S. Con. Res. 32). The summary table of fiscal year 1986 appropriations action to date displays the relationship of the 13 subcommittees to the Appropriations Committee's own 302(b) allocations.

Mr. President, a final summary table shows the current status of congressional actions for fiscal year 1986, including the final continuing resolution and possible later requirements, and the relationship of congressional action to date to the fiscal year 1986 budget resolution totals.

I hope that this status report will be of interest to my colleagues as the Senate proceeds with the business of the 99th Congress.

OSMA SPURLOCK, NOTED HOOSIER, RETIRES

● Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, I bring to the Senate's attention the retirement of a dedicated public official and noted Hoosier leader, Osma Spurlock, who since 1970 has provided outstanding direction and leadership as the only director that the Indianapolis district office of the U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission has had since it opened.

Osma Spurlock, widely known and respected in the State of Indiana as a staunch advocate and promoter of civil liberties, joined the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission as director of the newly created Indianapolis area office in 1970. The opening of the Indiana office resulted from the passage of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. As the newly created office caseload increased so did the scope of Ms. Spurlock's responsibilities and in 1973 her office was redesignated a district office.

Before coming to the EEOC, Spurlock served as deputy director of the Indiana Civil Rights Commission and as director of social services at the board of fundamental education in Indianapolis. She also was an associate professor of sociology at Indiana University-Purdue University at Indianapolis.

The recipient of a B.A. degree from Hunter College in New York City, and an M.A. degree in sociology from Atlanta University, Spurlock serves on a number of boards of community service organizations and has received several awards for her career work and civic involvement. For the past 3 consecutive years, she was commended by EEOC for outstanding performance in the Senior Executive Service. In 1984 she was honored as one of the "outstanding black women in Indiana" by the National Council of Negro Women.

It is indeed a great pleasure to recognize Osma Spurlock for her commitment to equal employment throughout her tenure as director of the Indianapolis district office of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission and to acknowledge her service to the community of Indianapolis, the State of Indiana, and our Nation.●

THE PRODUCT LIABILITY VOLUNTARY CLAIMS AND UNIFORM STANDARDS ACT

● Mrs. KASSEBAUM. Mr. President, I am pleased today to emphasize my support for fundamental reform of product liability law by cosponsoring S. 1999, the Product Liability Voluntary Claims and Uniform Standards Act. This bill was introduced by Senator DANFORTH on December 20 with the expectation that it would encourage further discussion about our product liability crisis.

I have long felt that our system of tort law, especially in the area of product liability, needed attention. We have become a truly interstate economy, with goods moving between and among the 50 States. In such an environment, traditional product liability law has become unduly burdensome for manufacturers and increasingly inefficient in compensating injured parties. The problem has aggravated the cyclical fluctuations in the property and casualty insurance industry, has deterred technological advancements in many fields, and has raised significantly the costs to consumers, businesses, and employees.

Mr. President, I share Senator DANFORTH's sentiments about S. 1999. This legislation is not the final word in product liability reform. It is open to amendment and modification. Discussions should and must continue among manufacturers, consumers, labor, and the legal profession. However, S. 1999 offers a realistic chance to legislate some sanity in our tort system.

I have watched the product liability debate closely over the past several years. I have seen the various proposals develop. We now have the opportunity to act on a proposal which I believe can be fair to all and which is a substantial improvement over existing laws. As a member of the Senate Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation, I intend to do what I can to ensure that we do not miss this opportunity.●

RETIREMENT OF ALEX NAIMON

● Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, I invite the attention of Senators to the retirement from Federal service on January 3, 1986, of Alex Naimon, one of my constituents, who has rendered distinguished service to four agencies of the Government over a period of more than 36 years, including 2 years of military service as an electronic technician in World War II. Mr. Naimon represents a remnant of a once grand tradition started by professor, later Supreme Court Justice, Felix Frankfurter at Harvard Law School [HLS], who turned down President Roosevelt's offer to be Solicitor General so that he could remain in a position to recommend many of his promising law students—nicknamed "happy hot dogs"—for positions in the New Deal administration. One such referral was of Paul Freund, who joined the Department of Justice, who when he returned to HLS as professor of law—now university professor—continued in Frankfurter's role. It was Professor Freund who referred and recommended Mr. Naimon for appointment in the Antitrust Division and in the Office of Price Stabilization [OPS], whose prompt offer was as promptly accepted.

Mr. Naimon's Government service started with 2 years as an electronic technician in the Navy in World War II. Helped greatly by the GI bill, which enabled him to consider postgraduate studies, he first got a master's degree in economics at Columbia University, and there inspired by his labor law professor, went on to get his J.D. degree from Harvard Law School.

At OPS, Mr. Naimon served as an attorney in the Rubber, Chemical, and Drugs Division.

When OPS was abolished in 1953 toward the end of the Korean war, Mr. Naimon accepted an appointment in the Office of the Surgeon General [OTSG], Army, where he worked for the next 17 years, and rose to be its highest ranking civilian attorney. Here, by giving legal assistance on personal legal problems to OTSG's more than 100 military officers as Legal Assistance Officer, he was able to develop relationships of trust with them, which in turn led to working out important OTSG matters on an interdisciplinary informal basis, particularly legislative positions. Among his proudest accomplishments, he conceptualized the Army's need for a high level body, in effect a little FDA; that is, the Army Investigational Drug Review Board [AIDRB], which could flexibly respond to the military's need for expedited but scientifically warranted time-limited approval to use an investigational drug worldwide.

In 1970, Mr. Naimon transferred to DHEW, where he served as both the Legislative Liaison Officer and the Regulations Officer for the National Center for Health Services Research.

From 1977 until his recent retirement, Mr. Naimon worked for the VA's Office of General Counsel, where his work, both legislative and legal, was largely in the medico-legal field.

Throughout his Government career, Mr. Naimon nurtured the ideal that Government service should equate with working in the public interest both in interpreting the law and in proposing changes to the law. He believed and asserted that lawyers in Government should be active in preserving the rule of law and our democratic form of government, as by emphasizing the public's right to know and participate in government actions in a democracy. He steadfastly adhered to a value system based on the sanctity of human life, respect for the rights of all individuals, including a qualified right of privacy, the right of all persons to be treated fairly by the Government, a concern that the Government receive fair value for its tax dollars, especially for its health expenditures, and a desire to help human beings seeking help.

Alex Naimon and his wife, Judith Sandberg Naimon, are proud of their three sons, Jon, David, and Jeffrey, who have respectively graduated from MIT, Princeton, and Yale, achievements made possible by Government educational loan programs, sympathetic financial aid programs of the mentioned schools, the students' own work efforts, together with Mr. Naimon's own contributions, made possible by his GI bill benefits.●

In addition, estimates are included of the direct spending effects for all entitlement or other programs requiring annual appropriations under current law even though the appropriations have not been made. The current levels excludes the revenue and direct spending effects of legislation that is in earlier stages of completion, such as reported from a Senate Committee or passed by the Senate. Thus, savings from reconciliation action assumed in Senate Concurrent Resolution 32 will not be included until Congress sends the legislation to the President for his approval. The current level of debt subject to limit reflects the latest U.S. Treasury information on public debt transactions.

COSPONSORSHIP OF S. 1920

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today in support of S. 1920, which would temporarily extend the Superfund taxing authority. This legislation is urgently needed to avoid a potentially disastrous slew of layoffs and canceled contracts which could set the Superfund Program back many months, or even years.

The Senate passed a $7.5 billion, 5-year reauthorization in September. The House of Representatives postponed approval of a package until mid-December, causing the delay of cleanups at 12 sites throughout New York State.

New York has the unenviable distinction of having the fourth highest number of Superfund sites in the Nation. My State can ill afford to wait any longer for the cleanup of these toxic sites. But, final approval of the House-Senate conference could take several months. In the meantime, each of the following sites is in jeopardy because sufficient funds have not yet been made available to continue cleanup efforts:

Sinclair Refinery: Wellsville, Allegheny County, $500,000.—This is a site just south of Wellsville, where waste materials were put in landfills by the Genessee River. EPA wants to take one of the landfills, dig it out, put it on top of the other, and cap them both. This would take about 1 year to design and 1 year to carry out. EPA, also wants to do an initial relocation of the water supply intake by moving it upstream to avoid contamination. This would take 6 to 8 months.

Wide Beach: Brant, Erie County, $500,000.—At one time, the dirt roads in the town of Brant were sprayed with PCB contaminated oil to make them less dusty. EPA wants to pick up the soil and use a chemical process to remove the PCB's. This probably would take about a year to design and 2 years to execute.

EPA wants to investigate the following sites. This process usually take from 15 to 18 months.

American Thermometer: South Cairo, Greene County, $800,000—This is a problem in South Cairo where trichloroethylene has contaminated the groundwater.

Hertel landfill: Plattekill, Ulster County, $800,000—This site covers 80 acres situated in the valley of a tributary to Black Creek and is surrounded by wetlands. This was a private landfill which accepted an "unkown quantity" of waste from 1963 to 1976. The Ulster County Department of Health revoked its permit for a variety of reasons. The State has found chromium in the groundwater in the area.

Johnstown city landfill: Johnstown, Fulton County, $800,000—This site accepted industrial waste from local tanneries until mid-1977. From 1973 to 1979, 20,000 cubic yards of sludge from the local sewage treatment plant were deposited. This sludge contained chromium, lead, and iron. Wells in the immediate area are contaiminated with heavy metals and the city of Johnstown well field can be used only on an auxiliary basis. The State is currently negotiating the closing of the landfill.

Port Washington landfill: Port Washington, Nassau County $1,300,000—This is located on the east coast of Port Washington. A landfill with an assortment of chemicals has been affecting the groundwater in the area.

Syosset landfill: Oyster Bay, Nassau County. $700,000,—This is a landfill which has affected the ground water in Oyster Bay on Long Island.

EPA wants to continue studies on the following:

Marathon Battery Corp.: Cold Springs, Putnam County, $200,000.—This is on the Hudson River in Cold Springs. Cadmium and nickle is affecting the wetlands and contaminating waterfowl.

North Sea Municipal landfill: North Sea, Suffolk County, $600,000.—This site is on the south fork of Long Island. The landfill presents a ground water problem.

York Oil Co.: Miora, Franklin County, $400,000.—This is north of Miora, which is 30 miles east of Massena. It is an old storage area for PCB contaminated oil and, over the years, the surface contamination has spread into Lawrence Brook and the nearby wetlands. Wildlife may be contaminated, and it could get into food chains.

Finally, EPA needs additional money to begin construction work on the following projects:

Love Canal: Niagara Falls, Niagara County, $1 million or more.—EPA gave the State $2 million for sewer and creek cleanup. However, the bids that came back indicated that this was at least $1 million under what it will actually cost. EPA is requesting the additional money.

Pollution abatement services: Oswego, Oswego County, $1 million or more.—EPA gave the State $2 million to put a wall around this site and to cap it, but the bids that came back indicated that this will need about $1 million more. EPA has requested the additional money.

Mr. President, this is a listing EPA has provided showing those projects and studies which can—and should—get underway immediately. Obviously there are other sites in my State in need of cleanup that cannot proceed if EPA is delayed in working on those sites it is ready to handle now.

I know that there has been concern that a temporary extension such as S. 1920 will take the pressure off the 5-year reauthorization. There is no question that most of us would prefer to have a 5-year bill right away. But let us be realistic. We are already seeing damage to the program due to the imminent threat of layoffs and canceled cleanups and studies, and we have already lost valuable time on the projects I mentioned earlier.

I urge my colleagues to join in cosponsoring S. 1920. Let us keep EPA and the Superfund Program at work.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at its next printing, I be added as, a cosponsor to S. 1920, a bill introduced by Senator LAUTENBERG.

Thank you, Mr. President.●

JOINT MEETING OF THE TWO HOUSES TO RECEIVE A MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the President of the Senate be authorized to appoint a committee on the part of the Senate to join with a like committee on the part of the House of Representatives to escort the President of the United States into the House Chamber for the joint session to be held Tuesday, February 4, 1986.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ELECTION IN THE PHILIPPINES

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, on behalf of myself and Mr. LAUTENBERG, I send a resolution to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the resolution by title.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A resolution (S. Res. 328) expressing the sense of the Senate on the importance of international observer delegations and NAMFREL during the February 7, 1986 election in the Republic of the Philippines.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be immediately considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the clerk read just commencing at the "Now, therefore" on the second page of the resolution starting at line 30.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

Now, therefore, be it resolved That the Senate hereby

(1) reaffirms its support for genuine, free, and fair elections in the Philippines scheduled for February 7, 1986;

(2) stresses the critical importance of NAMFREL in permitting the Filipino people to monitor the conduct of the election and of NAMFREL's "quick count" in monitoring the tabulation of the results;

(3) stresses the importance of the presence of international observers at such elections;

(4) urges the Government of the Philippines to permit direct access to the polling places for such international observers;

(5) expresses its support for the official U.S. delegation sent by the President to observe the February 7 election; and

(6) reaffirms its commitment to the principles spelled out in H. CON. Res. 232, as passed unanimously by the Congress on November 14, 1985.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, I want to express my appreciation to the majority leader and the minority leader as well as the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, Senator LUGAR, and the ranking member, Senator PELL, for agreeing that this matter can be taken care of today.

I reluctantly bother the Senate tonight with something that has been on my mind for sometime. Having just recently returned form the Philippines and though only there for a matter of hours, I have, over a period of time, tried my best to understand what has happened to that nation, even to the extent of offering some restrictive amendments in the Foreign Operations Subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee regarding what I believe to be the violation of certain human rights. I am now more convinced than ever that free and fair elections on February 7, 1986, are crucial to the preservation of democracy in that nation and to the long-term strategic interests of the United States and its allies. The recently announced decision to restrict foreign observers from the polling places impairs the prospects for honest elections. This resolution expresses the Senate's belief, based upon the latest electoral accomplishments in El Salvador, Honduras, Panama, and Guatemala, that observers with direct access to polling places are a positive influence in assuring free and fair democratic elections.

Until the late 1960's, the Philippines had a working democratic system. Unfortunately, this growth of democracy in the Philippines has deteriorated in recent years—not by a lack of interest in its continued growth by a majority of Filipinos, but by the increasingly arbitrary actions of President Marcos and the present administration of that country.

While it is not and should not be the intent of this government to interfere in or to influence the outcome of the elections in the Philippines, it is in our best interest to make every attempt to insure that they are conducted in a free and open manner and that the results truly represent the choice of the Filipino people. And, of greatest concern to me and, I am certain, a majority of Americans, is the restoration of democratic institutions in the Republic of the Philippines. We must make it clear to both President Marcos and the opposition candidates that the restoration of democratic institutions is crucial for continued good relations with the United States.

To that end, I am reiterating the need for international observers to support NAMFREL in its efforts to monitor the fairness and impartiality of the presidential elections as well as the need for these observers to have direct access to polling places.

President Reagan has appointed an official U.S. delegation of Members of Congress and distinguished Americans from the private sector to observe the February 7 elections.

If I am not mistaken, Mr. President, the distinguished chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee is the chairman of that special delegation. I wish to point to the RECORD, which indicates that on January 24, 1986, the distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. LUGAR] put out an editorial report which was very provocative, I thought, and comprehensive in its approach toward this election coming up and the long-term effects this will have on the relationship between the United States and the Philippines.

Senator LUGAR points out that there are numerous concerns. They are very similar to what appears in the resolution. I should like to take a moment to read them to my colleagues.

His concerns are, first, failure to appoint independent members to two vacancies on the commission on elections. I think it is important to note that those have been filled most recently.

Two, imbalance in media opportunity and attention afforded to the opposition;

Three, continuance in office of certain generals, including General Ver, which cast doubts regarding the military pledge of noninterference;

Four, disturbing reports of violence and intimidation against opposition figures;

Five, lingering problems with regard to a quick count, which would enhance an accurate vote tabulation;

Six, access to polling places for international observers, permitting adequate verification;

Seven, an effective means of observing the vote tabulation to 191-some regional centers.

Based on the positive experiences of this Nation with similar observer teams being sent to monitor the general elections in El Salvador in 1982 and 1984, and recently in Guatemala and Honduras, it is my belief that these observers can only help to further the interests of the people of the Philippines and the growth of democracy. We can best accomplish this by demonstrating our support for the National Citizen Movement for a Free Election [NAMFREL]. The very presence of U.S. observers should underscore the importance of NAMFREL in verifying the absence of coercion, intimidation, and illegal balloting procedures as well as encourage a full discussion of the issues by the candidates. Not only will this reflect positively on the nation as a whole, it will ensure that the winner of the election has the popular support needed to govern and a mandate to implement the necessary democratic, economic, and military reforms for the enhancement of the Filipino people.

It is essential that the Filipino people know that the United States is dedicated to their economic recovery and committed to their political freedom.

I have faith in the good judgment of the Filipino people and their respect for democratic institutions. If these elections are fair, they can help stem the tide of the Communist insurgency, revitalize the democratic processes within that nation, and strengthen the positive relationship between our two nations. Whatever the outcome of the elections, it is in the best interests of this Nation to pursue a new pluralism and dialogue within the Philippines and improve the prospects for democracy. If these elections are conducted fairly and the results are reflective of the Filipino electorate, I believe we can live with either Mr. Marcos or Mrs. Aquino as President of the Philippines. Our Nation and Congress should pledge themselves, through this resolution, to continue to work with the people of the Philippines on issues of mutual interest and shared democratic ideals.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. LAUTENBERG] be added as a cosponsor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 328) was agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

The resolution, with its preamble, reads as follows:

S. RES. 328

Whereas on February 7, 1986, the Republic of the Philippines will hold an election for President and Vice President;

Whereas the government and people of the United States have a longstanding friendship with the Philippines based on democratic principles and institutions;

Whereas the United States seeks to perpetuate that relationship and has a strategic interest in the preservation of access to two military bases in the Philippines for the security of the Pacific region;

Whereas restoration of democratic institutions in the Philippines is one essential element necessary to restore the confidence of the Filipino people in their government and to stem the growth of the communist insurgency;

Whereas President Marcos, other officials of the Government of the Philippines, the opposition party UNIDO, and the National Citizen Movement for a Free Election (NAMFREL) have indicated their willingness to cooperate with a delegation of international observers;

Whereas President Reagan has appointed an official United States delegation of Members of Congress and distinguished Americans from the private sector to observe the February 7 election.

Whereas a decision to limit access to polling places by international observers would seriously impair observation and would detract from the credibility of the election result;

Whereas it has been the experience that international observers to the elections of 1982 and 1984 in El Salvador and more recently, Guatemala, were not limited access to polling places and greatly increased the fairness and credibility of those elections; and

Whereas NAMFREL is experiencing difficulty in organizing its citizens monitoring activities, particularly with regard to the "quick count" which is essential to a credible election: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Senate hereby—

(1) reaffirms its support for genuine, free, and fair elections in the Philippines scheduled for February 7, 1986;

(2) stresses the critical importance of NAMFREL in permitting the Filipino people to monitor the conduct of the election and of ANAMFREL's "quick count" in monitoring the tabulation of the results;

(3) stresses the importance of the presence of international observers at such elections;

(4) urges the Government of the Philippines to permit direct access to the polling places for such international observers;

(5) expresses its support for the official United States delegation sent by the President to observe the February 7 election; and

(6) reaffirms its commitment to the principles spelled out in House Concurrent Resolution 232, as passed unanimously by the Congress on November 14, 1985.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. DECONCINI. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

TESTIMONY OF SENATE EMPLOYEE

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I send a resolution to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be stated by title.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A resolution (S. Res. 329) to authorize testimony of a Senate employee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, the defendant in the case of United States v. Joseph V. Herrera, Criminal No. 85-223, pending in the U.S. District Court for the District of New Mexico, has obtained a subpoena for the testimony of Sal Ceballos, an employee in Senator JEFF BINGAMAN'S Las Cruces office, at a trial scheduled to begin today. The defendant is charged with a violation of criminal statutes prohibiting the theft of U.S. mail. Ms. Ceballos has performed some casework on behalf of Senator BINGAMAN in response to communications from the defendant relating to the postal service.

This resolution would authorize Ms. Ceballos to testify at this trial. This is in keeping with our practice of facilitating justice consistent with the privileges and rights of the Senate.

Mr. President, I move adoption of the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 329) was agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

The resolution, with its preamble, reads as follows:

S. RES. 329

Whereas, in the case of United States v. Joseph V. Herrera, Criminal No. 85-223, pending in the United States District Court for the District of New Mexico, the defendant has obtained a subpoena for the testimony of Sal Ceballos under the name of Sal Fresquez, an employee in Senator Bingaman's Las Cruces office;

Whereas, by the privileges of the Senate of the United States and Rule XI of the Standing Rules of the Senate, no evidence under the control or in the possession of the Senate can, by the judicial process, be taken from such control or possession but by permission of the Senate;

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

HOW TO DECIDE ABOUT STRATEGIC DEFENSE

HON. DUNCAN HUNTER
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 3, 1986

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to recommend to my colleagues this excellent article by Lewis Lehrman, chairman of Citizens for America, and Gregory A. Fossedal, a fellow at the Hoover Institution. These gentlemen provide a commonsense approach toward understanding the need for strategic defense and offer clear explanations of many of the questions surrounding this issue. With the pending decision on SDI funding approaching this spring, I am sure this article will be helpful to my colleagues.

[From the National Review, Jan. 31, 1986]

HOW TO DECIDE ABOUT STRATEGIC DEFENSE

The idea of a "space shield," a largely space-based defense against nuclear attack, was unknown to most Americans before President Reagan tentatively endorsed it in a speech in March 1983. Yet the debate over the space shield, quickened by the fires of presidential politics in 1984, has been so fierce that the argument has already gone through several generations. In the first round, going back several years before the Reagan speech, strategic-defense advocates mostly concerned themselves with selling the basic strategic concept: that defense could enhance deterrence while holding out the hope of making nuclear missiles obsolete, whereas mutual assured destruction (MAD) obliged us constantly to expand our nuclear arsenal merely to maintain the balance of terror. Some advocates, notably Lieutenant General Daniel O. Graham—head of the High Frontier project, which launched SDI's public career—did make specific suggestions about the outlines of a feasible strategic defense. And the Defense Department had been engaged for some years in research aimed at producing usable strategic-defense weapons. But, for the most part, in the eyes of SDI advocates SDI was a strategic concept, not a system.

Nevertheless, as the concept was publicized, it was subjected to an intimidating storm of highly specific, if also scattershot, criticisms by a number of scientists. Some of these scientists were clearly politically motivated, some sincere. But they had a common approach, which was to find concrete weaknesses (laser satellites wouldn't be powerful enough, ICBMs could be protected, computers smart enough to aim space weapons couldn't be built, etc.) in defense systems that did not yet exist even on a drawing board, unless on the drawing boards of the critics.

SDI advocates counterattacked—Robert Jastrow was a standout here—showing many of the criticisms to be ill-considered or irrelevant. And the technology itself has advanced, outrunning some of the criticisms. But as potential SDI technologies have matured and as a consensus on the probable shape of a first-generation defense has begun to emerge, there have been more specifics for the critics to criticize, and it has become even more difficult for the layman to assess whether SDI is a sound idea or a hopeless boondoggle. The SDI debate has threatened to deteriorate into a blinding blizzard of technical criticisms and countercharges that exclude the lay citizen from one of the most pressing pubic decisions of the century. Yet the decision whether to go beyond mere research must be made soon, probably this year. If SDI is feasible and we do not go forward soon, the Soviets could deploy a defense before we do, achieving world domination with their unanswered system. This, then, is the time to ask what the several years of debate have taught us about the feasibility, and advisability of strategic defense.

The first and most important issue is: Is the need to switch to a defensive strategy pressing enough to justify the potential risks? The present system of offensive deterrence—MAD—has forestalled nuclear conflict for forty years. Indeed, it could be argued that MAD has averted the conventional superpower conflict that would probably have erupted without its balance of terror. Perhaps, but those who make this argument ignore the hidden corollary: The balance of terror "balanced" the Soviet Union, a regional power with no genuine allies, and few allies of any sort beyond Eurasia, into superpower status. It is precisely the possibility of mutual destruction, combined with the Soviets' reputation for indifference to the suffering of their own people, that has made the USSR the strategic equal of the numerically, geographically, economically, and technologically superior West. It was MAD, largely, that froze the West into inaction as the Russians expanded into Cuba, Central America, Africa, and the Middle East.

MAD, moreover, has been deteriorating since the advent of the high-accuracy ICBM capable of destroying enemy missiles in their silos. In the days of bombers and low-accuracy, low-payload missiles, there was little doubt that in the event of a first strike, a substantial portion of the defender's nuclear arsenal would survive well after the attack was confirmed, assuring a counterattack. MAD had some credibility because mutual destruction was assured. Neither side had a true first-strike capability, the capability to destroy the other's offensive arsenal on the ground.

With the advent of the high-accuracy, high-payload ICBM, the first strike became a theoretical attainable goal, against which the only defense was to multiply targets, i.e., more ICBMs. In one sense the freezeniks are right. The arms race is fiercer, more frightening, and potentially more destabilizing than it was twenty years ago. When multiplying targets is the only way to sustain deterrence, the arms-race treadmill accelerates. In the current environment, two terms under a negligent President could give the Soviets enough of a lead to tempt them into a first strike. Indeed, the current situation is dangerously tempting. The Soviets admit to having six thousand ICBM-borne warheads. In addition, by cheating on the SALT treaties they seem to have amassed from 2,500 to five thousand additional ICBM-launchable warheads. Add 2,500 submarine-based warheads and 1,500 on top of intermediate-range missiles aimed at Europe, and the Soviet attack force numbers between 12,000 and 15,000 warheads, according to a 1985 National Intelligence Estimate. The Soviets are adding to the total every year.

SINKING SUBMARINES

The U.S. has ten thousand warheads of its own, but this does not mean the Soviets would have to hit ten thousand targets. The warheads are packed into a much smaller number of missiles, bombers, and submarines, so that the entire deterrent arsenal of the United States and Europe—air bases, missile silos, submarines, and command and control centers—is contained in about four thousand targets. The Soviets need only two or three warheads to attack a target with confidence. The arithmetic is not reassuring.

The standard response to this arithmetic is that no matter how many accurate ICBMs the Soviets acquire, two legs of our deterrent triad, our missile submarines and our bombers remain invulnerable. The subs are hidden at sea, and some of the bombers are on alert at all times. In reality, however, both subs and bombers look like losers in an accelerating race of technologies.

A submarine isn't invisible. It leaves a number of signatures as it travels through the water. Disturbances in the ocean's internal waves, manifested on the surface, are the most apparent, and can be read by synthetic aperture radar already tested by the Soviets. Subs create a warm-water plume and also churn cold water from the ocean floor; both disturbances are detectable from space. Other potential signals are radiation and effects on plankton and other marine life.

The oceans are vast. Continuously tracking such signals is something neither side can yet do. But with better computer processing to fit scraps of satellite pictures into a coherent picture of the oceans, and with some honing of the techniques used to recognize signatures, the Soviets may achieve constant monitoring of our subs. Presidential science advisor George Keyworth warns that the explosion of a modern nuclear warhead in the water within a hundred miles of a submarine will destroy it.

As for our bombers, only about one-fourth to one-third are likely to be on alert before an attack; the rest would be vulnerable to a quick strike. Those that survive would run into the best air-defense system in the world: The Soviets have nationwide radar coverage, more than 2,500 supersonic interceptor planes, and more than ten thousand surface-to-air missiles, financed by an annual budget of perhaps $10 billion. Military reformers such as Gary Hart have pointed out the inability of our B-1 bomber forces reliably to penetrate this Soviet defense.

Nor will cruise missiles or "Stealth" bombers necessarily solve the problem. Cruise missiles fly low in an attempt to skim under Soviet tracking radar. But the Soviets, according to Soviet Military Power, already have at least two fighter planes equipped with "look-down, shoot-down" radar for targeting the cruises. And because the cruise missile flies so slowly—taking hours to reach its target—it gives the Soviets time to activate their massive civil-defense program.

"Stealth" uses coatings and electronics to fool radar. But the Stealth bomber, if we continue development at the current rate and begin to deploy it some time in the 1990s, may come too late. Even if it is not too late, it may be inadequate. For Stealth can fool radars from only one direction. Both the U.S. and the USSR, according to Aviation Week, have already been testing various ways to detect Stealth systems, including bouncing radar signals off the top of the atmosphere, and using "passive infrared" sensors from space. Stealth is a promising idea, but we cannot bet our security on it. However reliable offensive deterrence was twenty or even ten years ago, it is fast becoming obsolete. There is no alternative to defense.

The key problem with purely offensive deterrence in an age of accurate "missile-busting" ICBMs should be clear from the above: One Soviet missile carrying, say, ten warheads can knock out three American strategic targets. It does not matter if we keep up in total warheads or megatonnage if the Soviets can wipe out all our weapons in a preemptive attack. To keep up with the Soviets in an offense-only race—especially since we do not plan a pre-emptive strike of our own—we must build several targets, i.e., missiles, to absorb each one the Soviets build. The strategic argument for defense then is decisive. It is the only way off the offense-only treadmill.

We must come up with some sort of defense, even if only as a buttress to our offensive deterrent, something to return us to the stability of the days before missile-busting ICBMs. The remaining questions are two: Is an active, party space-borne defense—a space shield, of whatever technology—a practical way of buttressing deterrence? And, Do advanced space-shield weapons, such as laser beams, offer some substantial hope of eventually making ICBMs, and thus global nuclear war, obsolete?

There is no doubt any more that the space shield, in itself, disregarding countermeasures and engineering complexities, is inherently workable. There is no doubt because for once in this mire of speculation about what could be done, the thing has been done.

Most plans for a first-generation space shield look pretty much alike. They include three or four layers of defensive installations: The first, booster defense, a group of space-borne satellites, is assigned to destroy enemy boosters on the rise at that tempting moment when each is still carrying several warheads. The mid-course defense attempts to shoot down either the ICBM "buses" that carry the warheads, or the warheads themselves. This might be done from space, or by ABM missiles launched from the ground or from atmospheric aircraft, or by a combination of methods. The final phase, point defense, attempts to destroy individual warheads within a few miles of their targets. This is done from the ground.

BULL'S EYE

In the first generation scenarios, the devices actually used to destroy the enemy missiles are simple, nonnuclear projectiles that destroy their targets on impact. No lasers. No nuclear exchanges in space. We destroy enemy missiles by throwing "rocks" at them, in most phases so-called "smart rocks" that guide themselves to final impact. If that sounds unlikely, just remember that the enemy missiles are traveling at thousands of miles per hour. Think of what a brick dropped in the path of your automobile traveling at sixty miles per hour would do to it. An ICBM moving at thousands of miles an hour is a lot more vulnerable than your car going sixty. Of course the projectiles don't really look like rocks; they look more like spears. But they are pretty simple all the same.

Space-shield supporters have all along been confident that this sort of primitive defense could be built because every task involved, is a familiar one: detecting enemy rocket launches, firing an "air-to-air" missile at a high-speed target and making target adjustments from a distance, building a missile smart enough to handle the terminal approach on its own. Admittedly the distances, numbers, and velocities involved in shooting down nuclear missiles are greater than those with which the military is accustomed to dealing, but a year and a half ago the U.S. proved its rocks were smart enough. In June 1984 the Army fired a mock Soviet missile into space and then shot a smart rock, the "homing overlay vehicle," after it. The vehicle zeroed in on its target at four thousand miles an hour, unfolded its thin steel arms into a cosmic catcher's mitt, and caught the missile in space, pulverizing it without a nuclear explosion. The warhead didn't explode because, contrary to popular belief, it is hard to set them off. The explosion depends upon a delicate timing mechanism that brings together the deadly explosives at just the right instant. Any impact great enough to destroy the missile would certainly destroy the bomb mechanism. Missiles can be equipped with salvage fuses that can order a detonation the instant the missiles senses it is under attack, but an explosion above fifty thousand feet would cause no significant damage or fallout on the ground.

So smart-rock technology is in itself workable. That does not prove that, on net, a smart-rock defensive system would be superior to attacks upon it or that it could overcome countermeasures, but it does show that the concept is realistic and not, as some suggest, an absurd fantasy.

The more exotic weapons mentioned in the debate—lasers, particle beams, etc.—offer greater potential but present more significant technological problems than smart rocks. Energy weapons are the ultimate space-shield weapons because they travel at or near the speed of light and, in the vaccum of space, with undeviating precision. Over the relatively short distances in question, the beams would travel almost instantaneously, nearly eliminating the need to lead the target. A space-borne station equipped with such weapons could fire on the target, learn the results, and fire again repeatedly in less than a second, allowing one station to attack hundreds of targets within a few minutes. Because of their speed and accuracy, mature energy weapons would do the ballistic missile almost precisely what the machine gun did to the cavalry charge, and would make maintaining a missile force as pointless as retaining regiments of horse soldiers.

Unfortunately there are many obstacles still to be overcome in developing these weapons, and usable versions may still be decades away. Progress, however, has been more rapid than many SDI advocates expected. A few years ago, a group of scientists critical of strategic defense published a paper, under the sponsorship of the Union of Concerned Scientists, contending that a laser weapon would have to achieve a power output of 25 megawatts (25 million watts) to shoot down a Soviet missile. Last spring, scientists at the Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory tested a free-electron laser with a peak power of one billion watts. The Livermore scientists expect the free-electron laser to achieve a peak many times higher, maybe even a trillion watts, many times a second. Average power is as important as peak power, since the laser must be able to fire nearly continuously, but the goal at Livermore is an average output of one hundred megawatts, not the 25 that the UCS saw as such a discouraging obstacle. A laser producing such levels of power could destroy several enemy missiles per second.

A multitude of well-publicized objections other than insufficient power has been raised, but many were demonstrably irresponsible when they were first made and many others have already been overtaken by the progress of research. One repeated objection has been that energy weapons could not be fired through the atmosphere. This is still true of some such weapons, such as the neutral-particle beam. But under the Reagan SDI program, a promising new twist has been developed that would in fact enable laser weapons to penetrate the air. Using the space shuttle as a target, the scientists first fired up a low-energy beam to probe for any turbulence in the atmosphere. The first beam helped them, using high-speed computers, to adapt the second beam so as to minimize any interference. Using the first beam, then, as a kind of railroad track, they were able to fire the second beam (also low-power, since the shuttle is on our side) straight off at the shuttle.

Contrivances like this make several advanced ideas for Star Wars defense—such as ground-based lasers firing off mirrors, or actual laser battle stations in space—appear much more feasible. The ground-based lasers would be able to hit the mirrors without being disrupted by the atmosphere. The space-based lasers would be able to reach down to intercept cruise missiles and bombers. In recent congressional testimony, Lieutenant General James A. Abrahamson, head of the SDI program, said that test results so far have shown that we might be able to chop five to ten years off the time experts once thought would be necessary to develop a shield. This would make even laser weapons ready for deployment within the next five to ten years.

H.R. 3436

HON. JOSEPH J. DioGUARDI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 3, 1986

Mr. DIOGUARDI. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to commend the courageous firefighters of Westchester County, NY, and indeed all firefighters in our great land, and to pledge my support for H.R. 3436, a bill calling for the creation of a national monument dedicated to the firefighters across America who have given their lives in the name of our safety.

I am proud to support such well-deserved recognition for these men and women, who have given so much including, in all too many cases, their very lives. I strongly believe that it is time for America to honor their sacrifice.

I would also like to reaffirm my support for the recognition of America's firefighters through a day of National Commemoration. I have co-sponsored House Joint Resolution 479, a bill that would make October 8, 1986, "National Firefighters' Day."

In closing, I would like to thank all firefighters, especially those of Westchester, for their tireless service to our Nation. It is an honor to be a part of efforts to express publicly our appreciation for their courage, diligence, and heroism.

LET'S DELAY THE EFFECTIVE DATE OF THE TAX BILL

HON. LES AuCOIN

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 3, 1986

Mr. AuCOIN. Mr. Speaker, now that the Tax Reform Act of 1985 has passed the House of Representatives, it's time to address an issue of extreme importance to millions of taxpayers.

That issue is: "When will the proposed tax changes go into effect?"

The tax bill will make hundreds of changes to our tax system—some technical in nature, some dramatic. These changes will affect millions of individuals and thousands of businesses. And it's only now that our constituents are starting to comprehend the importance and the ramifications of this bill.

Complicating matters for the taxpayers of this country is the fact that the changes to the Tax Code proposed in the House-passed bill are by no means final. The U.S. Senate will start crafting its own bill, more changes will be made by the conference committee, and then its fate will eventually be in the hands of the President.

Amidst all this confusion and speculation over the substance of the tax bill is the fact that the effective date of the vast majority of the changes in the bill is January 1, 1986.

Taxpayers—be they individuals, businesses and governments—start several months—if not years—in advance planning their tax investments. In other words, people and businesses have already made their plans for the 1986 tax year.

I don't think it is fair to enact changes to the Tax Code that will be applied retroactively. Taxpayers have a right to some certainty. Ours is the greatest voluntary tax system in the world—and it's only fair to allow those taxpayers to make financial plans with a stable source of information. They have a right not to have to speculate on changes contemplated by the U.S. Congress.

I spent most of January in my State of Oregon and I heard about the problems we've created by not addressing the effective date of the tax bill virtually everywhere I went. From main street retailers, high tech companies, the wood products industry, bankers, and most of all—from constituents all over my districts who came to small meetings and townhalls that I held.

Today I am introducing legislation that will put an end to all the questions and uncertainty. My bill expresses the sense of the House that all changes to the Tax Code made by the eventual passage of the Tax Reform Act should be effective on January 1, 1987.

This resolution will send a vitally necessary message of clarification to financial markets, accountants, cities and towns, small businesses, and millions of individual American taxpayers that, if a massive change in the Tax Code is eventually enacted, they will at least have some time to plan and make adjustments.

Mr. Speaker, we have really thrown a boomerang at American taxpayers who are wondering: Will the deduction for IRA plan contributions be curtailed? Will the tax deduction for charitable contributions be available to nonitemizers? Will a cap be imposed on the use of tax-exempt bonds by States?

These are all questions posed to the contestants in the newest version of "tax roulette" being played by the taxpayers of this Nation—with Members of Congress as the croupier.

It is time to resolve this problem. It is time to add some certainty to the Tax Code. Let us pass this resolution delaying the effective date of the tax bill until January 1, 1987.

PROTECTING THE YOUNG STAR WARRIORS

HON. EDWARD J. MARKEY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 3, 1986

Mr. MARKEY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call my colleagues' attention to an article by Ms. Ellen Goodman which appeared in the Boston Globe on Thursday, January 30. Her article provides a commentary on the Reagan administration's efforts to shield star wars from Gramm-Rudman budget cuts. What they are really shielding is a technological free for all in which young star warriors get a blank check to pursue what ever interesting physics problems excite their curiosity.

It is a fine thing to fund scientific research, but there are far more worthy scientific projects than the fantasies of our star warriors. In a time of raging deficits and fiscal austerity, star wars should face the same budget cuts that other related programs are taking.

Ms. Goodman's article provides a skeptical, sensible assessment of star wars, and I wholeheartedly agree with her.

The article follows:

PROTECTING THE YOUNG STAR WARRIORS WHO CAN'T PROMISE PROTECTION

(By Ellen Goodman)

In case you have been up nights worrying, there is at least one defensive shield already in place on this planet. It's the shield the White House is using to protect the funding for the strategic defense iniative—"star wars." From all reports, it's impenetrable.

In theory, the sword of Gramm-Rudman was supposed to cut budgets for every weapons program by 4.9 percent, including SDI. But the administration raised its shield to make sure that the president's pet celestial project won't be nicked.

As of this moment, the "star wars" program is perhaps the only sheltered workshop for scientists in the federal budget. Whether or not we can afford it, we are financing the highest-tech defense research in human history.

The "star wars" money is going to be spent to further and produce the ideas of an elite cadre of scientists who, unlike Gramm, Rudman or Reagan, are unknown to the average citizen.

Now there is a glimpse or two into the world of the young scientists working on space-age weaponry. William Broad, a science reporter, visited a critical mass of them in Livermore, Calif., the home of the Lawrence Livermore Lab, one of the two nuclear research labs in the country. Here he found the men of O-Group, whom he dubbed "Star Warriors" in his new book by the same name.

These warriors wear no green berets. They wear no uniforms at all, unless you consider jeans, checked shirts and running shoes a dress code. Nor do they eat regulation meals, unless a diet of fast food and ice cream is required.

Broad's sketches make a composite picture of a group described by an inside critic as "bright young hotshots who are socially maladjusted." An intellectual cadre high on Coca-Cola and competition.

He retraces the way the best and the brightest graduates of MIT and Cal Tech were collected by the group leader, Lowell Wood, to work on nuclear weaponry. They were lured by a combination of money, high camaraderie and, perhaps most of all, the freedom to pursue happiness in the form of "interesting problems."

As Peter Hagelstein, one of the more complicated personalities at Livermore and creator of the X-Ray Laser Beam, explained: "My view of weapons has changed. Until 1980 or so I didn't want to have anything to do with nuclear anything. Back in those days I thought there was something fundamentally evil about weapons. Now I see it as an interesting physics problem."

The motives of a computer star-whiz, Rod Hyde—an MIT graduate at 19—are somewhat less earthbound: "What I want more than anything is essentially to get the human race into space. It's the future. If you stay down here some disaster is going to strike and you're going to get wiped. If you get into space and spread out, there's no chance of the human race disappearing."

These snippets make the young Star Warriors sound spacy. This is only part of the story. The atmosphere of the all-male O-Group, reads like a science-house fraternity, complete with boyish pranks and competitions. The brains who are the hired guns in the national-defense scheme don't seem to know how to take care of themselves. There is no Wendy to make them get their proper sleep and food. But they are undeniably, scientifically brilliant.

And (this is the kicker) they don't think a missile defense will work.

As Peter Hagenstein said, "It would be very nice if we could develop a defensive network that would blow away all Soviet ICBMs. But I don't think we can do that. We could take out some. But it wouldn't keep cities from being obliterated."

So it appears that the Star Warriors, the men with both the background and the security clearance to know best, the men paid to imagine, don't believe in the crayon-colored dream of safety from nuclear weapons.

Here we are, investing incalculable amounts of money in the work of top-secret scientists who want to solve "interesting problems," but not the one that we're promised: security. Maybe a Washington Monthly writer was right when he described "star wars" as The Revenge of the Nerds: "They're back. They're angry. And they're building SDI."

THE TRICKLE-UP PROGRAM

HON. TED WEISS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 3, 1986

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, economic development can sometimes be promoted as effectively—or more effectively—by individuals working with limited resources as by governments or large enterprises. Acting on this principle, the Trickle-Up Program has assisted people to establish small-scale, labor-intensive enterprises in countries around the world.

I urge all Members of the House who are interested in development issues to review the attached excerpts from a Trickle-Up Program factsheet.

The Trickle-Up Program is an independent, non-profit organization, launched in 1979, which is dedicated to creating new opportunities for employment and economic and social well-being among the low income populations of the world, with grants assigned in 80 countries:

Africa—30: Benin, Botswana, Burundi, Cameroon, Chad, Egypt, Equatorial Guinea, Ethiopia, The Gambia, Ghana, Ivory Coast, Kenya, Lesotho, Liberia, Malawi, Mali, Mauritius, Morocco, Nigeria, Senegal, Sierra Leone, Somalia, Sudan, Swaziland, Tanzania, Togo, Uganda, Zaire, Zambia, Zimbabwe.

Asia—15: Bangladesh, Burma, Fiji, India, Indonesia, Lebanon, Malaysia, Micronesia, Nepal, Pakistan, Papua New Guinea, Philippines, Solomon Islands, Sri Lanka, Thailand.

Caribbean—14: Anguilla, Antigua-Barbuda, Barbados, Dominica, Dominican Republic, Grenada, Guadeloupe, Haiti, Jamaica, Montserrat, St. Kitts-Nevis, St. Lucia, St. Vincent, Turks & Caicos.

Central America—8: Belize, Costa Rica, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras, Mexico, Nicaragua, Panama.

Europe—2: Ireland, Portugal.

North America—1: United States.

South America—10: Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Chile, Colombia, Ecuador, Guyana, Paraguay, Peru, Suriname.

If groups of five or more people wish to invest 1,000 or more hours of their unemployed time, they may apply for a Trickle-Up Program grant of US $100, to be paid in two $50 installments, for a profit-making enterprise:

(1) That they have planned themselves;

(2) For which they have or can secure any necessary approvals or resources;

(3) Where the 1,000 hours of self-employment can be completed within 3 months;

(4) Where a profit is anticipated;

(5) Where not less than 20% of the profit will be reinvested;

(6) Where continuing and expanding levels of self-employment are anticipated; and

(7) For which they will send reports on their enterprise and results to TUP.

Participation is open to both women and men. TUP seeks to involve such groups as young people who have never had a job; women, many of whom have never earned money for the work they do; and people in the informal sector who are generally overlooked when development plans are made. The majority of those who plan and work on TUP enterprises are women.

Trickle-Up Enterprises are those that people can start with existing skills, locally available materials and equipment, which are labor-intensive, and for which there are local markets. Many of them yield a quick profit that is reinvested to build up capital; and many of the products become substitutes for imports.

The greatest number of enterprises are those producing, processing, and marketing food; the second largest number involve clothing; and the third largest are those producing and marketing household goods. There are over 100 types of TUP enterprises in the various countries.

Trickle-Up Programs are initiated by Coordinators who find that TUP is a means of advancing the work of their own organizations. They now include over 500 individuals and professional personnel of local and international voluntary organizations, governmental agencies, the United Nations Development Programme, UNICEF, UN Volunteers, and the Peace Corps.

At the beginning of 1986, nearly seven years after the Trickle-Up Program began, over 2,300 project grants of US$100 each have been assigned to more than 500 Coordinators in 80 countries.

TUP reaches underemployed and unemployed people in urban and rural areas who, when motivated, can move toward economic independence. TUP is not only a means of getting a small amount of capital to people, but is also a means of encouraging people to build their own capital. The TUP Grant is not an inducement to get people to accept plans that others make for them. Rather, it is a means of giving people more confidence in plans they make for themselves.

TUP demonstrates how, in a unique, cost-effective way, involuntary unemployment can be substantially reduced and productivity increased. With the Trickle-Up Program, $20,000 can help more than 1,000 people become entrepreneurs and start their own income-producing enterprises, with exponential growth possible. TUP businesses add to the goods and services that constitute the real Gross National Product, and add to the independence and self-reliance of the women and men who participate.

The recipient of the Paul G. Hoffman Award, TUP was honored for its "innovative concept and dedicated work in the field of development."

THE FEDERAL BUDGET AND GROUNDHOG DAY

HON. WILLIAM F. CLINGER, JR.

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 3, 1986

Mr. CLINGER. Mr. Speaker, it's tough to be in the prediction business. Ask President Reagan. In 1984, he predicted that the Federal budget could be balanced without new taxes, through a combination of spending cuts and economic growth. He had a dwindling number of believers in Congress, and the deficit reduction bill became law late last year. The fact is that the President may be right. It's just that his timing was off because new projections by the Congressional Budget Office show that Federal deficits will be nearly cut in half by 1991, without slicing 1 cent from future budgets. Now that's good news. And there is more good news. Punxsutawney Phil, the world's most accurate weather forecasting groundhog, failed to see his shadow this past weekend, and he declared that spring is on the way. And Mr. Speaker, Punxsutawney Phil has never been wrong in his predictions. I would like to insert into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the official proclamation on this the 99th appearance by my district's most famous resident.

Here ye, here ye, to all faithful followers here on Gobbler's Knob, and to all believers around the world. I, James H. Means, President of the Punxsutawney Groundhog Club, proclaim that his majesty, King Phillip, has come out of his royal burrow at 7:32 a.m. In the cold light of dawn, he stood tall and proud, and looking around, he failed to see a shadow behind him. Punxsutawney Phil declares that Spring is on the way. The famous groundhog joins Governor Dick Thornburgh in reminding everyone "you have a friend in Pennsylvania." Having made his forecast for the 99th year in a row, Phil has returned to his burrow to await next year's big celebration. That's the official word today, February 2, from Punxsutawney, Pennsylvania, the weather capitol of the world.

SCIENCE BUDGET ISSUES FOR THE SECOND SESSION OF THE 99TH CONGRESS

HON. GEORGE E. BROWN, JR.

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 3, 1986

Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Speaker, as the second session of the 99th Congress convenes, this is a good time to review the state of science budget policy in the face of many hard choices that will be forced on the Federal Government by the Gramm-Rudman Deficit Control Act.

in 1985, the U.S. Government and private sector spent a total of about $110 billion for research and development, about 2.7 percent of gross national product. This sum is greater than France, Japan, West Germany, and the United Kingdom combined spend on R&D. According to the National Science Foundation, the United States spends about the same percentage of its GNP on R&D as West Germany and Japan. However, this is less than the U.S.S.R., which spent close to 3.6 percent of its GNP on R&D in 1983. Despite seemingly favorable comparisons between the United States and Japan, that country trained more engineers (74,000) than the United States (67,000) to carry out this work, and Japan spends a greater percentage of its GNP for nonmilitary R&D (2.6 percent) than the United States (1.8 percent).

The U.S. trend toward spending a greater proportion of the R&D budget for military rather than civilian R&D has been greatly accelerated by this administration. In 1972, total R&D was $17.1 billion (constant 1972 dollars) with defense taking 53.8 percent of those funds. In 1981, total R&D was $17.76 billion (constant 1972 dollars) with 50.1 percent spent on defense. In the President's budget for 1986, he proposed spending $22.8 billion (constant 1972 dollars) with 70.6 percent for defense-related R&D (all figures from NSF).

Percentage changes from 1981 to 1986 in military and nonmilitary spending indicate this trend more sharply. Since 1981, overall military R&D increased 78 percent while civilian R&D decreased 23 percent. During the same time, with the exception of health (up 8%) and general science, a tiny portion of the budget (up 27.8%), funding for all other R&D areas is down in constant dollars: Space R&D, −49.6 percent; energy, −56 percent; transportation, −7 percent; natural resources and the environment, −34 percent, and agriculture, −30 percent. Often, where there have been increases in civilian R&D, however, the administration should not receive all the credit, for Congress has worked hard to restore some of the administration's initially proposed cuts. For example, although R&D in the health areas has increased by 8 percent during the 1981–86 period, this is due more to Congress and the health sciences constituencies than to the administration.

The allocation of such a high percentage of our R&D dollars for defense-related purposes, compared with historical amounts, raises several concerns:

Federal resources spent on defense cannot be invested in other worthy programs.

Defense contractors may divert the best manpower resources away from nonmilitary firms and from small high technology companies.

The Department of Defense, a mission-oriented agency, tends to focus on short-term (versus longer-term) projects partly as a consequence of a cut in long-term basic research and partly as a consequence of the Mansfield amendment (an amendment to insure that DOD-supported research was relevant to the DOD mission).

The technology resulting from defense R&D is less likely than civilian R&D to result in a transfer of technology from the Federal Government to the civilian sector. The DOD has always been restrictive regarding transfer of its technology.

When we look at Federal funding for the Nation's "technology base," the combination of basic research (approximately similar to DOD's 6.1 category) and applied research (approximately similar to DOD's 6.2 category), we see support for the technology base of the country has been eroding. From 1965 to 1985, there was a 25 percent decline (in constant dollars) in Federal funding for applied and basic research combined, as contrasted with funds for development, testing, and evaluation [R&DTE]. During the same period, funding for basic research declined from 5.5 percent of total R&DTE in 1965 to 2.5 percent of total R&DTE in 1985.

When broken down, the technology base funding picture is somewhat more complicated. While there has been a reasonable increase in basic research during the 1981–86 period, there was an actual decrease in basic research during the first 2 years of this administration. Despite an overall increase in basic research from 1981–86, much of the research considered "basic" tends to be mission oriented, for example, finding a cure for cancer, compared with non-mission-oriented research, for example, understanding basic cellular and biochemical structure. While mission-oriented basic research is important, we should not forget that many of the most important advances come from non-mission-oriented inquiries. In addition to basic research funding trends, there has been a considerable decrease in civilian applied research (−16.5%) and development (−59%) in constant dollars. This is a surprising trend from an administration interested in U.S. global competitiveness, since nondefense applied research and development is crucial to the commercialization of scientific discoveries. During this same period, defense applied research has increased by 3.9 percent and defense development has increased by 101 percent.

Against this background of trends in basic research and in civilian applied research and development, we are now confronted by the specter of the Gramm-Rudman Deficit Reduction Act and an administration committed to "privatizing" many Federal functions. Preliminary budget cuts for fiscal year 1986 include across-the-board reductions in scientific research. If the automatic provisions of Gramm-Rudman are triggered for 1987, one-half of the noncontrollable cuts would come from nonexempt civilian programs, no doubt including many of the science funding categories that have already sustained severe cuts the past 5 years. In addition, since the administration has recently been quoted as trying to "privatize" Federal functions, there may be further cuts in nondefense applied research and development. Such developments would further damage our attempts to transfer technology to the civilian sector and to improve our civilian competitiveness vis-a-vis other countries. Five years ago, Congress enacted the Stevenson-Wydler Act, designed to increase the flow of technology from the Federal Government to the private sector. Although the administration has chosen not to carry out many provisions of that Act, the Science and Technology Committee has been considering amendments to that act to make it more effective. Given problems of U.S. global competitiveness, Congress should consider such a course very seriously and remember the importance of nondefense applied research and development.

The present administration often gives philosophical homage to Adam Smith, intellectual father of the free-market economy, but it is not clear they have fully heeded his words. Smith argued that the proper function of government was to protect the nation from external threats, to protect each citizen from injustice and oppression by others in the community, and to erect and maintain public works and institutions that private investment would not provide for. Long-term civilian, non-mission-oriented basic research is not something the private sector is good at providing, thus it is an important function of the Government, even under an Adam Smith free-market philosophy.

Recent history, as exhibited in the decline of U.S. global competitiveness and in the decline of U.S. productivity, has shown the private sector has not properly funded nondefense applied research and development. At the same time, the present administration has cut both nondefense applied research and development funds undercutting civilian technology transfer. When Congress and the administration grapple in the coming days with the huge Federal deficits, we would do well to heed Adam Smith's admonition for the Government to "erect and maintain the public works and institutions" of civilian, non-mission-oriented basic research and civilian applied research and development, for both are crucial to our welfare as a Nation.

OSTEOPOROSIS—BONING UP FOR LIFE

HON. OLYMPIA J. SNOWE

OF MAINE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 3, 1986

Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to introduce legislation today, on behalf of myself and more than 60 of my colleagues, which would designate the week of May 11–17, 1986, as "National Osteoporosis Awareness Week."

Last year the resolution designating "National Osteoporosis Awareness Week" was passed with overwhelming support by my colleagues and was signed into law by the President on May 20, 1985. Again this year, I am sponsoring this resolution because I believe we continue to have a responsibility to inform our citizens about this essentially preventable disease. I hope to bring attention to a bone condition which strikes 15 to 20 million of our older Americans.

Osteoporosis is a thinning of the bones. This debilitating bone degeneration is associated with aging, low calcium levels, and loss of estrogen. Although older men may be afflicted by a form of this disease, osteoporosis is a disorder which mainly affects older women, posing a threat to one-fourth of all women after menopause. Thin, caucasian women are particularly prone to losing bone mass and do so at a rate twice that of men. According to some estimates, the postmenopausal women can lose as much as 38 milligrams of calcium a day, which results in approximately 1 percent overall calcium loss each year. The deprivation of this important element weakens the bones, causing fractures—in fact, an estimated 1 million fractures a year.

Older women are the fastest growing segment of our population, making osteoporosis a rapidly increasing problem. It is estimated that osteoporosis costs the Nation over $6 billion annually in health care expenditures including long-term care and lost earnings by afflicted older workers.

Mr. Speaker, allow me to expand on this important point by providing a breakdown of the cost of osteoporosis as estimated by Columbia University:

Direct costs:
Hospital inpatient services	$2,259,750,000
Outpatient and emergency room Institutional services	38,150,000
Outpatient diagnostic and therapeutic services	4,130,000
Physician inpatient services	345,690,000
Physician office, outpatient and emergency room services	153,980,000
Other practitioner services	54,960,000
Drugs	2,030,000
Nursing home services	2,312,605,000
Prepayments and administration	128,640,000
Nonhealth sector goods and services	428,800,000
Total direct costs	5,728,735,000
Indirect costs:
Lost earning—wage earners	362,140,000
Lost earning—homemakers	53,300,000
Total costs	6,144,175,000

Every year 200,000 osteoporotic women over the age of 45 fracture one or more of their bones. Among those who live to age 90, approximately one-third of women and 17 percent of men will suffer a hip fracture that will prevent them from fully regaining normal activity and may result in institutionalization. Severe cases of osteoporosis can, therefore, often mean the end of independent living and the beginning of dependency in the older individual.

In addition to bone fractures, osteoporosis can also cause the body to collapse on itself; the dowager's hump is an example of the progressive shortening of the spine and is one of the few visible signs of osteoporosis. On the average, people lose an inch in height as they age. A woman suffering from vertebrae collapse can eventually lose a total of 8 inches or more from her adult height. These fractures and the resultant deformity and disability is accompanied by a great deal of physical and emotional pain.

The physical and emotional pain, however, are not the full story. Osteoporosis is a killer—it has been estimated that more than 50,000 elderly American women die every year of complications of hip fractures which is 10,000 more than those who die annually from breast cancer.

The cause of osteoporosis is not yet clearly understood. It has been suggested that along with a lowering estrogen level, a sedentary life style and a low calcium intake can also allow this bone condition to develop. Those individuals with a family history of osteoporosis are at increased risk as well.

The best treatment of the disorder is prevention. Studies have shown that 80 percent of bone fractures resulting from thinning of the bones can be avoided with increased intake of calcium and estrogen—50 percent of all fractures could be avoided with the use of calcium alone. Younger women in their thirties and forties need to be especially aware of the importance of daily exercise and calcium intake. For years doctors believed that calcium was not that essential in the diet of adults. This view, however, is now changing. The evidence is growing that an adequate daily intake of calcium may be the best weapon in the prevention of osteoporosis.

Most Americans do not realize they are calcium deficient with an average daily intake of 450 to 550 milligrams. It is now recommended that individuals should first, take calcium supplements of 1,000 milligrams a day in their thirties and 1,300 milligrams a day after age 40; second, exercise daily by such weight-bearing exercises such as walking or jogging; third, reduce caffeine intake and stop smoking.

By designating a week beginning with Mother's Day, May 11, as "National Osteoporosis Awareness Week," I hope to encourage mothers, daughters and grandmothers to pay special attention to this serious problem by stressing the intergenerational aspects of osteoporosis. Men and women of all ages must become aware of this condition and learn what they can do to increase bone density in the younger years and diminish bone loss with age.

The resolution follows:

H.J. RES. 510

Joint resolution to designate the week of May 11, 1986, through May 17, 1986, as National Osteoporosis Awareness Week

Whereas 15 to 20 million persons in the United States are afflicted with osteoporosis, a degenerative bone condition;

Whereas approximately 25 percent of postmenopausal women in the United States develop osteoporosis;

Whereas 32 percent of women and 17 percent of men who live to the age of 90 will likely suffer a hip fracture due primarily to osteoporosis;

Whereas more than 50,000 older women and many older men die each year in the United States as a result of hip fracture complications;

Whereas hip fracture complications often result in loss of independence for older persons;

Whereas approximately $6,000,000,000 is expended annually in the United States for health care costs relating to osteoporosis;

Whereas osteoporosis is associated with the loss of bone tissue due to lack of estrogen and low calcium intake;

Whereas the majority of persons are unaware of the condition of osteoporosis; and

Whereas the best treatment for osteoporosis is prevention through education: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the week of May 11, 1986, through May 17, 1986, is designated National Osteoporosis Awareness Week. The President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe this week with appropriate programs and activities.

TOM EARLEY OF LEVITTOWN

HON. PETER H. KOSTMAYER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 3, 1986

Mr. KOSTMAYER. Mr. Speaker, Levittown, PA, is a special place in my congressional district—a wonderfully diverse neighborhood comprised of parts of Bristol, Falls, and Middletown Townships.

The "Voice of Levittown" that ties the disparate parts of Levittown together is Tom Earley, the popular talk show host on WBCB–AM. For 1 hour, 6 days a week, Tom talks "over the back fence" with the community. His special style and repartee is enjoyed by all.

The Philadephia Inquirer recently profiled Tom Earley, Mr. Speaker, and at this point in the RECORD, I would like to share this piece with my colleagues.

[From the Philadelphia Inquirer, Jan. 25, 1986.]

HE URGES LEVITTOWN TO SPEAK ITS PIECE

(By Lacy McCrary)

In the early days, Tom Earley and his Levittown neighbors talked about why they couldn't build fences and why they couldn't hang their wash out to dry on Sundays.

The reasons, Earley would tell them, were that William Levitt, who built Levittown in the early 1950s, didn't like fences and that he discouraged his homebuyers from doing their washing on Sundays because he believed it cheapened churchgoing days.

In the 34 years since Levittown was begun, the community has matured, and the courtly and genial Tom Earley has turned a white-haired 62. But he is still talking to his neighbors about local concerns and issues, some of which are a bit more complicated. Today, the subjects are likely to be taxes, local governments, Social Security, drugs, crime and garbage problems.

Since 1957, Earley has hosted a 50-minute talk show six days a week on Levittown's radio station WBCB–AM, giving him what the station says is the longest run of any call-in show host in the Philadelphia area. Station general manager Bob Burton calls the show an "electronic back fence over which people can air their views and opinions."

It is called Speak Your Piece, and that is what Earley lets people do.

He reaches 50,000 to 75,000 listeners a day, the station estimated, and is regarded by many as the "voice of Levittown" and the closest thing to an institution the community has. Thousands of families who moved to Levittown as young parents have listened to his show as their children have grown up and moved out on their own, and as they have gone through their working lives to retirement.

"People used to air their gripes about their neighbors, noise, barking dogs and street conditions," Earley said in an interview recently. "I would advise them to talk to their neighbors and see if they could come to an agreement."

In 1959, Earley played a role in helping to resolve a contract dispute between U.S. Steel's Fairless Works in Falls Township and Local 4889 of the United Steelworkers of America. Earley invited the union's officers to appear on his show and discuss their grievances. He also invited members of U.S. Steel management, but they sent a tape recording to be aired. But he served the purpose of examining the issues for the community, which was then largely made up of steelworkers.

In the early 1970s, a racial incident created tensions at a high school in Bristol Township. Earley turned his show over to the students to air their concerns, and by day's end the tension had dissipated.

In one of Bucks County's biggest controversies in recent years, the fight about the proposed plan to divert water from the Delaware River to the Philadelphia Electric Co. nuclear power station at Limerick, Earley has supported the so-called pump project but has frequently had opponents on the show.

Last year, Earley was instrumental in persuading Bristol Township residents to approve a change in their form of government, from a ward-commissioner system to an all at-large commissioner form headed by a township executive.

"I very much promoted the change, he said. "I kept pushing it because I knew we had a bunch of bums in there. We had had the same lousy management for the last several years, so I really pushed for a change."

To help with problems he cannot solve, Earley has the county commissioners, U.S. Rep. Peter Kostmayer (D., Pa.) and Peggy Adams, Bucks County director of consumer protection, each on the show once a month.

There are only a handful of daily talk shows on suburban radio stations in the Philadelphia area.

But the trend in suburbs throughout the county is for small AM stations such as WBCB to increase the number of talk shows, according to radio experts.

"There are more talk shows today than there were 10 years ago, and they are not unusual in small towns," said Wayne Cornils, executive vice president of the Radio Advertising Bureau in New York City.

"Smaller radio stations get almost all their revenues locally, and they have to be local, and a talk show is a marvelous way to do it," Cornils said. "A small town talk-show host can be a very important part of the community, particularly on AM stations."

Cornils and spokesmen for the National Association of Broadcasters and the Pennsylvania Association of Broadcasters said FM stations had largely taken over the music end of radio because their stereo sounded better. They said the trend for AM stations, which have only about 30 percent of the listening audience, was to go to nonmusic formats, which included talk shows, news and sports.

"AMs are still the community-oriented stations that talk to their listeners and impart what is happening in their communities," said Ron Irions, vice president, radio administration, National Association of Broadcasters in Washington.

"A lot of smaller AM stations are having trouble maintaining an audience and they have to do something," said Don Kimes, general manager of station WCOJ-AM in Coatesville, which has had a talk show called Phone Forum since the 1960s. "They are becoming more local with more talk shows, more news and more sports."

Earley said his 12:10 p.m. show was a "noontime release for people. They store all these feelings up and who do they tell? They get on the phone and tell everybody how they feel about everthing, including township government and elected officials."

Except for three years in the mid-1960s, when he had an insurance business, Earley has been the show's only host.

The other day, he appeared at the small, 1,000-watt station in the Magnolia Hill section of Levittown an hour before his show went on the air, as he nearly always does. He had watched morning TV shows and spent the time before his show reading newspapers.

Always stylishly dressed, either in suit and tie or a more leisurely sweater and slacks, Earley handles the telephone in the cramped studio in Levittown's Magnolia Hill section as if he were at home talking to a friend.

Although he tries to avoid controversy, Earley, a deeply religious man, never hesitates to let people know what his philosophy and beliefs are.

"It's maybe old-fashioned stuff," he said. "God, church, anti-lotteries and prayer in the schools and at home.

"I feel we can achieve something worthwhile in 50 minutes. And if something good comes out of it, it's worthwhile."

During the years, he said, listeners have gotten to know him as a person instead of just a talk-show host.

"They know I have sickness in my family and bills and a kid in school just like they have," he said. His wife, Joanne, has Alzheimer's disease and is in a nursing home in Doylestown. Last spring, he suffered a heart attack on his 62d birthday, and callers still ask about his health and his wife.

"I'm just an average guy who happens to do a talk show. I like to talk about my family and other things to people like we were doing it in somebody's kitchen. . . . I just think you should talk to people like you would talk to your neighbor."

TRIBUTE TO LUCY FLORENCE CODELLA

HON. JOSEPH J. DioGUARDI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 3, 1986

Mr. DioGUARDI. Mr. Speaker, I rise today, to pay tribute to Lucy Florence Codella, who is being honored by the Sons of Italy of America on February 22. The Sons of Italy of America is the oldest and largest fraternal Italian-American organization in the country. The Sons of Italy has enriched and broadened American patterns of life. It encourages and upholds the prestige of Italian-Americans while promoting national education and actively participating in cultural, social, and civic life in our communities.

Lucy has been and still remains a catalyst in the Sons of Italy. She was one of the founders of the Per Sempre Ladies Lodge 2344a in Rosedale, NY. She served as president of her own lodge, Aquileia Lodge 935 in White Plains, NY for 9 years. Presently she is the first women to hold the position of State principal trustee of the Sons of Italy. Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Speaker, on December 6, 1985 the Committee on the Judiciary filed a report, House Report 99-422, on the Rules Enabling Act of 1985. Rather than subjecting the taxpayers to the expense of seeking a star print for this report, I am submitting a list of corrections to that report. Hopefully these clarifications will be useful:

A TRIBUTE TO FRED AND EDITH BARTEL

HON. LES AuCOIN

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 3, 1986

Mr. AuCOIN. Mr. Speaker, with the Christmas season just passed, we have time now to sit back and think about the year ahead. Holidays, like Christmas, are times for sharing with family and friends, and for taking time out from our daily demands and pressures.

With all the hustle and bustle of the Christmas season, however, we tend to forget that there are people who work all year round to make the holiday a special time for the rest of us.

In my home State of Oregon, Fred and Edith Bartel are two of those very special people. They recently won the Columbia County Tree Farmer of the Year Award—an honor that is given for community involvement and for the promotion of tree farming.

Fred and Edith are Christmas tree farmers. Both were surprised at winning the award, but people who have had a chance to visit the farm and who are familiar with the Bartels were not the least bit surprised. A trip to the Bartel farm is a family outing, complete with hot coffee in the winter, trails, picnic areas, and fishing in the summer.

But there is more to this award than pomp and circumstance. The Bartels are people who spend their lives giving back to their community, whether through community organizations, donating Christmas trees to needy families, or by passing on their knowledge and experience to high school students interested in tree farming.

When the Bartels look at their award or at the newspaper articles written about them, they will certainly feel a sense of pride and accomplishment. Yet, award or no award, they are able to get up each morning and look out across their piece of Dutch Canyon; to look back on the changes that have taken place in the 15 years since they first started their farm. This award is simply a marker of the many great accomplishments these two have achieved together, while the forests full of Douglas, Noble, and Grand Fir trees will continue for generations to bring the spirit of Christmas to all those who visit the Bartel farm.

STAR WARS PSYCHOLOGY

HON. EDWARD J. MARKEY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 3, 1986

Mr. MARKEY. Mr. Speaker, the Reagan administration continues to cling to star wars despite the high cost and obvious short-comings of the program. They vow to build star wars no matter what the cost might be.

I would like to call my colleagues' attention to an editorial which appeared in the Boston Globe on Thursday, January 30. It provides an excellent analysis of the flimsy reasoning behind star wars.

The article follows:

STAR WARS PSYCHOLOGY

Last fall, on the eve of the Geneva summit, Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger testified that he favored deploying a "star wars" strategic-defense system, no matter how much it cost and even if it did not work.

"Any degree of strategic defense is worth it," Weinberger told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. He insisted that the system would be worth building, even if the Soviets responded by building enough offensive missiles to overwhelm it by saturation, even if such Soviet countermeasures were less costly than the defense.

"Protecting people's lives would be worth anything it would cost," he said, declining to estimate that cost because the system has not been invented. He would not want to give up the system "under any circumstances."

In the world of profit and loss, a comparable disregard for reality would send a business executive into early retirement. In the Reagan administration, it makes no difference. This week, it was disclosed that Weinberger has elevated "star wars" to the "highest priority" among Pentagon programs.

In the annually revised defense guidance, the document on which Pentagon officials are supposed to base long-range budget plans, space-defense programs are to be insulated from cuts. Far more urgent, realistic programs will be cut, so that $2.75 billion worth of momentum can be pumped into "star wars" this year alone.

Why does Weinberger—who is bright and has been successful in various endeavors—cling to a fanatical position that others would find embarrassing? Why is "star wars" so important to him and those who think like him?

The answer may lie in the intolerance for the idea of coexisting with communism that characterizes the US right wing.

The right wing has always hated the idea of nuclear deterrence because it rests on the assumption that the United States and the Soviet Union are vulnerable to each other and must learn to get along. Interdependency leads to moderation, restraint, cooperation and arms control.

The right wing especially despises Weinberger's predecessor Robert McNamara because he crafted policies based on such assumptions when the US government might have been able to destroy the Soviet Union. Because of the margin of superiority, which no longer exists, the US might have gotten away with it.

"Star wars" is a totem for the right wing because these ideologies do not want to face the fact of mutual vulnerability and cannot abide the notion that their future is intertwined with that of a nation they so viscerally dislike. The drive that underlies their intensely chauvinistic, go-it-alone politics is psychological. So is their need for "star wars."

DIMINISHING ACCESS TO HIGHER EDUCATION FOR LOW-INCOME STUDENTS

HON. WILLIAM D. FORD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 3, 1986

Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, a recent study conducted by the American Council on Education and the University of California at Los Angeles, "The American Freshman: National Norms for Fall 1985," uncovered a huge jump in parental income levels since 1984, with 26 percent of the freshmen reporting their parents' income is from $50,000 to $99,999 annually, double the number of parents who earned that much in 1984. At the same time, the percentage of students from families with incomes below $15,000 dropped from 20.7 percent in 1984 to 15.9 percent in 1985.

While some would attribute this increase to inflation and would contend that it is because American families are doing better than ever, the truth is there has been little inflation during the past year and what the statistics really emphasize is that the poorest students in America are finding it more and more difficult to attend college. Significantly, this trend began in the 1982–83 school year, the first academic year affected by the mandated cuts in the Gramm-Latta Reconciliation Act of 1981, which froze growth in the majority of Federal student assistance programs at the same time when college tuitions and fees were increasing by 13 to 16 percent per year.

Recent statistics also indicate that more than half of all of today's college students work full time. Twenty-five years ago less than one-third of America's students had to hold full-time jobs. Similarly, the ability of families to fully support their children's college educations has dropped to a new low. Today only 27 percent of American families can fully support their children's attendance at publicly supported colleges and universities and fewer than 13 percent can manage the costs of private postsecondary education institutions.

The result is that we are headed toward a less educated populace with the dream of education being denied to those who need it most desperately to better themselves and all of society. This trend is a reversal of the 20-year history of the Federal role in providing student financial assistance. When the Higher Education Act was first recommended to Congress by the President in 1965 its purpose was stated as follows:

To extend the opportunity for higher Education more broadly among lower and middle income families. . . . Nothing matters more to the future of our country: not our military preparedness—for armed might is worthless if we lack the brain power to build a world of peace; not our productive economy—for we cannot sustain growth without trained manpower; not our democratic system of government—for freedom is fragile if citizens are ignorant.

In the past the higher education programs have worked well. Between 1965 and 1980, when these programs were in full effect, the education level of the population went up but so did the country's economic growth and the percentage of those in poverty decreased. Since 1981 when reductions in these programs first became effective, the poverty level has increased, and the rate of economic growth decreased. The correlations are clear. If we continue to cut education programs in order to gain short-term goals, more and more students will be denied educational opportunities and the country will suffer not only today but also in the future.

ETHIOPIAN RESETTLEMENT

HON. MARGE ROUKEMA

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 3, 1986

Mrs. ROUKEMA. Mr. Speaker, for the past year, much of the world's attention has been focused on the famine crisis in Africa. The United States has donated a significant amount of food aid and emergency humanitarian assistance to the starving in Africa. We have done this, in cooperation with other Western donors and the United Nations, in the hope that we can relieve the suffering of so many unfortunate people.

The situation in Ethiopia has been particularly severe. Civil war, drought and a stagnant economy have combined to make the day-to-day survival of millions dependent on the donor community. It is disturbing then to hear allegations that the Ethiopian Government is diverting vitally needed resources from the famine relief effort to the program of resettlement. The New York Times editorial of January 31, 1986 clearly states the need for a halt to this program, so that more resources can be devoted to the No. 1 priority of feeding the hungry. I commend this editorial to the attention of all Members.

The editorial follows:

ETHIOPIA'S TRAIL OF TEARS

Ethiopia is uprooting about 1.5 million people in what its Marxist regime calls a "voluntary" resettlement program. But a reputable French-based relief agency, Doctors Without Borders, insists otherwise. It says villagers in the northern highlands are being trucked to infested southern wetlands in a forced migration and estimates that 100,000 lives have been lost. Ethiopia says the charges are "without foundation" and asserts that United Nations observers dispute the casualty estimates.

Not quite. The U.N.'s experts say the toll may be overstated but they claim to have no independent figures. The observers of American relief agencies deplore the resettlements but refuse to debate it, lest they be expelled, like Doctors Without Borders.

All those engaged in relief thus juggle the old dilemma of trying to feed the starving in a nation that resents their presence.

Unfortunately, there are good reasons to heed the medical group's warnings. The authorities in Ethiopia contend they have only reactivated an old plan for moving villagers from the parched north to the more fertile south. But they stand to gain strategically from depopulating an area where a guerrilla insurgency flourishes. And their methods, by all reports, are horrendous.

Villagers are being herded into "regroupment centers," then crammed into trucks and buses and dumped into makeshift resettlement camps. The entire effort appears to be a frantic improvisation, showing little regard, the doctors say, for the health of already weakened highlanders, who lack immune defenses against lowland diseases. As one of the doctors said in recounting work in an inadequate clinic, "We are an orphan factory."

The cruelty of the operation is not in dispute. Observers willing to talk at all argue only about the number of fatalities.

The humane response is to continue sending food and relief workers to Ethiopia, taking care not to assist the resettlement campaign in any direct way. That is the policy of the United States and should also be the U.N.'s. Americans have already distributed more than 450,000 tons of food through private agencies. Current U.S. shipments will again provide about a third of Ethiopia's need. As the amount of aid grows, so should the demand for a moratorium on resettlement. Ethiopians are suffering enough.

COMMENDING THE CAPITOL CITY JAYCEES FOR THEIR PARTICIPATION IN DEBTBUSTERS

HON. BILL RICHARDSON

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 3, 1986

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to commend the Capitol City Jaycees of Santa Fe, NM, for their participation in the Debtbusters game.

Debtbusters is a game created by the Roosevelt Center to educate the public on budgetary decisions made by local, State, and Federal officials. During their participation in the game, the Jaycees developed a greater sense of appreciation for the difficult choices we legislators must make daily regarding our skyrocketing deficit. The cuts recommended by the group were fairly even-handed, suggesting that sacrifices must be made by all if this problem is to be solved. Closing tax loopholes was also supported as a means of funding Federal programs.

Once again, the Capitol City Jaycees deserve recognition for their interest and initiative in trying to remedy a problem of great concern to our Nation.

MR. RAY O'CONNOR LEAVES THE FEDERAL ENERGY REGULATORY COMMISSION

HON. JOHN D. DINGELL

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 3, 1986

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, just a few weeks ago Ray O'Connor, who has served as Chairman of the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission for the past several years, announced his decision to leave the Commission prior to the expiration of his term in order to return to private life and to his home city of New York.

I was very sorry to learn of that decision, although I do understand it. Chairman O'Connor's service in Washington has involved considerable personal sacrifice, the more so because his family has remained in New York.

While we have not always agreed, I have appreciated Ray O'Connor's willingness to discuss the issues and to work with the Congress on resolving them. He has served the public and the Commission well, and he has chaired with fairness and distinction.

Recently, his leadership at the Commission, particularly on the issue of nondiscriminatory transportation of natural gas, has been extremely important. Indeed, I believe the policy he espouses will, over the years to come, ensure lower cost natural gas to consumers while providing new and competitive markets for producers.

I also note that since September 1984, Chairman O'Connor and the Commission charted a new course toward the conduct of hydroelectric activities and their impact on the environment, particularly fish and wildlife.

Of particular importance is the Commission's efforts, starting last April, to initiate a procedure for assessing the environmental effects of multiple hydro licenses for projects clustered together in limited geographic areas. This procedure, known as the cluster impact assessment procedure, was extended last November to the Ohio River Basin. This is a very important effort, and the Committee on Energy and Commerce will be closely monitoring the Commission's continued implementation after Chairman O'Connor returns to private life.

Ray O'Connor has served the Commission and the Nation with integrity and skill, and I wish him well in his future endeavors.

A TRIBUTE TO DR. JOSEPH STERNSTEIN

HON. ROBERT J. MRAZEK

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 3, 1986

Mr. MRAZEK. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to extend warm and deserving congratulations to Dr. Joseph Sternstein for his recent election to the presidency of the Jewish National Fund of America, the organization responsible for afforestation and land reclamation in Israel.

It is befitting that a man who exemplifies the essence of the Zionist ideal should be chosen for this prestigious position. Dr. Sternstein's life reflects an unremitting commitment to Israel.

Many of my colleagues are, of course, already aware of Dr. Sternstein's contributions to national Rabbinic, Zionist, and Jewish causes. I am particularly proud to note that Dr. Sternstein is the rabbi of Temple Beth Sholom of Roslyn Heights in Long Island, NY. In this capacity, Rabbi Sternstein has been a leader in Long Island community affairs, and has served as a model for both young and elderly Jews to become involved in the Zionist ideal.

Mr. Speaker, Rabbi Sternstein has worked with unrelenting enthusiasm and dedication for the cause of Zionism. Dr. Sternstein is past president of the American Zionist Federation—the umbrella organization of the entire American Zionist movement—and is past president of the Zionist Organization of America. He was a member of the World Executive of the World Zionist Organization and the Jewish Agency Board. Currently, Rabbi, Sternstein also serves as treasurer of the New York Board of Rabbis and as vice chairman of the National Conference on Soviet Jewry.

Rabbi Sternstein has also actively promoted Jewish and Israeli causes in the world arena. He has traveled widely and met with the top statesman of the world. He has stepped behind the Iron Curtain and before the assassination of President Anwar Sadat, Dr. Sternstein met with the Egyptian leader for a private meeting as an American Zionist leader, beyond his duties as a rabbi.

Rabbi Sternstein has consistently gone beyond the call of duty and through his work embodies the ideal of the truly concerned citizen. I call on my colleagues in the U.S. House of Representatives to join me in congratulating Rabbi Sternstein.

A TRIBUTE TO ALDEN AAROE

HON. THOMAS J. BLILEY, JR.

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 3, 1986

Mr. BLILEY. Mr. Speaker, January 31, 1986 marked an important milestone for my friend Alden Aaroe of Richmond, VA. For 40 years, Richmonders have been waking up to Alden's special brand of humor and information as the announcer of WRVA radio's morning program. More than once, Alden's wit and wisdom have gotten me off to a fresh start in the morning. I miss hearing him when I'm in Washington, and I look forward to the mornings I'm in Richmond where I can be sure of an entertaining and informative start on the day.

On January 31, Alden celebrated his 40th year with Richmond and WRVA radio. On behalf of his loyal fans, friends, and coworkers, I would like to say, "Thank you, Alden, and may you be a part of our mornings for another 40 years."

THE TAX REFORM ACT

HON. LES AuCOIN

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 3, 1986

Mr. AuCOIN. Mr. Speaker, as the 99th Congress begins its 2d session, it's imperative that we address a piece of unfinished business.

On December 31, 1985, the 25-percent Federal tax credit for research and development activities expired. It did not, however, go down without a fight. In the hectic days before the rush to adjourn, a bill extending this and several other tax credits for several months did pass the House of Representatives—but it did not become law. Thus, as I speak today there is no R&D tax credit.

The action taken by the House on the short extender bill and the passage of the omnibus "Tax Reform Act of 1985"—which entended the credit for the 3 more years at a reduced level of 20 percent—demonstrated that there is substantial support for extending this tax credit in some fashion. But, the legislative clock ran out before that support could be translated into concrete action.

Today I am introducting legislation that would fill the void created by the Congress' inaction. My bill would extend the R&D tax credit until December 31, 1986—thus giving the Congress a full year to determine its ultimate fate. The bill also makes the credit retroactive to January 1, 1986. Furthermore, my bill would extend the credit at the current 25-percent level.

American companies working desperately to compete with overseas markets have a right to expect some consistency from the Federal Government when making important financial planning decisions. Because there is substantial support for extending the R&D tax credit, it is unfair to let the credit fall through the cracks. Research and development activities cannot be shut on and off like a water spigot. The planning process takes several months, if not years, alone.

The R&D tax credit, first adopted as part of the Economic Recovery Tax Act of 1981, has already helped stimulate private spending for research activities, and the benefits from commercial research have quickly spread through the economy, improving the quality of life, worker productivity, and the real GNP.

Meanwhile, the United States has become increasingly reliant on exports by high-technology companies, which use the credit extensively. For example, in 1983 high-technology products accounted for about 44 percent of all exports of manufactured goods, compared to 35 percent in 1970.

At a time when the United States is running a $145-billion trade deficit, is this the time to pull the rug out from under our exporters? Is this the time to discourage innovation—innovation that enhances our competitive position throughout the world?

I think not.

Let's restore the tax credit for research and development activities—retroactively. It's too important to our continued economic growth and job production to let lapse.

NATIONAL FIRE FIGHTERS DAY

HON. LES ASPIN

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 3, 1986

Mr. ASPIN. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced legislation to honor our Nation's 2 million firefighters. House Joint Resolution 479 declares October 8, 1986 "National Firefighters Day." This day occurs during National Fire Prevention Week, and will focus attention on the brave men and women who make this vital and dangerous job a part of their everyday lives.

Firefighters are engaged in one of the most hazardous occupations possible. They respond to 11 million emergency calls each year, including millions of working fires. Since 1977, well over 1,000 firefighters have given their lives, and many more have suffered injury, to save the lives of countless others.

Fire fighters are also an important part of every community. Fire departments participate in education, recreation, and charity activities in our small towns and big cities.

We've never had a day before to honor all the fine people who make up our fire fighting force. I think one day to show our appreciation is well deserved, and I call upon my colleagues to join me in expressing their appreciation by cosponsoring House Joint Resolution 479 and making October 8 this year's "National Fire Fighters Day."

THE 1986 TRADE EXPANSION ACT

HON. DAN MICA

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 3, 1986

Mr. MICA. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation designed to increase our international trade competitiveness.

To many Americans, the trade deficit is an abstraction. But there is nothing abstract about the $148.5 billion deficit recorded by the United States in 1985.

There is nothing abstract about 2 million lost jobs, a lower standard of living, and American firms losing billions of dollars in sales at home and abroad.

We are witnessing the death of a nation as a salesman. We are faced with irreversible economic decline, and we have a choice. We can ignore the problem and hope it goes away, or we can fight it by forcing open overseas markets and fostering domestic policies that put U.S. exporters on an equal footing with their foreign competitors.

The year 1985 saw unprecedented congressional focus on our domestic budget deficit. The year 1986 is destined to be a year in which we finally attack the twin deficits of trade and the domestic budget. Neither can be treated independently.

Through 8 years in the Congress, I have fostered a reputation as a free trader. I will continue to do so, but we no longer can extoll the virtues of free trade at home and watch our competitors play by different rules.

As ranking majority member on the Foreign Affairs Subcommittee for International Economic Policy and Trade, I have been assured that this legislation will be referred to our panel.

THE 735TH ANNIVERSARY OF LITHUANIAN INDEPENDENCE

HON. TOM LEWIS

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 3, 1986

Mr. LEWIS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, this year Lithuanian-Americans will celebrate the 68th anniversary since the restoration of their independence; 1986 also marks the 735th anniversary of Lithuania's statehood.

On February 16, Americans of Lithuanian ancestry across the United States will recognize this important event. In my own congressional district, 150 members of the Palm Beach County Chapter of the Lithuanian-American Community of the USA will join together to commemorate the anniversary.

Residents of the 12th District have also participated in other events honoring this cause. In 1984, the Palm Beach County Chapter dedicated a monument to the United States for granting freedom to Lithuanians living under Soviet domination. This red granite memorial was unveiled in Royal Palm Beach Memorial Gardens on October 8, Columbus Day.

Mr. Speaker, we must continue to uphold our Nation's policy which does not recognize the illegal 1940 incorporation of Lithuania, Estonia, and Latvia into the Soviet Union. Moreover, the United States must continue to work for the freedom of these Baltic citizens by realizing that this is an issue which is a vital component of future United States-Soviet relations.

I believe it is important that we remember both the fate and the hope of Lithuanians and other citizens who are living under Soviet rule. I hope that all Members of Congress and their families will take time to remember our recognition of the Baltic Republics and their people.

SALUTE TO ST. ELIZABETH ANN SETON SCHOOL

HON. GUS YATRON

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 3, 1986

Mr. YATRON. Mr. Speaker, today it gives me great honor to recognize the St. Elizabeth Ann Seton School in Minersville, PA. During the week of February 2 to 8, 1986, the students at the school will be celebrating National Catholic Schools Week.

National Catholic Schools Week has been celebrated throughout the Nation since 1973. I believe that this is an excellent occasion to recognize the important contribution which Catholic schools have made to America. For years, they have provided an important alternative to public education, and today, more than 2½ million children attend Catholic schools. This education has helped prepare students for meeting life's challenges with both wisdom and compassion.

The theme for this year's observance of Catholic Schools Week is "Rainbow of Excellence." The celebration will emphasize the goals of Catholic education for Catholic children from all walks of life. This effort can only strengthen the already proud traditions of Catholic educators and help point the way for further advances.

Celebration of Catholic Schools Week is a popular occasion at St. Elizabeth Ann Seton School and the students are looking forward to a number of special events. I think it is fitting to recognize St. Elizabeth Ann Seton during Catholic Schools Week. I know that my colleagues will join me in honoring both the students and faculty on this important occasion and in wishing them continued success in the years to come.

SENATE COMMITTEE MEETINGS

As an additional procedure along with the computerization of this information, the Office of the Senate Daily Digest will prepare this information for printing in the Extensions of Remarks section of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on Monday and Wednesday of each week.

Any changes in committee scheduling will be indicated by placement of an asterisk to the left of the name of the unit conducting such meetings.
